I have not found that God hath made much use of labored periods, rhetorical flowers, and elegancies to improve the power of religion in the world; yea, I have observed how Providence hath sometimes rebuked good men when they have too much affected these pedantic foleries in withdrawing from them his usual aids, and exposing them to shame. [Flavel.

So far as I ever observed God's dealings with my soul, the flights of preachers sometimes entertained me; but it was Scripture expressions which did penetrate my heart, and that in a way peculiar to themselves. [J. Brown, of Haddington.

John did not preach so much to please as to profit. He chose rather to discover men's sins, than to show his own eloquence. That is the best looking glass, not which is most gilded, but which shows the truest face. [Thomas Watson.

Preaching experimentally is the life and soul of preaching. Men love sermons that come to their business and bosoms. [Job Orton.

Which things also we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth. And I, brethren, when I came to you, came not with excellency of speech, or of wisdom, declaring unto you the testimony of God. [Paul.

Not Doing any Good.

You say you do no good by preaching. This is talking weakly: I had almost used a harder word. Should you not be chided for it? [Orton.

"Why do you leave off preaching?" said Latimer to one. "Because I do no good," was the reply. "That, brother," said the Bishop, "is a naughty, very naughty reason."

My word shall not return unto me void, saith the Lord, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it.

It may be demanded what must be done when the labors of our calling are in vain?

Answer: We must follow the command and calling of God, whether we have good success or no, and whatever comes of it. Though Paul feared his labor was in vain, yet still he labored. Thus to do whatever follows is true wisdom and the fear of God. [William Perkins.

We are unto God a sweet savor of Christ, in them that are saved, and in them that perish. [Paul.

While I oversee the Church, Christ oversees me. [Polycarp.

Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life. [Jesus Christ.

I would rather serve Christ for nothing, than gain all the kingdom of the world as the fruit of any sin, idleness not excepted. [Anonymous.

If the iron be blunt, then must he be put to the more strength. [Solomon.

A quiet application to those duties which are immediately necessary, though neither easy nor honorable, is of much more value than a long train of activity and zeal, in a sphere of action sweetened by applause. [Old Author.

If one wont, another will. [Matthew Henry.

Aged Ministers.

Like Samson in his old age, I continually forget that I am not what I once was. But when I take hold of the strength of God, I wonder at results. [Anonymous.

O Lord! help an old man. [Thomas.

If I can set an example of cheerfulness and submission, under the infirmities of old age said one, it may be more useful than my best sermons.

Many hours, and some whole days, I am quite laid aside as useless, and often in great pain and weakness. But, having obtained help of God, I continue to this day; and, blessed be his name, have some intervals of ease and cheerfulness, which I hope are employed to some valuable purposes. I read my good old books, in which there is a savor and cultableness to my case, which I find in few modern ones. I beg the continuance of your prayers for me, that I may be doing some little good while I am continued here, and be growing more and more meet for a nobler sphere of service, when my Master calls me hence. [Orton.

If I ever reach the Kingdom of Heaven, I think I will try to find the thief who died on the Cross, and take him by the hand and say, Come, my brother, let us go aside, and see if we can find out which is the greatest debtor to the grace of God. [Spence.

Good humor is the blue sky of the soul, in which every star of talent will shine more clearly.

SCRAPS FOR SPIRITUAL MINDS.

Entering the Holiest.

"Mr. Andrew preached on Monday night upon "having boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus." He said we were to enter into the holiest, and never to come out; that there is nothing said in the Bible about coming out; we are to abide there; we are to carry on our worldly business in the holiest of all."

God Making His Word Food.

I was speaking to a poor old woman to-day—one of God's children—who is in great darkness, owing to her disease, and she said, "O! if I only had strong faith; but I must just creep at His feet, and surely the precious blood which has washed thousands can wash me." I was helped to give her many sweet texts; but I was struck by seeing how plain He alone can make his word food; for, after all my texts, she still stuck to one which, she said at the beginning, gave her comfort, and it was this, "None is able to pluck them out of my hand."

A Melted Heart.

It is strange how loving Jesus appears to me, when I speak to others about Him; and yet I cannot feel that he is to love me. I had a very sweet time at prayer this morning while confessing sin; the love of Jesus in forgiving my vile, vile sins against light and against love, appeared so wonderful that I could not stand it; my hard heart melted, and I would not give the sweetness of the tears I then shed for a world of this world's joy. I could only say, "Truly, Thy name is Wonderful." When I get sight of Christ's willingness to forgive and receive his backsliding child again, without one word of upbraiding, it almost breaks my heart. O! how this tender, forgiving love should [illegible] to hate sin!

Nearness to God.

What a loving Being our God is, for the the nearer we get to Him, and the more we know of Him, we are the less afraid. His perfect love, shed abroad in our hearts, casts out all our fear.

I see more and more that it is our simply looking to Jesus as ungodly, empty sinners, that makes us what the holy are. Let us look at Him, too, nothing doubting, and we shall grow as they do; there is nothing to hinder it. None of our outward trials need hinder it; on the contrary, they are blessed means of growing in grace. They lead us more to Jesus; and everything that does that, whatever it be, is a blessing.

Used of Sorrow.

I have, sometimes, such sorrow that I wonder my heart does not break; yet I feel that it is well to be tried, for I am led more to Jesus, then. Sorrow has often driven me to Him, when I might otherwise not have felt so much need of Him. I think I have learnt many a valuable lesson in this place. I can not tell you them all in a letter, but if spared to meet, I shall tell you much. Everything seems to make this Scripture ring in your ears and mine—"Cease ye from man." I don't think we have either of us found our all in Jesus, and I don't think He will let us alone till we do. He will prove to us that all else is an empty cistern; and it is a difficult lesson to learn, but a needful one. I was thanking Him this morning for every pang that has ever passed through these weary hearts of ours. O! R——, it will [illegible] over, and then we shall be where Jesus is all in all, and where there shall be no more sorrow, nor sighing, nor sin any more.

THE ROCKS OF CALVARY.

In Fleming's Christology it is stated that an unbeliever, visiting the sacred places of Palestine, was shown the clefts of Mount Calvary. Examining them narrowly and critically, he turned in amazement to his fellow travelers and said, "I have long been a student of nature, and I am sure the clefts and rents in this rock were never done by nature, or any ordinary earthquake; for by such a concussion the rock must have split according to the veins, and where it was weakest in the adhesion of parts; for this," said he, "I have observed to have been done in other rocks when separated or broken after an earthquake; and reason tells me it must always be so. But it is quite otherwise here; for the rocks are split athwart and across the veins in a most strange and preternatural manner; and therefore," said he, "I thank God that I came hither to see the standing monument of a miraculous power by which God gives evidence to the day of the divinity of Christ."

Two in Heaven.—"You have two children," said I. "I have four," was the reply; "two on earth, two in heaven."

There spoke the mother! Still here! only gone before. Still remembered, loved and cherished by the hearth and at the board; their places not yet filled; even though their [illegible] draw life from the same faithful breast where their dying heads were pillowed.

NEW ORLEANS:

Saturday Morning, March 26.

Rev. D. W. Pollock.—This amiable and pious minister of Christ died of consumption in Tuskegee, Alabama, on the 9th instant, in the 30th year of his age.

In early life he studied medicine; but before graduation turned his attention to the more important duty of preaching the gospel. Some four years since he was sent out by the Missouri Conference to California. From labor and exposure in this new field, he contracted the disease of which he died. On his return from California he selected Alabama as his home, and entered as vigorously upon the great object to which he had consecrated his life, as his health would permit. Last year he was, with the approbation of the Alabama Conference, of which he was a member, appointed agent for the American Bible Society. While prosecuting the duties of this vocation, a few weeks since, his disease assumed a malignant form; and, alas, in a few days, he was called upon to grapple with the last enemy. His end was peace.

Dr. P. had been married but a few months to a most amiable and accomplished lady, who has been thus early called to gather her affections around the grave of one of the best of husbands. May her stricken heart be stayed upon the "mighty God of Jacob!"

Sermon.—A copy of a sermon on the Possibility of Apostacy, has been laid on our table, warm from the press. The author, Rev. J. Lusk, P. E., of Covington District, Mississippi Conference. Text was suitably selected from Gen. iii. 4: "Ye shall not surely die." The sermon opens vigorously. This is the first sentence:

"The author of our text, and as it appears the founder of the doctrine of the impossibility of apostacy, having a black character, should cause us to receive it with great hesitancy, if at all."

Correspondents.—The mails for several days past have been irregular from the East. On yesterday they disgorged themselves, but too late to be available to our present sheet. Among others our capital French correspondent "J. P. C." came to hand, under date of 24th ult.

Mormons.—On Wednesday evening last a large number of Mormons, amounting to nearly four hundred, left this city on the steamboat John Simonds for St. Louis, their final destination being Salt Lake. They were mostly from Wales, were accompanied by two or three dozen preachers, represented as being intelligent. They were very enthusiastic, and rent the air with their huzzas on leaving the Levee.

The Latest Rage.—What though the Harpers issue monthly, 110,000 copies of their Magazine, and have half a million of readers? Yet some of ours may not take it, and not taking it, may not have read this monthly article.

Somerfield, Alabama.—Through brethren Garrett and Ferguson we are informed of a gracious revival in progress at this place. The students of Centenary Institute, and the citizens, are partakers of the heavenly benefit. The schools, both male and female, have a large number of students in attendance—more than at any time during the past term.

Harrison County, Miss.—The Board of Police, last Tuesday, put up the license to retail liquors at $1000. It was before at $50. The Sons of Temperance are about. The town corporation of Biloxi has put it up to $250. This was before $50.

Teachers, see the Advertisement for Port Gibson.

BOTH OF THEM CONVERTED.

We were asking an esteemed friend, the other day, how his daughters were pleased with the College to which, in our knowledge, he had sent them. "O, like it well! They progress finely in their studies, and have been converted, since there, and joined the Church." What, both of them converted? "Yes," he replied, "both: Have you not heard of it before?" We had not; but heard it then, and in sympathetic gladness with the speaker, who is a Methodist, and a kind father, and whose daughters bid fair to be lovely women, the more since they are "both converted."

The College is a Methodist Female College. This father reaped what he had sown, but more abundantly. Had he passed by his own Church institutions, and deceived by the profession, falsely and boldly set up, of better educational advantages and discipline, sent his daughters to a convent or fashionable boarding school, he doubtless would have heard far different tidings of Sallie and Lizzie. It would have been told him that they were elegant dancers, very Grisettes, and not [illegible] converted; or that they wished [illegible] veil, or wore a crucifix, or despised [illegible] as heretics, instead of having [illegible] the Church of their father and [illegible].

SECRET SOCIETIES and ROMANISM.

The Free Masons and Independent Order of Odd Fellows are generally known—and we believe with their consent—as "secret societies."—To these may be added, as claiming a much later origin, the Sons of Temperance. These societies are certainly well thought of by those who belong to them; and those who do not belong to them are in the fix of persons who, "not knowing, can't say." Judged of by their members they challenge respect; for these are numerous and increasing, and include many citizens of the highest talent, influence, and virtue. Judged of by their works, these praise them. The Sons are a noble order, organized for the purpose of staying a plague that long has cursed society. They have been, thus far, true to their humane charter; and we trust will never be disbanded till the plague of intemperance is stayed. The other two have long been dispensing large and systematic charities. The poor and the stranger, the widow and orphan, have blessed them; and any man should be slow to think evil of the societies upon which their benedictions rest. The square, and the compass, and the grasped hands of fellowship, the mottoes of love and purity, are, even to the uninitiated, pleasing symbols in this crooked and selfish world of ours. We are not aware that they have ever been prostituted from their professed purposes to base and mischievous ends, either political or religious. This could hardly be, made up as they are of men of various creeds, sects, and opinions. A society, even a secret one, of which George Washington was a prominent member, would hardly be suspected of hatching treason against Church or State—and Washington was a Mason.

We are neither a Free Mason, nor the son of a Free Mason. We know neither grip nor covenant: a friendly out-sider, only. To vindicate this, or either of these secret societies, from the prejudices of any mind, to blame, or eulogize them, is none of our business. But lately we have been somewhat interested in contemplating the position of hostility which the Roman Catholic Church has assumed toward them. This position is significant. The subject has been forced upon us by the history of facts; and as it affords a new and interesting stand-point from which to view that system of priest-tyranny that is endeavoring to plant itself in our country to the suppression of all liberty, both personal and public, civil and religious, it may be profitable to our readers to bring it before them.

Within the last ten months, a young man living on F—— street, in this city, lay on his death bed. He was a member of the I. O. O. F. Society—had been about six months. Some of the Society went to see him, and minister to him. He grew worse, and his friends advised him that he would die, and not live. He was a Papist, or had been brought up one. At his request they summoned a priest. The ghostly father ascertained among the preliminaries to confession that he belonged to a "secret society." He would go no further: the confessing penitent must abjure it. In vain he alleged it had done him no harm, and begged to be allowed the benefits of confessional, without the abjuration of a society that even then was ministering to him. A respite was allowed for reconsideration. The Bishop was waited on by the N. G. of the Lodge to procure, if possible, a dispensation. But, no: none was to be allowed. The tyranny was inexorable. In the young man's imagination the keys of heaven and hell were in the hands of those "fathers;" and overcome by educational superstitions he yielded to the terms they dictated, and abjured the secret society that he might get his passport to heaven! When next a member of the Lodge visited him (he was an officer) the dying man informed him, with a pretty firm voice, of what he had done, and told him not to consider him any longer a member. Soon afterwards he died.

Now, that he should have yielded is not strange. What will a man, in whose mind this dread of priest-power has been fastened by education, not do or promise, accede to or abjure, at the near approach of death? Would any demand be refused in cases where this unrelenting tyranny brooded, like a night-mare, with its eternal horrors, over a weak, prostrate, and undoubting subject? What human right or privilege can stand before such ghostly prerogative, when it is once enthroned, or be safe against its death-bed extortions?

Another case occurred since the above, falling more within our personal cognizance. Mr. R—— died about five weeks ago, on L—— street. He had been raised a Romanist, and till a few years ago was a bigoted one. Six months ago, or more, he fell sick of a lingering illness, that finally brought on his death. The priest was sent for; he came readily, and sat down by the bed-side. The first question asked, after closing the doors, was: "Are you a member of any secret society?" Mr. R.... was an honest man, and feared not tell the truth: the reply was, "I am a Mason." He was required to renounce. To this he demurred; asked wherefore? said there was no harm in the Order, that it had not hurt him, but rather bettered him; and begged that his confessions might go on without such conditions. No, he must renounce, or the priest would leave him to die in his sins! "What," said Mr. R...., "I don't see how my being a Mason ought to prevent. Wasn't Washington a Mason, and other great and good men, too?" It is due to the priest to say he did not leave abruptly, but remonstrated, saying over and over, with equal stupidity and persistence, "My son, renounce it, or this Free Mason religion will send you to the devil." My son! An anachronism, by the way, since the penitent was as old as the priest.

This not succeeding, the ghostly father added, to this effect: "Your wife is at the bottom of this: I know she is; will you lose your soul for her sake?" What does she care for you? In three months after you are dead she will be married to some other fellow." This insulting reference to a faithful and affectionate wife was rather too much; and beside eliciting a suitable answer it helped to end the interview. The father left, leaving word when he got of a better mind to let him know.

This reference to the wife was in perfect keeping with priest-character. Michelet has charged them with being "envious of the confidence and happiness of the marriage state," and does not hesitate to lay upon them divisions and alienations in families. We do not understand the reason of this suspicion of the wife's influence; unless it be that she, about to be left a widow, thought on the aid and protection of the Secret Society, and therefore would be loath that her husband should abjure it.

It is proper, to prevent any mistake or unjust blame, to say that these "fathers" did not require the secrets of the societies to be revealed to them; but only that the societies should be abjured. Nor did he who remonstrated with his penitent say that being a member of these secret societies was directly a bar to salvation. It was put some how in this style:

You can't be saved unless a member of the Holy Catholic Church. But you can't be a member of a secret society and of the Church, both. Therefore you cannot be a member of a secret society and be saved.

Mr. R—— braved all that logic. He had joined the Masons, in Arkansas, about three years ago, and since then had fallen from off this Church. He was a man of strong common sense, and too independent to be browbeat, even on his death-bed. He had mixed with men, free men, and got into an inveterate habit of thinking for himself. He never saw the priest after that day—never sent for him. A Protestant minister was called in. The sick man was recommended to confess all his sins to Christ, and by faith in His atonement expect a full and free pardon. A more docile, and child-like, and satisfactory experience of grace, than appeared in him, we have seldom witnessed. He received the Lord's supper, at an interval of a month, twice—died in peace and in possession of his faculties, expressing an earnest desire that it might be said and known he died a Methodist, and that his name might be permitted to stand on the Church records, side by side with his wife, who had already promised him to attach herself openly and formally. She has since heartily fulfilled that pledge.

Such is a history of two recent cases. The facts that have not fallen under our personal cognizance have come to us directly and upon the most reliable testimony. Let the reader ponder them. What tenderness is displayed in sending a man to hell on a mere punctilio prefatory to last confession! What dreadful preference of sacrifice to mercy! A thing not forbid by Christ or the Scriptures, but by the Church!

Is not this antagonism, Romanism has assumed, and persistently maintains, even at the soul's peril towards these societies, significant? Have they ever plotted against the peace of society, or overthrown governments? Do they require it as a condition, of those who enter them, to war against the Roman Catholic Church? Those who ought to know have told us that no such requirement is made.

The fact is the Roman Catholic Church cannot tolerate any, the least degree of independency, in her domain. She must be all in all. Romanism, itself, is a great secret society, and we wish there were as little to be apprehended from its designs as those societies it wars against. Through spies, confessionals, and informants, it is endeavoring to get hold and use the secrets of the world, and is jealous of the monopoly.

MEMENTOS OF THE DEAD.

"And their works do follow them" is a true and glorious line of the epitaph of saints. By these, being dead, they yet speak. These make their memory "blessed." These tell survivors not only that they were, but what manner of persons they were.

In the Acts of the Apostles a short and simple story is told of one of the early disciples, whose conduct needs only to be repeated in every Christian, to make Zion the perfection of beauty, and the memory of departed saints as dear to mankind as the example of their lives was useful. This disciple was a woman named Tabitha—"this woman was full of good works and alms-deeds which she did." Of course at her funeral there were mourners. No mock mourners were they. The deceased had been eyes to the blind and feet to the lame. In the chamber where the corpse lay, we are introduced to widows standing around and weeping, and showing the coats and garments which she had made, while she was with them.

Here was something to be shown. Life had not passed in idleness or selfishness. It had not been a benevolent dream upon ameliorating the condition of the race, or a luxurious reverie on impracticable schemes of charity. If every one would sweep before his own door the streets would be clean. If every one would make coats and garments for his destitute neighbor men would not go unclothed. There are who waste themselves in world-wide plans, and neglect the duty that lies next to them. The necessities at their door, and the labors that lie level with their capacity, are overlooked in the pursuit of some unreal and more engrossing affair, that flatters vanity by its largeness, and pleases the fancy with its distance—enchantment. To such, stitching, cutting and fitting, are facts indeed, but distasteful ones. And so coats and garments are facts, but plain facts. Surely, there was something worth while in these plain and palpable facts, or they would not have been brought forward in a history too high to deal in low things, and too brief to mention unimportant ones.

This person doubtless was not rich. She was not known for her alms-giving, but alms-doing. Her good works were rather in deeds than donations. Those who cannot give alms may do them. Benevolence is not the privilege or duty of the rich only. If there be any difference between the alms-gifts of the rich, and the alms-deeds of the poor, it lies in favor of the latter. They bear the impress of toil: they are instinct with the life of generous sacrifice, and throb with the warm heart and glowing hand of labor.

What better praise could there be than the weeping of widows, and the grateful showing proofs of her benevolence and industry? No visionary benefactor was she, nor idle dreamer over philanthropic measures. Here were the deeds done. It took no flattering eulogy to make out a good character. Here were her works, and those are best praised whose works praise them.

Reader you would be remembered when you are dead. What mementoes are you preparing? Are you also a woman? Will it be any praise, when you are gone, for your jewels to be shown? (Jewels, it may be, worth a small fortune!) "She wore these—how brilliantly she shone in them, once! how becoming were the ornaments!" Or, "This rich and varied wardrobe was hers—how costly!" These were her admired adornments—before she put them off for the shroud!" Will this be all friends can say for you—all by which they shall remember you—these memorials of selfish luxury, of pride, of vanity? It was not so in this case.

Are you poor? Remember God counted this poor disciple worthy of everlasting remembrance, and makes mention of the alms-deeds which she did. Your offerings are not despised. There is a peculiar precious element attaching to them. Hold them not back. They shall hereafter be shown.

Are you rich? By and by, they that pass by may say, "This is the fine house he built for himself. Here he took elegant ease; Here were his pleasure grounds. These barns were full of his store. Here he spent the winter. There he had his summer mansion. Here were his factories and farms, and he lived like a prince." Are these the mementoes you would leave when gone to the grave? Would you have these shown as your life's work? Better far that a worthy endowment be shown, bringing coming generations under obligations for lasting moral and educational benefits. "He founded this: he built the chapel; established the mission, or the academy, or college; raised up this asylum for the distressed, and provided this house for the outcast. These are the works he did while he was with us."

DONATION ACKNOWLEDGED.

New Orleans, March 22, 1853.

Brother McTyeire:—I received from a good Sister, living in the bounds of the N. O. District, the sum of forty-five dollars, which were wrapt in the following note, and which I have appropriated to the Lafayette German Mission, to be put into a Chapel, now being built.

Yours, etc., K.

"Brother Keener:

The enclosed is a part of my Lord's money. You are better acquainted with the wants of the Church than I am; do with it what you think best.

Yours, truly, E. R. R."

A Judge Advocate.—If all judges would throw themselves on the right side of every question when off the bench, as well as on it, and labor to prevent crime, there would be less of it to punish. We like much and commend the following paragraph, from the South Western Baptist, of East Alabama:

"A friend informs us, who attended the Circuit Court, in Randolph County, last week, that our distinguished fellow-citizen, Judge Dougherty, who was holding the Court, made a masterly temperance speech on the second day of the term, at one o'clock. The courthouse was crowded to overflowing. The effect of the speech may be learned from this, that on concluding, the Judge submitted what is called the "Alabama Law," to a vote of the audience, and every man, with one exception, responded favorably to the law."

LIVING OF THE GOSPEL.

This is no ordinance of man: for, "Even so hath the Lord ordained, that they which preach the gospel should live of the gospel." Now, all ye that love the gospel, and rejoice in it, and owe all you are in time, and all you hope to be in eternity, to a preached gospel, see how some fare that preach it, and ask yourselves, solemnly, whether you be accessory to this treatment of God's ministers.

The following is an extract from a letter received from a worthy and working member of —— Conference. We saw him receive his appointment, with a good will, and start to it. It was our fortune to travel with this Brother a part of the way, and getting much interested in him, and his prospects, we asked him to let us know, when he reached his appointment and went over it, how it fared with him:

"* * * * I came to this circuit and began preaching one month sooner than the plan I got from my predecessor demanded. I have completed two rounds.

"I am limited to $150 00 this year for table expenses, house rent, horse feed, etc.; and I have to pay out of that sum $62 50 for house rent. This takes near one half of what is allowed for the year. When I joined the Conference a horse and traveling equipage was all that I had, with the exception of a little son, four years old, without a mother. At the expiration of two years I married a poor, but industrious wife, who, notwithstanding she has been much of the time greatly afflicted, has been of great help to me; but we have not been able to accumulate any thing in the shape of property. The first year after our marriage we got no quarterage, though I did a faithful year's work—preaching from two to three times every Sunday. Consequently, in spite of all the economy we could use, we have fallen below the starting point; and, what is worse than all, we have been accused of living extravagantly! This charge I take the liberty to say is unjust and untrue. We have nothing to put in the house, and there is but little promised us in the way of furnishing one. A good Sister promises to loan us some cooking utensils; but we have nothing to cook in them. Another will loan us a table; but we have nothing to put on it. Another will loan us a quilt, or two; but we have no bed to put them on. There is a corn-crib and smoke-house; but we have nothing to put in them. We get possession of the house the 1st of March. We are now at an expense far above what is allowed us by the stewards. During the last round I have made, I have been trying to collect money to prepare for house-keeping, and have received but $15 00. One of the stewards gave me $5, another gentleman, not a member of the Church, gave $5, another member gave $2, two others gave $1 each. This is all I have to begin on.

"* * * * We have already succeeded in the settlement of some old Church difficulties, and have organized some Sunday Schools. We have had some good Class Meetings, and added two new appointments, and will add another the next round.

"When we get into the rented house, and obtain some more new subscribers for the New Orleans Christian Advocate, and have some more good Class Meetings, I will write to you again, and hope to have something better to write about.

"Your Brother in the bonds of the Gospel.

Upon the above we beg to make a few suggestions; not specially for the benefit of that circuit—for we fear they don't take the Advocate largely—but for general use:

First, Here is one case out of many, and it shows a necessity for parsonages—houses already built or rented, and with something in them, on every circuit, in which to receive the preacher and family.

Second, When generous and rich congregations, that do support these laboring among them in word and doctrine, are applied to for the Conference collection, as it is called—a collection made to meet the necessities of those engaged in the ministry who fail to receive support on the fields they are employed in—they may hereby know that they are not relieving "men of straw," and contributing to cases of supposed destitution. Here is a living man—one who gives himself wholly to the ministry—an industrious pastor, holding Class Meetings, organizing Sunday Schools, and adding on new appointments, and see how he gets along, and how he is like to come out at the end of the year?

Third, The laborer is worthy of his hire, and wages are comparative. What would be living wages in one place, and at one time, would not be sufficient to live on at others. Money is getting plenty and cheaper. The gold mines are pouring out inexhaustible treasures. A hundred dollars will not go so far now as that sum went when the yearly salary of a Methodist traveling preacher was fixed at one hundred dollars. The wages of artisans, field-laborers, mechanics, engineers, officers, doctors, lawyers, legislators, and professors, have all advanced to enable them to live. And, yet, the quarterage figure stands just where it did nearly half a century ago.

If this be conservatism we are one of the progressives. There is language in our Discipline, on the subject of ministerial support, that keys down the people far below the point at which the ministry can live and do its work, without embarrassment, and is thus every year forcing good and able men, in tears, to a total or partial location. We hope that language will not survive the next General Conference of the M. E. Church, South.

Baptists.—It was stated in the Baptist Convention at Boston, that there are 4000 Baptist churches destitute of pastors, and that, leaving these entirely unprovided for, from 400 to 500 pastors are needed every year, to supply the vacancies occurring in the ranks.

Girard College, during the past year, contained 301 orphan children, of which number 246 were born in that city.

THE BIBLE HOUSE.

Dr. Thweatt, the Agent for the South-Western and New Orleans Bible House, is at his good work, and with a heartiness worthy of it. His last report left us at Clinton, La. Up to that point $1260 were reported. He arrived in the city ten days ago, and reported to the Treasurer the following additional collections:

Jackson, La., (here two life directors and four life members were made,) and vicinity	$425 00
Bayou Sara and vicinity	98 00
Port Hudson do	100 30
Plaquemine do	237 00
Baton Rouge do	187 00
Total	$2260 30

Dr. Thweatt is now taking up collections in the Churches of the City. Of course he will, everywhere, receive the hearty coöperation of the pastors of Churches. Such coöperation thus far he has received.

That Bible House and that Depot of Bibles is needed much, and needed now. We grudge to see so many ships, driven by sail and steam, arriving and departing to all points, taking with them cotton, sugar, and everything but the Word of God. These colporteurs of trade ought to be colporteurs of Christianity, too. See the list of ships in another column "not cleared." In every cabin, and berth, and sailor's chest, should be a copy of the Bible. And then for the home supply—the steamboats are ready to take freight from the New Orleans Bible Depot, direct, through every river, gulf and bayou, of the South-West.

Take, for instance, the notice of "Steamboats leaving this day," that appeared in the city papers on last Wednesday—a day not the most popular in the steamboat calendar. There were 18; two for the Ohio; one for the Wabash river; two for St. Louis; two for the Lower Mississippi; six for Red River; one for Ouachita River; three for Yazoo River; and one for Alabama River. Then, in the same week, steamship departures for Aspinwall, Nicaragua, Havana, New York, Galveston and Matagorda Bay, and no Bible freight for all these!

[For the N. O. Christian Advocate.]

A TRIP TO ATTAKAPAS.

NUMBER II.

The town of Pattersonville is situated on the Atchafalaya river, a short distance below its junction with Bayou Teche. Some miles below the town the river finds its way to the Gulf through Barwick's Bay. I was surprised to see quite a number of vessels in port waiting for their cargoes of sugar and molasses. I understand, that in addition to the heavy shipments of the articles by steamboats, there is a considerable trade directly to Northern ports.

It was estimated, I think, that one hundred and fifty vessels had cleared at Pattersonville for various ports during the past year. The town is small, although it has been settled a long time; however, the country around is settling up, and the plantations extending themselves, so that the probability is in favor of considerable additional improvement:—There is a Methodist Church and a tolerable society; there is also a Catholic Chapel. This country enjoyed the labors of Methodist ministers a great while ago, and small societies were organized; but owing to the same miserable fatality, or management rather, which seems to have attended our movements in so many parts of Louisiana, but little fruit remains of the labors of Nolly and others. Our policy has too often been to form a circuit, supply it a few years, and then leave the people a year or two without preachers. And by the time we send them another supply the sheep are scattered, and the work has to be undertaken again—de novo. Then, in addition to other difficulties, we have to encounter a loss of confidence on the part of the people. Meanwhile the Catholics are always at their post, ready to take advantage of every opening.

The lands in the neighborhood of Pattersonville are rich, and yield an abundant return of sugar to the labors of well directed industry. It is low and flat, and requires abundant ditching, but pays well for the extra labor and expense required. As you ascend, the country bordering on the Teche becomes more elevated, and it is altogether one of the most beautiful countries I have ever seen. All the way up to New Iberia you have a constant succession of fine sugar estates, with their mammoth sugar houses, and the necessary buildings for the manufacture of that indispensable article of home consumption. And, then, on most of the large plantations the long rows of comfortable looking negro houses, generally framed, with brick chimneys, with a shed on one or both sides, all neatly whitewashed, and divided by wide streets, gives to each of these estates the air of a neat village.

Every eight or ten miles you encounter a Catholic Chapel, indicated by its spire, surmounted by a cross, and around this Chapel there is usually a straggling village, with its grog-shops and billiard-tables. These, I am told, are the almost universal attendants on Catholic Churches in Louisiana. Here the people usually go, after the Sabbath morning's service is over in the Chapel, and spend the balance of the Holy Day in drinking and gambling; and in this recreation it is said the priests very often join them. Indeed, the principal draw-back to the desirableness of this country as a place of residence, is the overwhelming preponderance of Catholic population. Were it inhabited by a good Protestant population it would be the most desirable country, as a residence, I have yet seen.

This evil will be gradually lessened. In fact, I understand that great changes have already taken place in that respect. Americans are gradually getting possession of many of the fine sugar estates, and although many of these have but little more piety than those whom they have ousted, yet in their cases you have not the superstitious bigotry of the Catholics to contend with. You have to contend with the prids, and unbelief, and worldliness, of an unregenerate heart; but this is not consecrated with the name and attributes of religion. Their religion does not fence them round on every side from the attacks of truth, for they do not claim to possess any.

The Creole population, of course, are Catholics by virtue of their birth-right. I understand that but very few of the men have any respect for the Church, its priests, or its sacraments. They are mostly infidels—scarcely any of them ever visit the confessional: yet if you appeal to them on the subject of religion, they would shrug their shoulders significantly, and tell you that they were Catholics, and did not desire to change their religion, for the very sufficient reason that their religion has never changed them! Why should a thoroughly carnal man wish to change his religion, when he is perfectly satisfied that he may live as he lists, and still by proper liberality to the Church secure heaven at the last?

We have said that so far as our information goes the majority of the men are infidels, who have really but little respect for the Church or its institutions. Such, however, is not the fact with reference to the females. They are usually bigoted in their attachment to the Catholic Church. They are punctilious and rigid devotees to its ceremonies and institutions, and it is through them that the Pope principally controls the destinies of the Creole population.

Many of this class of population are wealthy, and the young ladies are highly accomplished, and their personal charms added frequently to the possession of handsome fortunes, renders them no inconsiderable objects of attraction to young gentlemen of American and Protestant families. The result of such marriages may be easily foretold: the wife becomes increasingly bigoted with advancing years, and as the husband can rarely have any confidence in the dogmas of Catholicism, he sinks into indifferentism or absolute infidelity, and the children of such marriages follow either the superstitious bigotry of the mother, or the skepticism of the father. In either case the influence on the weal of the country is not the most desirable.

The Catholic Church is well aware of its interest in the proper education and control of the female mind and heart. Hence the abundant supply of female schools, convents, etc., where the daughters of the land are properly indoctrinated and prepared to defend and disseminate the principles of Popery. In this the wisdom of the Papal Church is manifest, as through this agency they control the homes of the country; and if ever Protestantism is to exert its appropriate influence in this land, it must wake upon this subject, and take an appropriate hint from the course of its great antagonist.

The Centenary College is doing much for the Church and country in the education of the young men of the country. This is well; but in doing this our work is not half accomplished. Protestantism has got to wake up and put forth quadruple the effort which it has ever yet exerted, or Louisiana will never become Protestant. We must have more preachers, more zeal and unflinching devotion to the interests of God and His Truth. Then may we hope for success.

And now, Mr. Editor, I will trouble you with one more letter, and then shall cease to tax the patience of your readers.

J. O. Andrew.

A TRUE BROTHER.

You're rich, and yet you are not proud;
You are not selfish, hard or vain;
You look upon the common crowd
With sympathy, and not disdain;
You'd travel far to share your gold
With humble sorrow unconsoled;
You'd raise the orphan from the dust,
And help the sad and widowed mother;
Give me your hand—you shall—you must—
I love you as a brother.

You're poor, and yet you do not scorn
The wealthy for their wealth;
You toil contented night and morn,
And prize the gifts of strength and health;
You'd share your little with a friend,
And what you cannot give you'd lend;
You take humanity on trust,
And see more merit in another;
Give me your hand—you shall—you must—
I love you as a brother.

And what care I how rich you be?
I love you if your thoughts are pure;
What signifies your poverty,
If you can struggle and endure?
'Tis not the birds that make the spring,
'Tis not the crown that makes the king;
If you are wise, and good, and just,
You've riches better than all other;
Give me your hand—you shall—you must—
I love you as a brother.

Bridal Chambers.—A writer in the Literary World hits off this immodest exhibition of our fashionable "brides" and "grooms" after the following manner. It is a description of a scene on board the steamer Oregon with its bridal state-room:

"It is night on the steamer Oregon. Swiftly the beautiful boat slips on—so swiftly and so stilly that it is a bore to know what to do. The cabins are sumptuous, but once seen, you have only to sit still. The handsome clerk, with his tasteful office hung round with pictures of lovely ladies, has drawn his stained glass windows, and there is no more 'fight or die' to be the first to settle. The idea of twenty-two miles in an hour won't amuse a man! What have you got for the people Captain! No pine beach to whittle, nor nothing? Hey! What! the knowing ones dropping off to the upper saloon! Up stairs, be it then! So—so very carelessly is deed. I see the b'hoys lounging in the satin chairs at the upper end of the long saloon—but all eyes keeping the range of the door handle of state-room 53! 'Look sharp; there goes a pretty girl to the marble table for a night-lamp! 'Eh! how she blushes!' 'Rich, is'nt it?' While ribbons and orange flowers in her bonnet, and a bran new traveling dress. I wonder whether it's you all looking at her makes her linger in unlocking the door! In she goes, and she door closes—but of course nobody got a glimpse of the embroidered canopy over the bridal bed—O, no! A nudge all round. Half an hour's intermission.

"Here he comes!' Just up from the barber's shop!' 'Looks clean, don't he?" All eyes turned to 53, and the outsiders trimming their range so as to see well in when the door opens. 'O, Mr. Bridegroom, you needn't look so mad at our having a look at you! Free country!' A gentle rap. 'Come in,' just audible through the ventilator. Door opens. 'Saw the frill of her night cap, by Jupiter! Embroidered quilt! Lace curtains!' 'Did you see her eyes!' 'How spunky the chap looks the door on the inside! As if we had'nt a right to sit where we've a mind to, in the public saloon!' 'But it's fun, getting a peep into the bridal state-room, isn't it?' 'The Oregon for me!' 'Good as play!' 'Won't we be accidentally here when she comes out in the morning!'"

Mr. Fillmore's Visit to The South.—In a letter dated the 4th inst., in reply to complimentary resolutions of the City Council of Buffalo, Mr. Fillmore says:

"I have accordingly concluded to return by the way of Charleston, New Orleans, St. Louis and the Lakes, and hope to reach Buffalo about the 1st of May."

He adds that two of his Cabinet will probably accompany him to Buffalo.

The New Orleans Christian Advocate.

HYMENEAL:

MARRIED—By Rev. William Moores, on the 1st March, 9 o'clock, A. M., in the Methodist E. Church, in Smackover, Columbia county, Arkansas, Mr. H. T. HODWELT, of Camden, and Miss ELIAZABETH A. BONHAM, formerly of Wilcox county, Ala.

OBITUARY:

DIED—On the 24th February, Mrs. VIRGINIA BLACK, daughter of Dr. John and Lucinda Crutchfield. She was born in Fincastle, Virginia, on the 20th March, 1824; married to Lemuel Black, jun., on 1st June, 1843, in Jacksonville, Alabama.

She embraced salvation by faith at a camp meeting held in Turkey Town, Chorokee co., Alabama, in the fall of 1843, under a sermon preached by the Rev. E. Pearson, of sherished memory.

For ten years she lived a consistent and deeply pious Christian and member of the M. E. Church.

I was an inmate of the house of Brother and Sister Black for several weeks last fall; consequently am prepared to bear testimony to the deep and fervent piety of the deceased. I have often conversed with her in the family and class-room. She always gave evidence that she was fervent in spirit serving the Lord. She was one who enjoyed religion—frequently shouting-happy.

It is believed that she brought on her last illness by exposure in attending religious services at this place, (Bastrop, Texas,) during a session of the Into Conference. She died while she lived in great peace and perfect triumph. She retained her reason to the last, although too feeble to converse much, she gave satisfactory evidence, through her protracted illness, that she had the victory through Jesus—often spoke of meeting her little Edwin Walter, who preceded her only a few months, in the Kingdom of her blessed Father in Heaven.

Be comforted husband, sisters, and relations! Your loss is great; but you will not have to suffer long; while her gain is infinite, and shall be enjoyed forever. May we live and die like her!

The T. W. Banner, and the N. and L. C. Advocate please copy.

DIED—On the 6th of July, 1852, EDWIN WALTER, son of Lemuel and Virginia Black, aged two years and twenty-seven days.

DIED—On the 6th March, 1853, JOSHUA CARLE, son of W. A. and Julia Smith, aged 2 years and four months.

"Their feeble frames my power shall raise,
And mould with heavenly skill;
I'll give them tongues to sing my praise,
And hands to do my will."

THE SOLDIER'S STORY.

It was a stirring time of the Duke of Wellington's wars, after the French had retreated through Portugal, and Bedajos had fallen, and had been driven them fairly over the Spanish frontier, the light division was ordered on a few their long leagues further to occupy a line of posts among the mountains which rise over the northern banks of the Guadiana. A few companies of our regiment advanced to occupy a village which the French had just abandoned. We had a brisk march over a scorched and parched country, which had already been ransacked of all that could have supplied us with provisions; it was many days since we had had the creak of the commissary's wagon, and we had been on very short commons. There was no reason to expect much in the village we were now ordered to. The French, who had marched out, who would, of course, have helped themselves to whatever was portable, must have previously pretty well drained the place. We made a search, however, judging that, possibly, something might have been concealed from them by the peasants; and we actually soon discovered several houses where some of wine had been secreted. A soldier, sir, likes it, after hot service or fatigue, seldom thinks of much beyond the comfort of drinking across; and I freely own that our small party was caused a sad scene of confusion.

Every house and hovel was searched, and every poor fellow, who had contrived to hide the last skin of wine from his enemies, was obliged to abandon it to his allies. You might see the poor natives on all sides running away; some with a morsel of food, others with a skin of wine in their arms, and followed by the menacing and staggering etops of tho weary and half-drunken soldiers.

"Vino! vino!" was the cry in every part of the village. An English soldier, sir, may he forgiven together in a foreign land, and have a little in not knowing how to ask for any thing but liquor. I was no better than the rest.

"Vino! quiero vino!" said I, to a poor, half-starved and ragged native, who was stealing off, as if hiding some thing under his torn cloak; "Vino! you beggarly scoundrel! give me vino!" said I.

"Vino no tengo!" he cried, as he broke from my grasp, and ran quickly and fearfully away.

I was not very drunk—I had not had above half a my quantity—and I pursued him up a street. But he was the fleeter; and I should have lost him, had I not made a sudden turn and come upon him in a forsaken alley, where I surprised the poor thlug dwelt. I seized him by the collar. He was small and spare, and he had writhed under my gripe; but still he held his cloak, and only wrapped his oloak the closer round his property.

"Vino! quiero vino!" said I, "give me vino!"

"Nada, nada tengo!" he repeated.

I had already drawn my bayonet. I am ashamed, sir, to say, that we used to do that to terrify the poor wretches, and make them the sooner give us their liquor. Ae I hold him by the collar with one hand, I pointed the bayonet to his breast with tho othor, and I again cried, "Vino!"

"Vino no tengo!—nino, nino es!"—and as he spoke the words with such a look of truth and earnestness, that, had I not fancied I could trace through the folds of his oloak the very shape of a small wine-skin, I should have believed him.

"Lying rascal!" said I, "so you won't give me the liquor? Then tho dry earth shall drink it!" and I struck the point of my bayonet deep into that which he was hugging to his breast. Oh, sir, it was not wine that trioklod down—it was blood, warm blood!—and a pitcous wail burst like a chill across my heart! The poor native opened his cloak; he pointed to his wounded child; and his wild oyo asked me whether those words could have douo, "Monster! are you satisfied?"

I was sobered in a moment. I fell upon my knees beside the infant, and I tried to stauuch the blood. Yes, the poor fellow understood the deed; he saw, and ho accepted my angulsh; and he joined in our efforts so savo the little creature. Oh! it was too late!

The little boy had fastenod his emull clammy hands around a finger of each of us. He looked up alternately, and seemed to ask, aliko from a father and his murderer, that help which it was beyond the power of one of earth to give. The changes in the poor child's countenance showed that it had few minutes to live. Sometimes it lay so still I thought the last pang was over; when a slight convulsion would agitate its frame, and a momentary pressuro of its little hands would give the gasping father a short, faint ray of hope.

You may believe, sir, that an old soldier, who has only been able to keep his own life at the expense of an eye and two of his limbs, who has passed out many a weary day in a camp hospital after a hot engagement, must have learnt to look on death without any unnecessary concern. I have sometimes wished for it myself; and often felt thankful when my poor wounded comrades have been released by it from pain. I have seen it, too, in other shapes. I have seen the death-blow dealt, when its effects have been so instant that the brave heart's blood has been split, and the pulses have ceased to boat, while the streak of life and health was still fresh upon the cheek, when a smile has remained upon the lips of my brother-soldier, even after he had fallen a corpse across my path. But, oh! sir, what is all this compared with what I have suffered as I watched life ebb slowly from the wound which I myself had so wantonly inflicted in the breast of a helpless, innocent child! It was by mistake—by accident. Oh, yes! I know it, I know it well, and day and night I have striven to forget that hour. But it is of no use; the cruel recollection never leaves my mind—that piteous wail is over in my ears! The father's agony will follow me to the grave.

General Intelligence.

OPELOUSAS RAILROAD.—The track on this railroad is now laid down one mile, and the work is progressing rapidly. The laying of the rails is under the special superintendence of Mr. —— Brown, who, with commendable energy, is pushing the work to completion. The rails are laid at the rate of about six miles per month, and it is estimated that Mr. Brown's contract (fifty-one miles) will be completed in less than nine months. Our citizens will soon be enabled to enjoy the new luxury of a ride into the flowering savannas of the Opelousas. A steam car has been ordered for the road, and will be shortly put on.

CHARITY HOSPITAL REPORT.—We are indebted to Mr. H. Vanderlinden for the following report of this institution for the week ending yesterday: Admissions, 215; discharges, 205; deaths, 22; remaining, 877.

RAINS IN GEORGIA.—The Milledgeville Recorder of the 15th, says that since their last issue heavy rains have fallen, interrupting the regularity of our mail arrivals, damaging to some extent the railroads in this vicinity, and overflowing the lowlands. The railroads have been so far repaired as to admit again of regular transportation. The seasons have been alike unpropitious to the traveling public and the railroad interest, whilst the farmer and planter are greatly embarrassed in their operations by the continuance of heavy and washing rains.

HIGH WATER IN ALABAMA.—The Montgomery Journal, of Saturday last, says:

We have been visited within tha last two weeks with floods of rain, and the river and water courses generally have been very high—so much so, indeed, as to interfere very materially with travelling; but on Thursday night, to "cap the climax," there fell such a power of water as has scarcely been witnessed since Noah's time. The river, which was very full before, commenced rising, is still progressing, and there is no telling when it is going to stop. Great damage must result to the plantations on the water courses, and plantation operations be materially interfered with

FROM WASHINGTON.—Since the first day of January twenty-two thousand post-masters' accounts have been received at the General Post-office. These have been opened, the transcripts separated from the dead letters, the balances due the Department appropriately registered, and then the accounts were sent to the Clerk of the Sixth Auditor of the Treasury for examination and final settlement. This entire business will be completed before the expiration of the month.

We learn by telegraph, that the Senate, on the 17th, confirmed all the nominations which had been reported upon—one hundred in number.

Among the nominations on that day were L. P. Waldo, of Connecticut, Commissioner of Pensions, vice Heath; Col. Cook, of South Carolina, Collector of Charleston; Benjamin F Hallett, District Attorney of Massachusetts; Joel Palmer, Indian Agent in Oregon; S. B. Forney, Postmaster at Lowell, Massachusetts.

Lieut. Gardiner, to be promoted to Captain 1st Regiment of Dragoons—laid on the table by a large majority, the post being claimed by Shannberg.

The appointment of Samuel J. Bridge to be Appraiser General of Merchandise, to be employed on the Pacific Coast, was confirmed by the Senate on the 16th.

The Philadelphia U. S. Circuit Court, on Monday, the 14th, by agreement of the parties interested, made an order for the distribution of $700,000 of the proceeds of the Aspden estate among thirty-five claimants, giving to each $20,000. About $150,000 yet remain to be apportioned. On the same day Mr. John Aspden, one of the unsuccessful claimants, died suddenly.

The amount ascertained to be overdrawn from the Bank of Pennsylvania, through the negligence of one of its officers, is said to be $94 000, which will be reduced by various securities to about $40.000. The individual alleged to have overdrawn it is understood, possesses considerable means, so that nearly the whole amount may possibly be recovered

A young woman named Mary Sextus went to the Hospital on the 14th, in a state of insanity, produced, it was thought, by the use of laughing gas at a recent exhibition.

The Caloric ship Ericsson arrived on Monday, the 14th, at New York, from Aquia Creek. She is said to have worked throughout the passage with perfect regularity, and the vessel to have proved herself in every respect seaworthy. The Ericsson left Aquia Creek on Friday night. She carried at no time more than 7½ pounds steam to the square inch, which is about 3½ less than she is capable of carrying.

There have been 5308 births registered, viz: 2651 males and 2657 females: children of 1081 American fathers and 1733 American mothers, and of 3478 fathers and 3651 mothers of foreign nativity; the birth-places of 90 fathers and 72 mothers being unknown.

The intentions of marriage of 2877 couples have been entered and certificates issued, viz: 1356 male and 1347 female Americans, and 1521 males and 1530 females of foreign birth; 1680 actual marriages have been recorded, the parties being nearly the same proportion as to origin.

There have been 3736 deaths registered, viz: 1902 males and 1834 females, 1568 being of American and 2168 of foreign origin, as nearly as can be ascertained.

The NewYork Herald of the 12th contains an article on the oyster trade of NewYork, which fills some six bulky columns of that journal, and in the source of which the peculiar flavor and delicacy of the Virginia, Shrewsbury, York Bay, Blue Point Sound, Prince's Bay and other varieties are dwelt upon with uncommon piquancy and gusto. We have only space for a recapitulation:

RAILROAD SUBSCRIPTIONS, ETC.—On the third Monday in April the citizens of St. Louis county, Missouri, will be called upon to vote upon the proposition of the county negotiating a loan $200,000, to be appropriated for the improvement of the county roads; and on the fourth Monday in the same month they will have to decide whether the county of St. Louis shall subscribe for $500,000 worth of stock in the North Missouri Railroad, and for $400,000 worth in the Iron Mountain Railroad. The vote on the propositions is to be taken jointly, so that the fate of one will be that of the other. The question as to whether the county shall issue bonds for the amounts or levy a special tax upon the property-holders, will be decided the same day. In case the latter mode is adopted the tax payers will receive the scrip of the railroad companies to the amount of their tax paid.

BALTIMORE CLIPPERS.—The Boston Journal says: One of the most remarkable instances of rapid sailing, several consecutive passages, which lives in our recollection, is the case of the clipper brig John Gilpin, of Baltimore. This vessel, which seemed to have emulated the fleetness of its namesake, left Baltimore in 1852, we believe, and arrived at Batavia after a passage of eighty-two days; proceeded thence to Canton in eleven days—from Canton to Manilla in five days—from Manilla through the Straits of Sunda, round South of Holland, to latitude forty-eight or fifty degrees, to Valparaiso in eighty-five days—and from Valparaiso to Lima in six days and seventeen hours—making an aggregate distance of 34,920 miles in one hundred and thirty-nine days and seventeen hours—averaging a fraction more than one hundred and eighty-two miles per day.

THE NEW YORK CRYSTAL PALACE EXHIBITION.—Colonel Hughes, of Maryland, the representative of the American Association for the management of Crystal Palace, at New York, who is now in London, has had a long interview with Prince Albert, who, in conjunction with Her Majesty, the Queen, it is said, takes great interest in the American World's Fair. Her Majesty and Prince Albert will send over a variety of choice and valuable articles, including a bust of the Queen, to be exhibited. The Emperor of the French, the Pope and the Sultan are among the contributors. England sends 542 objects, France 320, the Zollverein 500, Holland 142, and Italy 100 statues. Col. Hughes will shortly leave London for Paris, and proceed to the several European courts upon his important mission.

It is stated in the Cape Town papers that many soldiers who have deserted from the English armies, have joined the Kaffir rabels, and are acting with them. To this cause is ascribed the improved discipline of the native troops. Though they cannot stand against a charge, yet they disperse and re-form in such a masterly manner as greatly to harass their opponents, their tactics being similar to those of the Americans in the early stages of the Revolution. A Cape Town paper, remarking upon the fact that when captured the natives are treated as rebels, says that the only way that they have been made subjects of Great Britain is by the proclamation of the authorities in London, who have issued certain pieces of parchment to that effect. The Cape papers also contain an account of the formal taking possession of the Oranga River Sovereignty by General Cathcart, at the head of two thousand English troops. It is apparent, says the Boston Traveler, that England will soon possess all the land in South Africa worth having, under the plea that it is necessary for the safety of the Colonists.

From Washington.

The Senate spent but a short time in Executive session on the 16th, and, it is understood, acted on no nomination, or none of any importance.

Mr. Mason spoke at considerable length on the Central American Treaty subject, and was followed by Mr. Clayton in reply, who had not concluded when the Senate adjourned.

The Diplomatic Corps made their formal introductory visit to President Pierce by appointment, and were individually presented by the Secretary of State. M. de Bodisco, Minister of Russia, and Doyen of the Diplomatic body, made on behalf of himself and colleagues, as we understand, a very excellent address to the President, who replied fittingly and courteously.

On the 15th Col. Benton caused letters to be laid upon the desks of the Senators, addressed by him to the people of Missouri, on the subject of a National Highway from the Mississippi river to the Pacific. It advocates the central route, for which Col. Fremont has long expressed a preference, and which has remained unnoticed for three years, while the Southern (Memphis) route has monopolized attention, and acquired an engrossing prominence."

Col Benton is in favor of making this highway on a grand scale, reserving a tract a mile wide for all sorts of roads, rail and macadamized, and a plain old English road, and two margulas one hundred feet wide for independent and rival telegraphic lines. He is opposed to making this highway by any mixture of public and private means, or by giving lands to companies; but holds that the United States should build the road and the fixtures, and let out the use of it for terms of seven or ten years to the lowest bidder. The present system of railways from the Mississippi to the Atlantic, he regards as an expanded fan, the spokes of which converge to St. Louis, the handle extending thence to San Francisco.

FURTHER FROM WASHINGTON.

RECEPTION OF THE DIPLOMATIC CORPS.—We find in the Washington Union of the 10th, the following translation of His Excellency A. de Bodisco, the Russian Minister's address, upon the occasion of the reception of the Diplomatic corps at the capitol, on the 15th inst., and also President Pierce's answer, delivered in English. The address of the Russian Minister was spoken in French. The translation is as follows:

Mr. President—The United States, in the exercise of their right to elect every fourth year the chief of the executive power, have made choice of you, Mr. President, to occupy this high and important position.

It is in the name of the ministers and the heads of legations here present that I have the honor to offer to you, Mr. President, our most cordial congratulations. We express, at the same time, our conviction that this highly flattering testimony of the confidence of the American people will induce you, Mr. President, to concentrate all your efforts to secure the progress of the incontestable prosperity of the whole Union. This prosperity is due, in a great measure, to the national energies; but it must be mainly attributed to the continuance of peace, as one of the most essential elements of the expansion of the productive capacities of all countries, and the maintenance of which contributes so efficiently to spread and extend the general welfare.

The diplomatic corps is persuaded, Mr. President, of your best dispositions towards the sovereigns and governments we have the honor to represent; and I have the advantage to assure you, Mr. President, in the name of my colleagues, that our respective governments sincerely desire the continuance of the good understanding now so happily existing.

A mutual kind feeling, frank and loyal explanations, will always tend to fortify the friendly intercourse we are called upon to entertain with the American Government and in this respect it is gratifying to me to express, in the name of the diplomatic corps, how much we appreciate the recent declaration of the President to cultivate peace and amity with all nations.

SIR—I receive with satisfaction the congratulations which, in the name of the ministers and the heads of legations here present, you do me the honor to express on occasion of my entering on the functions of President of the United States.

Gentlemen—Among the most delicate and responsible trusts thus imposed upon me by the choice of my country, I recognize the conduct of its relations with other powers.

In the discharge of this duty, I shall of course look, in the first instance, to what the interests and the honor of the United States may require, which necessarily include a strict observance of national engagements, respect for the rights of other governments, and a faithful adherence to those sacred principles of justice which are the common law of Christendom.

I cordially reciprocate, therefore, the expressions of national amity which you address to me, and request you to communicate to your respective Governments my warmest desire to maintain with each our existing relations of peace and friendship.

I beg you, also, to accept the assurance of my personal respect and esteem.

A Washington paper says that a few days ago an attempt was made to overawe the President by the appearance of an entire Congressional delegation from a large State in the West, asking an interview. The President informed them that at twelve o'clock he would be happy to meet them. They appeared at that time, and lo and behold! it was a public reception. This so shocked their sensibilities that they withdrew, saying that such treatment was unexpected, and unaccountable from a democratic President.

An interesting incident is mentioned in a communication in the National Intelligencer of the 15th. On the 10th inst. the Missourians at the capital paid a visit to the President, and were introduced by their talented Representative, Major John S. Phelps.

Each one was introduced by name. When Major N. B. Holden, formerly of the 12th Infantry, and now of Johnston county, Missouri, was presented, the President exclaimed, "Major Holden! God bless you Holden! a braver man never trod shoe leather. Holden, we were in a narrow road when we were last together. Come and see me, Holden; don't leave the city without coming to see me."

The Major, being a modest man, was overwhelmed by such a handsome compliment; tears stood in his eyes. The commendation was well deserved, for no braver man than Holden ever did live.

The President alluded to the notion at the National Bridge in Mexico, which has very aptly been compared with Napoleon's passage of the Bridge of Lodi.

Mrs. Pierce still remains at the Eutaw House, in Baltimore, and, though in tolerable health, is much depressed in spirits by the calamity that has lately befallen her.

THEFT IN THE GRAVEYARD.—We understand that the paltry theft of a marble slab from a tomb has been committed in our cemetery. Surely, the fellow who would commit such an act has but little fear of earth, and less of heaven. If he has any particle of the conscience which his mother bequeathed him, he ought to return it at once. [Pisquemine Sentinel.

This reminds us of the story of a baker in England who stole a tomb-stone for the hearth of his oven. One of his customers, finding Death's head on his loaf of bread, ran in dismay to his Deacon, fearing the end of the world was approaching. The letter was in equal trepidation, when, on examining his own loaf, he found the marrow-bones. In their alarm they had recourse to the parson, who could afford them no consolation, inasmuch as "Resurgam," was legibly set forth in bold relief upon his own loaf.

SOUTH CAROLINA ELECTION.—The following gentlemen, all democrats, have been elected to Congress from South Carolina: First District, Hon. John McQueen; Second District, Hon. Wm. Aiken; Third District, Hon. W. F. Colcock; Fourth District, Hon. P. S. Brooks; Fifth District, Hon. J. L. Orr; Sixth District, Hon. W. W. Boyce.

There was no contest save in the Fourth District, in which the vote stood, Brooks 2,008, Pickins 1,402, Sullivan 1,474, and Marshall 1,416; and in the Sixth District, in which the vote stood, Boyce 2,549, Mosea 2,276, and O'Hanlon 180.

GERMAN EMIGRATION.—At a recent meeting of the German Philanthropic Society, of St. Louis, it was shown that the total number of German emigrants who arrived in that city during the year ending March 1, was 23,088—of whom 10,004 arrived by way of NewOrleans, and 7,085 by way of NewYork and other eastern cities.

During the year, 2,211 emigrants have been furnished with employment, 264 have been sent to the hospital, 143 have been buried by the Society, 18 have been sent to the county farm, and 21 orphans have been provided for. Aid amounting in all to $512 05 has been extended to 215 persons.

We subjoin the German emigration to that city during the last five years:

Year ending March, 1849, 9,000; do. March, 1850, 14,493; do. March, 1851, 10,715; do. March, 1852, 12,024; do. March 1853, 23,088. Total in five years, 69,830.

CHARLESTOWN (MASS.) STATE PRISON.—The earnings of the prisoners for the eight months ending September 30, 1852, was $6921 47 over the expenses. Of the inmates 313 are Americans, 176 foreigners. The whip making business has been introduced into the prison, in which forty-five men are employed at 50 cents per day.

SALARIES.—At the late session of Congress, the salary of the Vice President was raised from $5,000 to $8,000; that of the Attorney General from $4,000 to $8,000, and that of the other Cabinet officers from $6,000 to $8,000. The four ministers to Great Britain, France, Russia and Spain, from $9,000 to $15,000. An Assistant Secretary of State is appointed, at a salary of $3,000. A full mission to Central America has been authorized. The salary of Prof. Bache, of the coast surrey, was raised to $6,000, at the late session of Congress; that of Sub-Treasurer at NewYork to $6,000; the Commissioner to the Sandwich Islands to $5,000; the Chinese Commissioner $9,000, besides $9,000 outfit; the Consul General to Alexandria (Egypt) to $5,002; the Clerk of the Legislation at London is to receive $800.

DISTANCE TO THE SUN.—Imagine a railway from here to the Sun. How many miles is the sun from us? Why, if we were to send a baby in an express-train, going incessantly a hundred miles an hour, without making any stoppages, the baby would grow to be a boy—the boy would grow to be a man—the man would grow old and die—without seeing the Sun; for it is distant more than a hundred years from us. But what is this compared to Neptune's distance? Had Adam and Eve started by our railway to go from Neptune to the Sun, at the rate of fifty miles an hour, they would not have got there yet; for Neptune is more than six thousand years from the centre of our system. [Household Words.

TORNADOES.—On the 30th of November, 1852, Edward Everett, Secretary of State, on the part of the United States, and Frederick Von Hergolt, Prussian Minister at Washington, concluded an additional article to the convention for the mutual delivery of criminals, etc.; which recites that, whereas it may not be practicable for the ratifications of the convention for the mutual delivery of criminals, fugitives from justice in certain cases, between the United States and Prussia, and other States of the Germanic Confederation, signed at Washington on the 16th day of June, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-two, to be exchanged within the time stipulated in said Convention, therefore, the time stipulated in said convention shall be exchanged at Washington, within one year from the date of this agreement, or sooner, should it be possible.

A treaty has been concluded at Washington, between the United States and Belgium, for regulating the right of inheriting and acquiring property. The treaty provides that Belgian subjects shall enjoy throughout the United States the right of acquiring and transmitting property, with or without a will, on the same conditions as citizens of the United States. In like manner, citizens of the United States shall enjoy in Belgium the right of acquiring and transmitting property, with or without a will, on the same conditions as Belgian subjects.

COL. BENTON AND THE PACIFIC RAILROAD.—The Washington correspondent of the Charleston Courier, writing under date of the 12th, says that Col. Benton is to come out with a pamphlet on Monday, on the subject of a railroad to the Pacific. He adheres to his old plan—the northern route—which, if practicable at all, will cost three hundred millions. Meanwhile, a private company, organized in NewYork, will commence on their own account, a railroad from the Bay of Matagorda to El Paso, and thence to San Diego. Their route is 1256 miles—Colonel Benton's is 2500 miles. Their road will cost thirty-eight millions—Col. Benton's will cost two hundred millions—but they assume its cost in their estimates, at one hundred and twenty-five millions. Upon an equal amount of business their road will pay twenty dollars for one dollar that Col. Benton's road will pay.

The Courier's correspondent further adds that the country will be surprised at the magnitude and boldness of the NewYork enterprise. But from the manner in which they have taken it up, they will carry it through.

The scheme embraces a branch railroad to Arkansas, at the point where it will meet the road designed, and for which Congress has provided, by a liberal grant to that State, from a point opposite the mouth of the Ohio, and another branch to a point opposite Memphis. The whole system of northern, southern and western railroads, tends to Memphis, as a central point.

The northern and eastern capitalists were bent, originally, upon Col. Benton's, or some other northern route to the Pacific. But they have come, reluctantly, to consider the southern route as the best, for the commerce of the country.

ACTION NON FOR SEAMEN.—In the Naval Appropriation bill, recently passed, is the following amendments, which seem to have escaped the publicity so important a matter deserves; it being a just reward to the brave seamen who served in the Mexican War on the Californle coast. [N. Y. Sun, 11th inst.:

"And the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby authorized and directed to allow and pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the officers, petty officers, and seamen of the United States Navy, to officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians and privates of the Marine Corps, and to the officers and men of the Revenue Service who served in the Pacific Ocean, on the coast of California and Mexico, during the late war with Mexico, and since the conclusion of the war up to the twenty-eighth of September, eighteen hundred and fifty, the same additional compensation as has been by law directed to be paid to the officers and soldiers of the Army who served in California; and that this provision allowing extra pay, as well as that contained in the Navy appropriation act of August thirty-first, eighteen hundred and fifty-two, shall extend to and include all naval store-keepers who were stationed on the Pacific coast; and the additional compensation authorized by the foregoing provision, and by the Navy appropriation act of eighteen hundred and fifty-two, shall be paid to the legal representatives of all deceased persons who would have been entitled to receive the same if living."

FINANCIAL CONDITION OF ST. LOUIS.—The total expenditures of the city of St. Louis, including subscriptions to Railroads and for all other purposes, for the year ending March 1, 1853, was $943,187 07. The debt of the city at present is $2,304,000, bearing an interest of 116,343 76 about $70,000 of it at 10 per cent., and the remainder at 6 per cent., excepting $25,000 at 5 per cent.

Of this debt, $1,568,000 has been incurred since May, 1850; of which $738,000 has been contracted since the 10th of April last. Of the bonds sold last year, 208 negotiated during the first five months brought 95 cents to the dollar, and 216 disposed of since then brought 97 cents.

The one million five hundred and sixty-eight thousand debt, incurred as above stated, has been for moneys borrowed, chiefly for expenditures on the objects mentioned below:

Railroads, $500,000; Sewers, $316,000; Harbor Improvements, $150,000; Streets in Old Limits, $105,000; City Hall and Market, $122,000; Water-works Extension, $80,000.

NAVAL.—The following is the state of affairs at the Brooklyn Navy Yard: The Independence is the only vessel now undergoing repairs at the Navy Yard, and the eleven hundred mechanics employed there are fearful of dull times this summer. The Macedonian, which is destined for the China Seas, under the command of Joel Abbott, has all her stores on board, but requires ninety more men to make her complement. The storeship Lexington was last Friday ordered to prepare for carrying out supplies to the Pacific squadron. The steamer John Hancock is expected at the Yard in a few days. The storeship Relief, from the Brazil station, is daily expected. There are three hundred and fifty recruits on board the North Carolina. Government is about building a steam saw mill near the Dry-dock, and piles are being driven in the low ground for the foundation. It will be sixty-five feet long, and is calculated to saw timber for the various purposes of the yard.

SPIRITUAL RAPPINGS.—Professor Anderson, who has been for some time past performing to large audiences in Richmond, has been exposing the "Spiritual Rapping" humb

THE BALANCE LOST.

BY NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE.

Bartram, the lime-burner, a rough and heavy-looking man, begrimed with charcoal, sat watching his kiln, at nightfall, while his little son played at building houses with the scattered fragments of marble, whose, on the hill-side below them, they heard a roar of laughter, not mirthful, but slow, and even solemn, like a wind shaking the boughs of the forest.

"Father, what is that?" asked the little boy, leaving his play, and pressing betwixt his father's knees.

"Oh, some revellor, I suppose," answered the lime-burner; "some merry fellow from the barroom in the village, who dared not laugh loud enough within doors, lest he should blow the roof of the house off. So, here he is, shaking his jolly sides at the foot of Graylock."

"But, father," said the child, more sensitive than the obtuse, middle-aged clown, "he does not laugh like a man that is glad; so the noise frightens me!"

"Pooh, boy! you're a fool, child!" cried the father, gruffly; "you will never make a man, I do believe, if there is too much of your mother in you. I have known the rustling of a leaf to startle her. Hark; here comes that merry fellow now. You shall see that there is no harm in him."

Bartram and his little son, while they were talking thus, sat watching the lime-kiln. It was a rude, round, tower-like structure, about twenty feet high, heavily built of rough stones, and with a hillock of earth heaped about the larger part of its circumference, so that the blocks and fragments of marble might be drawn by cart-loads and thrown in at the top. There was an opening at the bottom of the tower, like an oven-mouth, but large enough to admit a man in a stooping posture, and provided with a massive iron door. With the smoke and jets of flame issuing from the chinks and crevices of this door, which seemed to give admittance into the hill-side, it resembled nothing so much as the private entrance to the infernal regions, which the shepherds of the Delectable Mountains were accustomed to show to pilgrims.

There are many such lime-kilns in that tract of country, for the purpose of burning the white marble which composes a large part of the substance of the hills. Some of them, built years ago, and long deserted, with weeds growing in the vacant ground of the interior, which is open to the sky, and grass and wild flowers rooting themselves into the chinks of the stones, look already like relics of antiquity, and may yet be overgrown with the lichens of centuries to come. Others, where the lime-burner still feeds his daily and nightlong fire, afford points of interest to the wanderer among the hills, who seats himself on a log of wood or a fragment of marble, to hold a chat with the solitary man. It is a long time, and, when the character is inclined to be rough, may be an intensely thoughtful one, as it proved in the case of Ethan Brand, who had mused to strange purpose, in days gone by, while the fire in this very kiln was burning.

Bartram who now watched the fire was of a different order, and troubled himself with no thoughts save the very few that were requisite to his business. At frequent intervals he flung open the iron door, and, with the strength of his whole body, seized a wheelbarrow-full of fuel, and dundered it into the raging furnace. Then, with his face aglow with the reflection, he closed the door, and drew back the shutter of the iron eye, that he might see how the fire worked within. Sometimes he thrust in huge logs of oak, or stirred the immense mass of burning coals with a long pole. Within the furnace were seen the curling and riotous flames, and the glowing marble, almost molten with the intensity of the heat; while without, the reflection of the fire quivered on the dark intricacy of the surrounding forest, and showed in the foreground a bright and ruddy little picture of the hut, the spring beside its door, the athletic and coal-begrimed figure of the lime-burner, and the half-frightened child, shrinking into the protection of his father's shadow. And when again the iron door was closed, then re-appeared the tender light of the half-full moon, which only strove to trace out the indistinct shapes of the neighboring mountains; and, in the upper sky, there was a flitting congregation of clouds, still faintly tinged with the rosy sunset, though that far down into the valley the sunshine had vanished long and long ago.

The little boy now crept still closer to his father, as footsteps were heard ascending the hill-side, and a human form thrust aside the bushes that clustered beneath the trees.

"Hallo! who is it?" cried the lime-burner, vexed at his son's timidity, yet half infected by it. "Come forward and show yourself like a man, or I'll fling this chunk of marble at your head!"

"You offer me a rough welcome," said a strange voice, as the unknown man drew nigh; "yet I neither claim nor desire a kinder one, even at my own fireside."

To obtain a distincter view, Bartram threw open the iron door of the kiln, whence immediately issued a gush of fierce light that smote full upon the stranger's face and figure. To a careless eye there appeared nothing very remarkable in his aspect, which was that of a man in coarse, brown, country-made suit of clothes, tall and thin, with the staff and heavy shoes of a wayfarer. As he advanced he fixed his eyes—which were very bright—intently upon the brightness of the furnace, as if he beheld, or expected to behold, some object worthy of note within it.

"Good-evening, stranger," said the lime-burner; "whence come you so late in the day?"

"I come from my search," answered the wayfarer, "for, at last, it is finished."

"Drunk or crazy!" muttered Bartram to himself. "I shall have trouble with the fellow. The sooner I drive him away the better."

The little boy, all in a tremble, whispered to his father, and begged him to shut the door of the kiln, so that there might not be so much light, for that there was something in the man's face which he was afraid to look at, yet could not look away from. And, indeed, even the lime-burner's dull and torpid sense began to be impressed with an indescribable something in that wide, rugged, thoughtful visage, with the grizzled hair hanging wildly about it, and those deeply-sunken eyes, which gleamed like fire within the entrance of a mysterious cavern. But, as he closed the door, the stranger turned towards him, and spoke in a quiet, familiar way, that made Bartram feel as if he were a sane and sensible man after all.

"Your task draws to an end, I see," said he. "The marble has already been burning three days. A few hours more will convert the stone to lime."

"Why, who are you?" exclaimed the limeburner. "You seem as well acquainted with my business as I am myself."

"And well I may be," said the stranger; "for I followed the same craft many a long year, and here, too, on this very spot. But you are a new comer in these parts. Did you ever hear of Ethan Brand?"

"The man that went in search of the Unpardonable Sin?" asked Bartram with a laugh.

"The same," answered the stranger. "He has found what he sought, and therefore he comes back again."

"What! Ethan! are you Ethan Brand himself?" cried the lime-burner, in amazement. "I am a new comer here, as you say, and they call me eighteen years since you left the foot of Graylock. But, I can tell you, the good folks still talk about Ethan Brand in the village yonder, and what a strange errand took him away from his lime-kiln. Well, and so you have found the Unpardonable Sin?"

"Even so," said the stranger calmly.

"If the question is a fair one," proceeded Bartram, "where might it be?"

"Here," replied he.

And then, without mirth in his countenance, but still moved by an involuntary recognition of the infinite absurdity of seeking throughout the world for what was the closest of all things to himself, and looking into every heart, save his own, for what was hidden in no other breast, he broke into a laugh of scorn. It was the same slow heavy laugh that had almost appalled the lime-burner when it heralded the wayfarer's approach.

The solitary mountain-side was made dismal by it. Laughter, when out of place, mistimed, or bursting forth from a disordered state of feeling, may be the most terrible modulation of the human voice. The laughter of one asleep, even if it be a little child; the madman's laugh, or the wild screaming laugh of an idiot, are sounds we sometimes tremble to hear, and would fain forget. Poets have imagined something of fiends or hobgoblins so fearfully impressed as a laugh. And even the obtuse Bartram felt his nerves shaken as this strange sound issued inward at his own heart, and burst forth, that rolled away in the night, and reverberated among the hills. [illegible] he to his little son, "stranger down to the tavern in the village, and tell the jolly fellows there that Ethan Brand has come back, and that he has found the Unpardonable Sin!"

The boy darted away on his errand, to which Ethan Brand made no objection, nor seemed hardly to notice it. He sat on a log of wood, looking steadfastly at the iron door of the kiln. When the child was out of sight, and the swift and light footstep ceased to be heard treading first on the fallen leaves and then on the rocky mountain path, the lime-burner began to regret his departure. He felt that the little fellow's presence had been a barrier between his guest and himself, and that he must now deal, heart to heart, with a man who, on his own confession, had committed the only one crime for which heaven could afford no mercy. That crime, in its indistinct blackness, seemed to overshadow him. The lime-burner's own sins rose up within him, and made his memory monstrous with a throng of evil shapes that asserted their kindred with the master sin, whatever it might be, which it was within the scope of man's corrupted nature to conceive and cherish. They were all of one family; they went to and fro between his breast and Ethan Brand's, and carried dark greetings from one to the other.

Then Bartram remembered the stories which had grown traditionary in reference to this strange man, who had come upon him like a shadow of the night, and was making himself at home in his old place, after so long absence that the dead people, dead and buried for years, would have had more right to be at home in any familiar spot than he. Ethan Brand, it was said, had conversed with Satan himself in the lurid blaze of this very kiln. The legend had been a matter of mirth heretofore, but looked grisly now. According to this tale, before Ethan had departed on his search, he had been accustomed to evoke a fiend from the hot furnace of the lime-kiln, night after night, in order to confer with him about the Unpardonable Sin; the man and the fiend, each laboring to frame the image of some mode of guilt which could neither be atoned for nor forgiven. And, with the first gleam of light upon the mountain-top, the fiend crept in at the iron door, there to abide the intensest element of fire, until again summoned forth to share in the dreadful task of extending man's possible guilt beyond the scope of Heaven's else infinite mercy.

While the lime-burner was struggling with the horrors of these thoughts, Ethan Brand rose from the log and flung open the door of the kiln. The action was in such accordance with the idea in Bartram's mind that he almost expected to see the evil one issue forth red-hot from the raging furnace.

"Hold, hold!" cried he, with a tremulous attempt to laugh, for he was ashamed of his fears, although they overmastered him. "Don't, for mercy's sake, bring out your devil now!"

"Man!" sternly replied Ethan Brand, "what need have I of the devil? I have left him far behind me on my track. It is with such half-way sinners as you that he busies himself. Fear not because I open the door. I do but rest by old custom, and am going to trim your fire like a lime-burner, as I was once.

He stirred the vast coals, thrust in more wood, and bent forward to gaze into the hollow prison-house of fire, regardless of the fierce glow that reddened upon his face. The lime-burner sat watching him, and half suspected his strange guest of a purpose, if not to evoke a fiend, at least to plunge bodily into the flames, and thus vanish from the sight of man. Ethan Brand, however, drew quietly back, and closed the door of the kiln.

"I have looked," said he, "into many a human heart that was seven times hotter with sinful passion than your furnace is with fire. But I found not there what I sought. No, not the Unpardonable Sin!"

"What is the Unpardonable Sin?" asked the lime-burner, and then he shrunk further from his companion, trembling lest his question should be answered.

"It is a sin that grew within my own breast," replied Ethan Brand, standing erect, with a pride that distinguishes all enthusiasts of his stamp; "a sin that grew no where else! The sin of an intellect that trimmphed over the sense of brotherhood with man and reverence for God, and sacrificed every thing to its own mighty claims! The only sin that deserves a recompense of immortal agony! Freely, were it to do again, would I incur the guilt. Unshrinkingly I accept the retribution!"

"The man's head is turned," muttered the lime-burner to himself. "He may be a sinner like the rest of us, nothing more likely, but I'll be sworn he's a madman too."

Nevertheless, he felt very uncomfortable at his situation, alone with Ethan Brand on the wild mountain side, and was right glad to hear the rough murmur of tongues, and footsteps of what seemed a pretty numerous party stumbling over the stones and rustling through the undershrub. Soon appeared the whole lazy regiment that was wont to invest the village tavern, comprehending three or four individuals who had drank flip beside the bar-room fire through all the winters, and smoked their pipes beneath the stoop through all the summers, since Ethan Brand's departure. Laughing boisterously, and mingling all their voices together in unceremonious talk, they now burst into the moonshine and narrow streaks of fire-light that illuminated the open space before the lime-kiln. Bartram set the door ajar again, flooding the spot with light, that the whole company might get a fair view of Ethan Brand, and him of them.

There, among other old acquaintances, was a once ubiquitous man, now almost extinct, but whom we were formerly sure to encounter at the hotel of every thriving village throughout the country. It was the stage agent. The present specimen of the genus was a wilted and smoke-dried man, wrinkled and red-nosed, in a smartly-cut brown bob-tail coat, with brass buttons, who, for a length of time unknown, had kept his desk and corner in the bar-room, and was still puffing what seemed to be the same cigar that he had lighted twenty years ago. He had great fame as a dry joker, though, perhaps, less on account of any intrinsic humor, than from a certain flavor of brandy-toddy and tobacco smoke, which impregnated all his ideas and expressions, as well as his person.

Another well remembered, though strangely altered face, was that of Lawyer Giles, as people still called him in courtesy—an elderly ragamuffin, in his soiled shirt-sleeves and towlinen trousers. The poor fellow had been attorney in what he called his better days—a sharp practitioner, and in great vogue among the village litigants; but flip, and sling, and toddy, and cock-tails imbibed at all hours—morning, noon and night—had caused him to slide from intellectual to various kinds and degrees of bodily labor, till at last, to adopt his own phrase, he slid into a soap-vat. In other words, Giles was now a soap boiler in a small way. He had come to be but the fragment of a human being—a part of one foot having been chopped off by an axe, and an entire hand torn away by the devilish grip of a steam engine. Yet, though the corporeal hand was gone, a spiritual member remained; for stretching forth the stump, Giles steadfastly averred that he felt an invisible thumb and fingers with as vivid a sensation as before the real ones were amputated. A maimed and miserable wretch he was; but one nevertheless whom the world could not trample, and had no right to scorn, either in this or any proviene stage of his misfortunes, since he had still kept up the courage and spirit of a man, asked nothing in charity, and with his one hand—and that the left one—sought a stern battle against want and hostile circumstances.

Among the throng, too, came another personage, who, with certain points of similarity to Lawyer Giles, had many more of difference. It was the village doctor, a man of some fifty years, whom, at an earlier period of his life, we should have introduced as paying a professional visit to Ethan Brand during the latter's supposed insanity. He was now a purple visaged, rude and brutal, yet half gentlemanly figure, with something wild, ruined, and desperate in his talk, and in all the details of his gesture and manners. Brandy possessed this man like an evil spirit, and made him as surly and savage as a wild beast, and as miserable as a lost soul; but there was supposed to be in him such wonderful skill, such native gifts of healing, beyond any which medical science could impart, that society caught hold of him, and would not let him sink out of its reach. So, swaying to and fro upon his horse, and grumbling thick accents at the bedside, he visited all the sick chambers for miles about among the mountain towns, and sometimes raised a dying man, as it were, by a miracle, or quite as often, no doubt, sent his patient to a grave that was dug many a year too soon. The doctor had an everlasting pipe in his mouth; and, as somebody said, in allusion to his habit of swearing, it was always alight with hell fire.

These three worthies pressed forward, and greeted Ethan Brand each after his own fashion, earnestly inviting him to partake of the contents of a certain black bottle, in which, as they averred, he would find something far better worth seeking for than the Unpardonable Sin. No mind which has wrought itself by intense and solitary meditation into a high state of enthusiasm, can endure this kind of contact with low and vulgar modes of thought and feeling to which Ethan Brand was now subjected. It made him doubt, and, strange to say, it was a painful doubt, whether he had indeed found the Unpardonable Sin, and found it within himself. Unpardonable Sin, and found it within himself. The whole question on which he had exhausted life, and more than life, looked like a delusion.

"Leave me," he said, bitterly, "ye brute beasts, that have made yourselves so, shrivelling up your souls with fiery liquors! I have done with you. Years and years ago I groped into your hearts and found nothing there for my purpose. Get ye gone!"

"Why, you unciv[illegible] scoundrel," cried the fierce doctor, "is that the way you respond to the kindness of your best friends? Then let me tell you the truth. You have no more found the Unpardonable Sin than yonder hoy Joe has. Unpardonable Sin than yonder hoy Joe has. Unpardonable Sin, indeed! You're a crazy fellow. I told you so twenty years ago; neither better nor worse than a crazy fellow, and the fit companion of old Humphrey, here."

He pointed to an old man, shabbily dressed, with long white hair, thin visage, and unsteady eyes. For some years past this aged person had been wandering about among the hills, inquiring of all travelers whom he met for his daughter. The girl, it seemed, had gone off with a company of circus performers, and occasionally tidings of her came to the village, and fine stories were told of her glittering appearance as she rode on horseback in the ring, or performed marvellous feats on the tight-rope.

The white-haired father now approached Ethan Brand, and gazed unsteadily into his face.

"They tell me you have been all over the earth," said he, wringing his hands with earnestness. "You must have seen my daughter, for she makes a grand figure in the world, and every body goes to see her. Did she send any word to her old father, or say when she is coming back?"

Ethan Brand's eye quailed beneath the old man's. That daughter, from whom he so earnestly desired a word of greeting, Ethan Brand had made the subject of a psychological experiment, and wasted, absorbed, and perhaps annihilated her soul in the process.

"Yes," murmured he, turning away from the hoary wanderer, "it is no delusion. There is an Unpardonable Sin!"

While these things were passing, a merry scene was going forward in the area of cheerful light, beside the spring, and before the door of the hut.

A number of the youth of the village, young men and girls, had hurried up the hill side, impelled by curiosity to see Ethan Brand, the hero of so many a legend familiar to their childhood. Finding nothing, however, very remarkable in his aspect—nothing but a sunburnt wayfarer, in plain garb and dusty shoes, who sat looking into the fire, as if he fancied pictures among the coals, these young people speedily grew tired of observing him. As it happened, there was other amusement at hand. An old German Jew, traveling with a diorama on his back, was passing down the mountain road toward the village just as the party turned aside from it; and, in the hopes of eking out the profits of the day, the showman had kept them company to the lime-kiln.

The Jew's exhibition had scarcely concluded, when a great elderly dog—who seemed to be his own master, as no person in the company laid claim to him—saw fit to render himself the object of public notice. Hitherto he had shown himself as a very quiet, well-disposed old dog, going round from one to another, and, by way of being sociable, offering his rough head to be patted by any kindly hand that would take so much trouble. But now, all of a sudden, this grave and venerable quadruped, of his own mere motion, and without the slightest suggestion from any body else, began to run round after his tail, which, to heighten the absurdity of the scene, was a great deal shorter than it should have been. Never was seen such headlong eagerness in pursuit of an object that could not possibly be attained; never was heard such a tremendous outbreak of growling, snarling, barking and snapping, as if one end of the ridiculous brute's body were at deadly and most unforgivable enmity with the other. Faster and faster round about went the one; and faster and still faster fled the unapproachable brevity of his tail, and louder and fiercer grew his yells of rage and animosity, until, utterly exhausted, and as far from the goal as ever, the foolish old dog ceased his performance as suddenly as he had begun it. The next moment he was as quiet, mild, sensible and respectable in his deportment as when he first scraped acquaintance with the company.

As may be supposed, the exhibition was greeted with universal laughter, clapping of hands, and shouts of "Encore!" to which the canine performer responded by wagging all that there was to wag of his tail, but appeared totally unable to repeat his very successful effort to amuse the spectators.

Meanwhile, Ethan Brand had resumed his seat upon the log, and moved, it might be, by a perception of some remote analogy between his own case and that of this self-pursuing cur, he broke into the awful laugh which, more than any other token, expressed the condition of his inward being. And at that moment the merriment of the party was at an end; they stood about, dreading lest the inauspicious sound should be reverberated around the horizon, and that mountain would thunder it to mountain, and so the sound be prolonged upon their ears. Then, whispering to one another that it was late; that the moon was almost down; that the August night was growing chill, they hurried homewards, leaving the lime-burner and little Joe to deal as they might with their unwelcome guest. Save for these three human beings, the open space on the hill-side was a solitude, set in a vast gloom of forest. Beyond that darksome verge, the fire-lights glimmered on the stately trunks and almost black foliage of pines, intermixed with the lighter verdure of sapling oaks, maples and poplars, while here and there lay the gigantic corpses of trees, decaying on the leaf-strown soil. And it seemed to little Joe—a timorous and imaginative child—that the silent forest was holding its breath until some fearful thing should happen.

Ethan Brand thrust more wood into the fire, and closed the door of the kiln; then looking over his shoulder at the lime-burner and his son, he bade, rather than advised, them to retire to rest.

"For myself, I cannot sleep," said he; "I have matters that it concerns me to meditate upon. I will watch the fire, as I used to do in the old time."

"And call the devil out of the furnace to keep you company, I suppose," muttered Bartram, who had been making intimate acquaintance with the black bottle above-mentioned. "But watch if you like, and call as many devils as you like! For my part, I shall be all the better for a snooze. Come, Joe!"

As the boy followed his father into the hut, he looked back at the wayfarer, and tears came into his eyes, for his tender spirit had an intuition of the bleak and terrible loneliness in which this man had enveloped himself.

When they were gone, Ethan Brand sat listening to the crackling of the kindled wood, and looking at the spirits of fire that issued through the chinks of the door. These trifles, however, once so familiar, had but the slightest hold of his attention, while deep within his mind he was reviewing the gradual but marvelous change that had been wrought upon him by the search to which he had devoted himself. He remembered how the night dew had fallen upon him; how the dark forest had whispered to him; how the stars had gleamed upon him; a simple and loving man, watching his fire in the years gone by, and even mueing o'e it burned. He remembered with what tenderness, with what love and sympathy for mankind, and what pity for human guilt and woe, he had first begun to contemplate those ideas which afterwards became the inspiration of his life; with what reverence he had then looked into the heart of man, viewing it as a temple originally divine, and, however desecrated, still to be held sacred by a brother; with what awful fear he had deprecated his pursuit, and prayed that the Unpardonable Sin might never be revealed to him. Then ensued that vast intellectual development, which, in its progress, disturbed the counterpoise between his mind and heart. The idea that possessed his life had operated as a means of education; it had raised him from the level of an unlettered laborer to stand on a star-light eminence, whither the philosophers of the earth, talen with the lore of universities, might vainly strive to clamber after him. So much for the intellect! But where was the heart? That, indeed, had withered, had contracted, had hardened, had perished! It had ceased to partake of the universal throb. He had lost hold of the magnetic chain of humanity. He was no longer a brother man, opening the chambers of the dungeons of our common nature by the key of holy sympathy, which gave him a right to share in all its secrets; he was now a cold observer, looking on mankind as the subject of his experiment, and, at length converting man and woman to be his puppets, and pulling the wires that moved them to such degrees of crime as were demanded for his study.

Thus Ethan Brand became a fiend. He began to be so from the moment that his moral nature had ceased to keep the pace of improvement with his intellect. And now, as his highest effort, and inevitable development—as the bright and gorgeous flower, and rich, delicious fruit of his life's labor—he had Unpardonable Sin!

"What more have I to seek? What more to achieve?" said Ethan Brand to himself. "My task is done, and well done!"

Starting from the log with a certain alacrity in his gait, and ascending the hillock of earth that was raised against the stone circumference of the lime-kiln, he thus reached the top of the structure. It was a space of perhaps ten feet across, from edge to edge, presenting a view of the upper surface of the immense mass of broken marble with which the kiln was heaped. All these innumerable blocks and fragments of marble were red-hot and vividly on fire, sending up great spouts of blue flame, which quivered aloft and danced madly, as within a magic circle, and sank and rose again, with continual and multitudinous activity. As the lonely man bent forward over the terrible body of fire, the blasting heat smote up against his person with a breath that, it might be supposed, would have scorched and shrivelled him up in a moment.

Ethan Brand stood erect, and raised his arms on high. The blue flames played upon his face, and imparted the wild and ghastly light which alone could have suited his expression; it was that of a fiend on the verge of plunging into his gulf of intensest torment.

"O, Mother Earth," cried he, "who art no more my mother, and into whose bosom this frame shall never be resolved? O, mankind, whose brotherhood I have cast off and trampled thy great heart beneath my feet! O, stars of heaven, that shone on me of old, as if to light me onward and upward! Farewell all, and forever! Come, deadly element of fire, henceforth my familiar friend! Embrace me as I do thee!"

That night the sound of a fearful peal of laughter rolled heavily through the sleep of the lime-burner and his little son; dim shapes of horror and anguish haunted their dreams, and seemed still present in the rude hovel when they opened their eyes to the daylight.

"Up, boy, up!" cried the lime-burner, staring about him. "Think Heaven, the night is gone at last; and rather than pass another such, I would watch my lime-kiln, wide awake, for a twelvemonth. This Ethan Brand, with his humbug of an Unpardonable Sin, has done me no such mighty favor in taking my place!"

He issued from the hut, followed by little Joe, who kept fast hold of his father's hand. The early sunshine was already pouring its gold upon the mountain tops, and though the valleys were still in shadow, they smiled cheerfully in the promise of the bright day that was hastening onward. The village, completely shut in by hills, which swelled away gently about it, looked as if it had rested peacefully in the hollow of the great hand of Providence. Each dwelling was distinctly visible; the little spires of the two churches pointed upward, and caught a fore-glimmering of brightness from the sun-gilt skies upon their weather-cocks. The tavern was astir, and the figure of the old smoke-dried stage agent, cigar in mouth, was seen beneath the stoop. Old Graylock was glorified with a golden cloud upon his head. Scattered likewise upon the breasts of the surrounding mountains there were heaps of hoary mist, in fantastic shapes, some of them far down into the valley, others high up toward the summits, and still others of the same family of mist and clouds, hovering in the gold radiance of the upper atmosphere. Stepping from one to another of the clouds that rested on the hills, and thence to the loftier brotherhood that sailed in the air, it seemed almost as if a mortal man might thus ascend into the heavenly regions. Earth was so mingled with sky that it was a day-dream to look at it.

To supply that charm of the familiar and homely which nature so readily adopts into a scene, like this, the stage-coach was rattling down the mountain road, and the driver sounded his horn, while echo caught up the notes and intertwined them into a rich and varied and elaborate harmony, of which the original performer could lay claim to little share. The great hills played a concert among themselves, each contributing a strain of airy sweetness.

"Dear father," cried he, skipping cheerily to and fro, "that strange man is gone, and the sky and the mountains all seem glad of it!"

"Yes," growled the lime-burner, with an oath, "but he has let the fire go down, and no thanks to him, if five hundred bushels of lime are not spoilt. If I catch the fellow hereabouts again, I shall feel like tossing him into the furnace!"

With his long pole in his hand, he ascended to the top of the kiln. After a moment's pause, he called to his son:

"Come up here, Joe!" said he.

So little Joe ran up the hillock and stood by his father's side. The marble was burnt into perfect, snow-white lime. But, on its surface, in the midst of the circle—snow-white too, and thoroughly converted into lime—lay a human skeleton, in the attitude of a person who, after long toil, lies down to a long repose. Within the ribs—strange to say—was the shape of a human heart.

"Was the fellow's heart made of marble?" cried Bartram, in some perplexity at this phenomenon. "At any rate, it is burnt into what looks like special good lime; and, taking all the bones together, my kiln is half a bushel the richer by him."

So saying, the rude lime-burner lifted his pole and letting it fall upon the skeleton, the relics of Ethan Brand were crumbled into fragments.

A PET FISH.—Mr. J. G. Phinney, at the dye-house, in this city, has a large water tank of the capacity of several hogsheads, from which he procures a supply of pure water for use in his business. About six years since, he obtained and placed in the tank a brook trout, of a few inches in length, and has since fed it regularly with scraps of meat until it has attained a weight of six pounds, and a length of some eighteen inches. The tank is fed by a spring, and the overflow carried off by a pipe, so that the supply of water is constant, cool and pure, and Sir Trout lives and enjoys life like a philosopher—another Diogenes in his tub. This fish, although approached by its owner, and always coming at his call, is shy in the presence of strangers, and when he sees only strange faces above him, usually retires to the bottom of the tub. We paid a visit to this finny celebrity the other day, and approaching his domain alone, we found him suspended mid-way in the crystal fluid, slowly moving his fins to and fro, his beautifully spotted back gleaming in the light. As usual, he took no notice of his strange visitor, although invited to acquaintance by such advances as crumbs thrown on the water; but when Mr. Phinney appeared with some strips of raw beef steak, his apathy gave place to the utmost activity. He would dart from the bottom, and throw himself clear out of the water if a piece of meat was held above, and almost always succeeded in catching it. He is an unsocial fish, and small ones, even of his own kind, are at once devoured, if placed with him. His last exploit in this line was killing and devouring a chub eight inches long. A man not long since was drinking from the tank, not knowing that it was tenanted, when the trout made a spring at his face and severely bit his lip. An old angler can not view his fine, plump proportions, without a desire to throw a fly on the water, and try how he would feel at the end of a rod. [Kennebec Journal.

DEAF AND DUMB CONGREGATION.—An exchange paper says:

Rev. Mr. Gallaudet, the son and worthy successor of the celebrated Mr. Gallaudet, of Hartford, has recently formed a congregation of deaf mutes, to whom he preaches in their noiseless but significant language every Sabbath, in the small chapel of the University. It is stated that there are upwards of one hundred educated deaf mutes in the city, and the number is fast increasing. The silence of this novel and impressive service would make a Quaker meeting seem uproarious.

A Cincinnati paper states that the Theatre pit boys are in the habit of burlesquing the use of opera glasses in the dress circle, by using two mineral water bottles, tied together with a string, in which they scan the house in the most grave and interesting manner.

Emerson says: "Adhesiveness is a large element of success. Genius has glue on his feet, and will take hold on a marble slab. Out of a pine log a Yankee will whittle a judgeship, a seat in Congress, a mission to England. The first part of economy is to do your peculiar work; the second is to do it by system."

Envy, jealousy, hatred, malice, spite and spleen, are all mean vices; but the sneak embodies them all, fused into one gloaverie of meanness which no language can describe without doing injustice to the respectability of his Satanic Majesty. He is perched in all his littleness so low upon the inverted apex of his own descendentalism, that it requires a tremendous effort of genius to elevate him to a level where he can become the object of a dignified contempt.

A native from the Sandwich Islands being a witness before the Lord Mayor's Court, London, was questioned as to his knowledge of an oath. He replied, "A man who tells a lie will have nothing but pain hereafter. (Pointing to the fire.) The spirit of a good man will leave him and go to heaven. The truth is always told where the heart is warm (purely directed). God is Jehovah in heaven. The body dies, goes to dust. The soul lives after death. It never dies. The oath I take is like a prayer, calling upon God to look and see if that I say is true."

A commodious and splendid brick edifice, has just been completed—ninety-seven by forty-seven feet, three stories—which for stability, convenience of arrangement, and for number, size and comfort of private and school rooms, is not surpassed by any similar one in the country. The Principal resides in the building, and with his lady and competent female assistance, superintends the Boarding Department. A lady will reside in the Seminary, who faithfully discharges the duties of Matron, Nurse and Governess, so that at all times, pupils will find the comforts, kindness and attentions of home. The Principal, with the aid of female teachers, who also live in the Seminary, diligently guard and form their morals, manners and habits of the pupils. Being under his charge at all times, they are constantly exercised under a wholesome system of regulations, respecting neatness, order, punctuality, economy and regularity, calculated to give a safe and vigorous development to character. The appliances of home and family are not removed by this arrangement, but perpetuated and strengthened.

The ensuing scholastic year will commence on Thursday the 23d of September, 1852. Pupils can enter at any time during the year, chargeable from the time of entrance. No deduction will be made but by special arrangement with the Principal.

Boarders study at night under a teacher. They are required to retire 9 o'clock at night, and rise early in the morning at a given signal, and to take frequent and wholesome exercise.

Private rooms are large, conveniently and comfortably furnished. Pupils are required to keep their wardrobes and private apartments in neatness and order. A proper officer will take charge of their clothing, inspects its condition, and every Saturday morning instructs them in plain sewing and necessary repairs of clothing. Every article of clothing must be marked with the owner's name.

Bi-monthly reports are sent to patrons, which are a faithful showing of the scholarship and deportment of pupils.

Pupils are not allowed to attend parties, balls, dancing classes, or any amusement calculated to interfere with their studies.

Visitors are not received by pupils, except with a suitable introduction to the Principal from patrons.

The Principal must have certain information respecting every correspondent. Pupils are required to attend Church and Sunday School on Sabbath.

No accounts will be opened in Marion but with the expressed permission of patrons. When articles are to be purchased, the lady of the Principal must approve the purchase (who superintends their trading), and thus expenditures will be controlled. Patrons should anticipate and supply the wants of pupils as far as is practicable.

Dental operations will not be performed but by special permission from patrons.

Patrons are earnestly requested to encourage economy in all the expenditures of pupils—clothing, pocket money and jewelry.

The Institution has graduated forty-four young ladies since its organization, and arrangements are being made for furnishing, improving and increasing its Library, Apparatus, Cabinet and Herbarium.

The Professors of Music, Drawing, Painting and Modern Languages have been engaged in this Institution for the last five years, with decided acceptability—are superior Musicians and splendid performers on Piano, Harp, Guitar, Organ, Melodeon, Violin, etc., and highly accomplished in other departments.

As to rates of Board and Tuition, $147 will pay the Board, Tuition and incidental fees of a Young Lady for the whole year in the collegiate course; $177 will embrace French and Latin; $227 the above, with Music on Guitar; $257 Music on the Piano, French, Latin and Board, regular course, etc. Books, Stationery, Music, etc., are furnished by the Principal at reduced rates.

Lights and coals for private rooms, to be furnished by pupils. The Principal can furnish lights very low.

One-half the Board and Tuition is due in advance.

MY DAUGHTER'S MINIATURE.

BY MRS. L. E. GRAYSON.

Upon thy pictur'd loveliness,
Sweet child, I'm looking now,
Where thy fair hair is softly laid
Upon thy sunny brow;
And as I gaze, thy tender eyes
Seem beaming on me yet,
With timid glances, half conceal'd
Beneath their lash of jet.

Thy rosy lips seem smiling, too,
As if about to part,
When words of love and gentleness
Flow'd from thy guiltless heart.
Thy sunny bosom, pure and soft,
Thy dimpled hands the same,
Oh! could I only hear thee now
But breathe thy mother's name!

Yet, all seem fresh as life itself,
Yet where, my child, art thou?
Alas, the gloomy grave has closed
Upon thy sunny brow.
Thy smiling lips are seal'd in death,
Thy voice is hush'd and still;
No more its gentle tones are heard,
Thy mother's heart to thrill.

Oh! many a weary day and hour,
And year have o'er me pass'd,
Since with a bursting, breaking heart,
I gazed upon thee last!
As calm and still in death's embrace,
Thy marble beauty lay,
I turned the last long kiss to press,
Ere thou wert borne away.

On aught like thee, my sinless child,
I never more may look,
Thy gentle heart was all too pure
The world's rude touch to brook;
Yet oft I think from thy bright home
In yonder radiant sphere,
Thy tender eyes their gentle watch
Are keeping o'er me here.

I would not call thee back again
To this cold world of ours,
Where all that's fair and bright must fade,
As summer's sweetest flowers,
Nor read the bright and fadeless wreath
That circles now thy brow,
Though this faint picture's all that gives
A semblance of thee now.

THE LATEST RUSE OF MODERN INFIDELITY.

[Concluded.]

It is often made a complaint by writers of this school—and it is a prominent part of the general ruse—that they are not understood, not appreciated; the old mind of the age fails in coming fairly up to their "standpoint." And this, too, is very taking. It may provoke a smile from those who do understand their nonsense better than they do themselves, and know full well the very ground, or want of ground, they appear to occupy; but with many, and especially the young, it has all the effect which the obscure adds to the sublime, and the cant of mysticism imparts to the conception of vast profundity. It is only the love of the marvellous of former days now turned into a different channel. It gives an immense idea of what is coming, when even the forerunning heralds of its advent find it so difficult to make intelligible their "mission" to the world. It is in this way our youth are led to believe that there is somewhere in the Cimmerian cave of German philosophy, perhaps, a vast store of materials for blowing up the old faith. They love to be told of something very profound that is going to produce some very profound result, because it argues great profoundness on their part to believe and acknowledge it.

And yet it may be safely, as well as boldly asserted, that there is nothing in Strauss, or the profoundest German of them all, that has not been advanced for Substance, and we may say in form, too, by the old English deists who called themselves deists and infidels without any disguise. This may seem a strange assertion to some, and even were it a mere assertion, it would be a sufficient answer to that which can justly claim for itself no higher character. We make it, however, very deliberately. We put it forth with the full belief that it can be sustained, and with the offer to sustain it against any of that school that claims affinity with the Westminster Review. We challenge them to produce a substantial objection to Christianity derived from any thing latent or patent in the Old and New Testament that is not more than a century old. We might even go further and maintain that most of German objections now paraded as something new, and against which, it is said, former defences will not avail, are as old as the days of Porphyry and Celsus. There may be some new verbal difficulties raked up by German exegesis, but involving no really new objection. Here this is the great point—presenting no "new aspects" as the reviewers say, no "new problems," no "altered conditions." The objections arising from the apparent discrepancies in the Gospels, the diverse genealogies in Matthew and Luke, the seeming misapprehension in regard to the second coming of Christ, the alleged difficulties of the Old Testament, the hardening of Pharaoh's heart, the destruction of the Canaanites, etc., etc., of which Mr. Newman and others parade as though they were fresh discoveries, are as familiar with the first centuries of Christianity. The whole witticisms of Jonah's fish and gourd have about them the mould of two thousand years. They all date from that early period when the Gospel first aroused the critical acumen of the depraved soul in calling forth its sleeping enmity to the highest form of truth.

But Christianity, Biblical Christianity, still lives, still is strong, while its enemies are ever "changing their countenances" and hasting away. Our new school of progress should be told that they are really not keeping up with the times. Some of the cycles are coming round again. The best and newest German criticism is revolting at the inconsistent theories in respect to the late origin of the Old Testament. Men and books now grow old more rapidly than in former times. Strauss, too, is becoming musty, and receding fast behind the age. He had more show of a certain kind of learning, but was never the equal of Paine, either in acuteness or originality. The once famous Leben Jesu has had its day as well as the Age of Reason, and no man who has a real reputation for learning would now refer to either as authority.

There need, too, be no hesitation in making the same challenge in respect to the discoveries of science. One might be led to suppose, from what is often said, that physical science had somehow rendered obsolete all the old questions in theology, and made necessary an entirely modified view both of revelation and faith. But wherein? Physiology, some would say, has made it impossible to believe any more the dogma of a resurrection. Of this, however, our youthful readers may be fully assured—such an assertion never comes from men of science themselves. They know too well how far beyond their keenest investigation still lies the principle of life and bodily organization to hazard any such rash limitation of the Divine power, or to deny the possibility of what is so clearly revealed.

But Geology and Astronomy—these are the watch-words of the times. On the first we need not dwell. It presents no "altered conditions of the problem of Christianity;" although it might affect our interpretation of one page in the written record. The exegesis, however, which removes the difficulty is one known long before geology was ever heard of; and in regard to the science itself, it is enough to remark, that it is daily tending more and more to establish that position, of the late origin of the human race, than which there is none more opposed by the infidel, or more directly connected with the verity of the earliest records of the Bible. It is storming, too, the skeptic's strongest fortress by driving him out to an admission of the supernatural.

The supposed new objection from astronomy dates from the time when the first thinking soul first meditated on the boundless expanse of the Heavens. It is the difficulty of sustaining steadily in the finite, time-measured, space-ruled human mind, the idea of the Divine care constantly exercised toward a creature as insignificant as man, when contemplated in connection with the immensity of the universe. The thought is not dependent for its suggestion on any scientific details of astronomy. David felt it more powerfully, and was certainly more humbled by it than any of our men of the new "phase of faith." That God's empire must extend far beyond our finite sense, must even be boundless to our finite thought, is as much an a priori demand of the reason as an a posteriori induction of science. That the worlds were even infinite in number was a favorite speculation of the old philosophy. Modern astronomy may bring the thought more frequently to mind, but has given it no new or peculiar force. Never was it set forth with more power than by Addison at a period, when it is admitted, the "old Biblical Christianity" remained undisturbed—set forth, too, not as a scientific discovery, but as one of the most natural musings of the contemplative mind, deriving the very thought, and the humbling feeling which it inspires, from one of the most ancient parts of God's written revelation, "When I behold the Heavens—What is man?" Here we have the whole of it—all that is comprehended, and far more than is felt, by this whole length and "breadth and scope of modern thought."

No objection shows a greater self-ignorance. We will explain what we mean by this. The inconsiderable magnitude of this earth, it is said, makes incredible what the Bible reveals respecting the Divine care in the creation, government, and redemption of man. Independent, then, of this new aspect, we have a right to assume, for the sake of the argument, that such revealed care would be rational in theory and credible in fact—that is, if our earth were the only world, it would not be beyond belief. Does it become incredible, then, on a supposed addition to the universe, or to our view of the universe? If so, it can only be on the ground that the Divine care over each part must diminish in proportion as the whole enlarges. Now, this is "anthropopathism," if we may use one of "the great words which the Horn speaketh"—[Daniel vii. 11.]—it is the very thing they are so fond of charging upon the believers in a Biblical revelation. It is measuring the infinite by the finite. That our moral value, and consequently the Divine estimate of it, is just the same as it would be if our world, our race, ourselves, were alone in the universe, is a decision of the eternal a priori reason, coming directly out from the idea of the Infinite God. It is a decision at which, indeed, the soul staggers, but it is because its lower part rebels against the higher; the imagination is too closely allied to the sense to follow with unfaltering gaze the high behest of the reason and the conscience. These objectors, then, are the anthropopathists, they are the men who "think the Deity altogether such an one as themselves"—they are the men who would measure sins by space, and make them great or small, or just nothing at all, according to our ever-varying conceptions of the outward universe.

The whole fallacy consists in mistaking our relation to two distinct states of being, and applying to the moral what is only true of the physical world. In the latter, quantity, either of space or motion, must be the universal standard, and by its measurement alone are all things great or small. Physically, we may be animalcules of animalcules, or as the contemned Old Testament expresses the same thought, "less than nothing before Him and utter vanity." Morally, no such consideration can have place. All value here is intrinsic. Each holy emotion has the same preciousness, each malevolent feeling is deserving of the same condemnation, each soul's moral redemption requires the same priceless ransom, as though that single soul had been alone with its Maker—the sole subject in his immeasurable dominions. So says the Reason—so teaches the Bible. The anthropopathic infidel would deny it, and then seek to cover its own grovelling conception with the mantle of philosophy, and claim for it the merit of transcending any view of the "obsolete Biblical Christianity."

As far, then, as this science is concerned the mighty question remains just where it was before. It would be well, however, if their own objections would have the effect of producing humility in those who are ever opposing astronomy to the Bible. But we do not find that they are at all more humble than other men; we do not find that they are any the less inclined to boast of the grand philosophy by which they would prove their own moral as well as physical nothingness. And this leads us to ask, if such be the diminishing effect on the religion, what must it be on the science? If human sins, and human salvation, become small affairs when seen through this glass, what becomes of human knowledge and human philosophy? What becomes of those great ideas of "destiny," and "progress," and the wonderful things humanity is to accomplish, on which this school, of all others, do so delight to dwell? What is "perfectibility" to us who are so infinitely behind in the long race of the universe? At the immense distance back to which the telescope throws us, all measurable differences vanish away, and our boasted science becomes of no higher appreciable rank in the immeasurable scale than the social and political economy of the Infusorial tribes that gather their phalansteries among the invisible fibres of the marsh-grown conferva. Certainly may this be logically affirmed of many departments of physical science; for they belong entirely to space and motion, and can not, therefore, refuse to be measured by the standard applied to higher truth in the speculations of those who maintain that physics has in this way introduced an altogether "altered condition of the problem of Christianity."

We can compare the effect which they seem to think their new view would have to no other than that occasioned by the inversion of a magnifying glass; in consequence of which objects that before seemed near are thrown to a vast distance, and proportionally diminished. But can they not see that there is no stopping in this process? One position no more furnishes a resting place than another. Take a certain distance—assume a certain extent of the universe—and the Old Christianity becomes invisible. Carry our view farther, and the "new phase of faith" altogether disappears. At another stage, every thing resembling a particular providence, or a care of any kind for the individual man, becomes of course incredible in this time and space ratio. Prayer is gone, and hope, and all individual fear and love of God. Farther on, every idea of a general providence is swept away. Not only the earth, but solar, and even stellar systems become infinitesimals, or quantities that may be neglected, in the calculus that sums the infinite series. Every conception of every relation of a personal Deity to finite beings utterly disappears, and a view no better than blank atheism—yes, worse than atheism, for that does not mock us with any pretence of theism—takes the place of all morals, of all religion, of all reverence whatever.

The effect on the mind is something like that produced by reading Campbell's Vision of the Last Man. But we awake from our dream and find the old Earth still standing, and the old Heavens still rolling about us. So, too, will it be in the moral world, when the "new phase of faith" shall have waned away into a very old phase of infidelity, and Mr. Newman, and Mr. Parker, and the Westminster Reviewers, shall have long since gone the way of Strauss, and Paine, and Hume, and Bolingbroke. There will still be left the "Old Christianity," with its "old demands upon our belief"—the "old Biblical Christianity," with its old "difficulties" for the unyielding heart, its old "problems," its old "unaltered conditions." The worth of the moral world, the value of each moral agent, and of each moral emotion, will be just the same as when the estimate was made, and the price was paid for them on the Cross of Calvary.

The subject is one of vast importance, and not out of place, we trust, in the pages of our Magazine. The assumption we have called in question is making numerous converts by the very boldness and impudence of its style. We indulge the hope that we may have done a service to our readers—especially the younger portion of them—in exposing certain aspects of the fallacy, although space would not permit us to go into that detail of argument which the subject so justly deserves.

THE ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.—John Aspden, recently deceased at Philadelphia, was one of the English claimants of the immense estate left by Matthias Aspden. Before the case was decided by the Supreme Court in favor of the American heirs, the latter proposed to the deceased to compromise the matter, and offered to pay him the sum of $250,000 to relinquish his claim; this he refused to do, and the decision of the Court cut him off without a farthing. On Monday morning last the estate was divided between the heirs at law, and almost in the same moment John Aspden fell dead, at a tavern in Carter's Alley, of disease of the heart. At the time of his death his pockets contained a solitary cent, his entire fortune.

OLD ECHOES.

You wonder that my tears should flow,
In listening to that simple strain—
That these unskilful sounds should fill
My soul with joy and pain;
How can you tell what thoughts it stirs
Within my heart again?

You wonder why that common phrase,
So all unmeaning to your ear,
Should stay me in my merriest mood,
And thrill my soul to hear;
How can you tell what ancient charm
Has made me hold it dear?

You smile to see me turn and speak
With one whose converse you despise—
You do not see the dreams of old
That with his voice arise;
How can you tell what links have made
Him sacred in my eyes?

O, these are voices of the past,
Links of a broken chain,
Wings that can bear me back to times
Which cannot come again;
Yet God forbid that I should lose
The echoes that remain!

PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

PARIS, February 24, 1853.

I was pleased to see by your issue of January 22, which I have just received, that the Missionary Reporters of your Church do not confine their attention to their own missions only, but also inform their readers of what is going on throughout the whole missionary world. The statements contained in the sixth report of the Louisiana Conference Missionary Society are ably drawn up, and, I believe, generally correct, as far, at least, as they relate to Europe, with one exception. It is said that "the Prince-President has suppressed the whole system of public instruction." This was published as a fact, it is true, by some English papers, but happily it is not correct. The University still exists, to the great horror of the Univers, which is continually describing it as a school of atheism; the national Colleges are as much frequented as ever, and young men and maidens are every day passing the required examinations for their degrees and certificates of merit, just as before; with this difference, however, that the college studies, which were mostly of a classical character, have a tendency to become mere scientific, less Latin and Greek being required, but more of the modern languages (English and German,) of natural sciences and mathematics. The system, therefore, of public instruction has not been suppressed. But it is quite correct to add, that the clergy have acquired a great deal more power in educational matters. Their schools are now free from secular control, and placed under the inspection of the Bishops alone; and a law has been made by which any town, willing to be released from the responsibility of maintaining a college, may give it over into the hands of the clergy; the government being satisfied if there be a college in the place, no matter in whose hands it be. The Jesuits have, of course, availed themselves of this law in many places, their immense wealth enabling them to open a college gratuitously, and then to say to the town: "You may as well shut up yours and spare the money it cost you." We Protestants might also, perhaps, have done the same, had we possessed the means. But, on account of our poverty, all regulations made in favor of the State Churches, only profit the Romish Church, and not the Protestant—which our enemies are well aware of.

Again, the influence of Rome has become so powerful in the Superior Council of Education, that whenever a case of persecution against a free Protestant school happens, through the ill will of the subordinate agents of government, who interpret the laws as they please, there is no redress to be had, as was proved lately, when twelve schools of the Evangelical Society were stopped in the department of the Haute Vienne.

I suppose that the news of the Emperor's marriage reached you at the same time, as my last letter, in which I said that he could not find a wife. The fact is, that the rumor of this was spread in Paris a few hours after my letter was posted via England, and on account of the telegraphic communications between the two countries, the London papers of the next morning, in time for the American mails, must have contained the astonishing news. The speech of the Emperor on the occasion certainly was a masterly piece of composition, with only one fault—it was not true. It was well known that he had uselessly knocked at every princely door, so that, when he said it was not at all necessary for him, u parvenu, to marry a princess, one could not but be reminded of the fable in which the fox, unable to reach the grapes, declared they were unripe, and only fit for menials. The news of this marriage was at first unfavorably received. But opinion seems to have changed; the modesty and liberality of the Empress have operated in her favor, and people seem now to be pretty well satisfied. I cannot, however, say much on this subject, on account of an absence I have made lately, and which has prevented me from keeping au courant of continental matters. Thus, when a certain number of correspondents of foreign papers were taken up by the police, I was in London, there to dig through the thickest fog I ever saw. It was in Jersey that I saw the list of the three or four thousand insurgents who had been pardoned. And as to the Milanese insurrection, all I can tell you about it is, that Kossuth was not there, as was reported, and that he never wrote the document which was published as his proclamation. Since my return, the chief event has been the opening of the session of 1853, by a speech in which the Emperor announces that a further reduction of twenty thousand men is contemplated, and declares that France is strong enough to be at peace with everybody. So, it seems, that Mr. Cobden will not yet have to pay down his £10,000. The finances of the country are, moreover, said to be in the very best state possible. The bankers in London told me the very reverse. Time will show who is right, for I can not tell.

The wind that blows over Europe is decidedly that of persecution, a sure proof that the gospel has been gaining ground. Why should the Grand Duke of Tuscany re-establish capital punishment for matters of religion, if not because Popery is fast declining in his dominions? Why have the German, Australian, Italian and French papers* ceased to be silent as to Protestants, and begun to heap on them all sorts of infamousties, if they did not begin to be seriously afraid of the gospel? Why should the priests of France make every possible effort to crush down the truth, if they did not feel that the truth was likely soon to overcome error? Yes, the devil is astir, because the Spirit of God has been doing wonders in a great many places; in Ireland, for instance, where thousands have become real, evangelical Christians;—in Florence, where tens of thousands are said to be secretly reading the Bible; in Peidmont, where two Italian churches have been formed; in France, where hundreds (as at Estissac) have become Protestant, where new converts are heard of every day, and churches are being dedicated to the worship of God. How can it be expected that this should be done without opposition?

We are glad to say, however, that all the Roman Catholic papers do not join in the general crusade against Protestantism. There are a few, very few, who have taken up the cause of religious liberty, and defend it, to their own peril. The Journal des Debats, for instance, in answer to a bitter complaint from the Univers, published a remarkable article, of which the following are extracts:

"Every communion, having faith in itself, makes, and must make, a propaganda, (i. e. propagate its own principles.) It is impossible you should believe a religion to be the best without wishing to infuse your convictions into the souls of others. The liberty of worship is, therefore, necessarily the liberty of propaganda. The Univers reasons very strangely. Because we defend the liberty of worship, he concludes that, in our eyes, all religions are equally good! And he accuses us, at the same time, to seek to Protestantize France, which would suppose that we prefer Protestantism to Catholicism.

"We have only one word to answer, not upon our supposed intention of Protestantizing France—that is too ridiculous—but we will tell the Univers that if all religions were equally good, there would be no reason for liberty of worship. It is because, on the contrary, there is nothing more important in the world than the choice of a religion, that we must let every one examine, choose and follow the worship he thinks best. If all religions are equally good, the most simple would certainly be to live and die in that in which we were born by chance. Will, perhaps, the Univers say that this choice is impossible? Why, then, do ministers preach? Why are books of controversy written? Why does the Univers itself attack every day with so much venom, not only the faith, but also the morality of Protestant ministers in England, in Germany, in America, and wherever he can find fault with them? Let us speak plainly. It is the principle of intolerance which supposes that all religions are equally good, and that, therefore, in this, as in other matters, one must obey authority and the public law. The Catholics are the strongest in France; they make the law; be Catholics in France. The Protestants are the strongest in England; they make the law; be Protestants in England. You have the right to impose upon me a religion, if the salvation of my soul is not interested in the matter, and if it be only a question of public order. But if, on the contrary, it be of the utmost importance for me, not only in this life, but in the other, preach, write books, try to convert me and to enlighten me by honest discussion; in a word, propagate your opinions; do not go farther. To employ force and authority would be the utmost tyranny, for it would be disposing of my very soul. The more one thinks there are differences between the various religions, the more is one convinced that some lead to salvation, and others to the loss of souls, and the more it is the duty of respecting in others a liberty which we most want for ourselves—the liberty of choosing and of professing the religion which one believes to be the true and good one.

"It is this liberty which we defend, and nothing else. We want it for the Madial in Florence; we should want it for Mr. Newman in England, if the English laws refused it to him. We ask it for the Protestants in France, and with the more zeal and energy, because the Protestants in France are less numerous, and the enemies are powerful and implacable. We have nothing to do with the controversy on the dogmas; we no more think of Protestantizing France than of Catholicizing England. We only want an equal right for all communions to profess their worship—equal right to defend and propagate it by all the legitimate means of discussion! We want respect for what is most sacred in the world—the liberty of conscience in religious matters!"

Uncle Tom's Cabin is having as great a run in France as it seems to have had in England and America. Whatever be the opinion on slavery, it will be acknowledged that this work has done one good in France, viz: it has awakened a desire in many minds to read the Bible. Colporteurs have reported lately that the question has been put to them whether their Bibles were the same as Uncle Tom's; and when an affirmative answer has been made, the Bible has been bought at once.

FEMALE EDUCATION IN THE MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

At the last session of the Mississippi Conference, a very general conviction was felt by the members present of the importance of sustaining, with increased vigor, the interests of our Female College at Sharon, in Madison county; and a resolution was adopted, requesting the President to appoint a suitable agent for said College, to travel as extensively as practicable, for the purpose of collecting funds to improve the condition of the present buildings, and to erect such additional building or buildings as may be deemed requisite for the efficient operation of this important institution. In accordance with this resolution, the President of the Conference appointed the Rev. E. R. Strickland that agent. And we have been gratified to learn that the Board of Trustees of the College, at a recent meeting, unanimously adopted a resolution, "approving of the appointment," and "recommending the agent to the friends of the Institution, and of education generally."

Need the members of the Conference, and our friends generally, a single word of expostulation in relation to an interest of such importance? Our Centenary College, at Jackson, La., by the blessing of our God upon the energetic efforts of its enlightened and philanthropic friends, has attained to a state of prosperity unequalled by that of any other literary institution in the South. Shall our Female College, established and adopted by ourselves, and designed for the thorough training of our daughters, the future wives and mothers of the rising generation of young men and their descendants, fail to realise equal interest on the part of those of the present age, upon whom rests the weighty responsibility of transmitting, through them, to posterity, the inestimable blessings of a sanctified learning? We can hardly believe it. But we often neglect our dearest and best interests, from mere forgetfulness or inattention. Brethren, suffer a brief and feeble word of exhortation from one who feels it his duty to contribute his mite of influence to a cause which involves the dearest interests of education among us as a people. Let him thus remind you of the important duty which we have severally and collectively incurred, of promoting, in every prudent way practicable, the interests of this, our own Conference institution. Being a Conference school, it justly demands and greatly needs not only conference deliberative action, but general effort on the part of the preachers, and the members and friends of the Church throughout the Conference. As a Conference institution, one section has and should feel as much interest in it as another. If the mainsprings of our general system of education be suffered to decrease in vigor, must not all the parts ultimately suffer? Assuredly. But a word to the wise is sufficient. Suffice it to say, that by opening the way for the cordial reception and encouragement of our agent, whenever he may come among us, by soliciting contributions ourselves in his absence, and using, on all occasions, our best exertions to promote the interests of the school, by a proper representation of its present promising condition and prospects, we may do a good work, on which the Father of Light will confer His lasting benediction. It now numbers, I understand, its seventy pupils; and by the blessing of God on proper efforts, who knows but it may soon equal the present number of Centenary College—which is, I believe, about two hundred and twenty-five.

A THEORY.

I send you a short essay in opposition to the present theory: "That the centre of our globe is so intensely hot that it is a mass of melted matter." I do not believe the doctrine; but I believe that it is a mass of solid granite. I will assign a few reasons why I think so; and

1. When matter was created "it was without form and void;" it was in a state of solution. There was no globe until after "the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters," and at the same instant "caused the light to shine out of the darkness," (not into darkness,) and the escaping of lightning (or electricity) from that part of matter which was intended to form our globe, deprived it of its expansive quality, and, at the same time, God gave to it the property of gravitation. Then every particle of matter fell, with great rapidity, toward the given centre. The heaviest bodies would move with much greater velocity than others, and displace any of a lighter nature that will be in their way. The result would be, that for several hundred miles round the centre of gravitation our globe would consist of the most solid and dense matter, of which it was composed; and the immense pressure on all sides would continue to increase its solidity and compactness to an inconceivable degree. This view of the subject corresponds with the discoveries of geologists, who place granite at the primitive and lowest rock of our globe.

To the argument founded on the fact, that "in some excavations the heat increases as we advance toward the centre of the globe, and therefore, at a certain depth, the whole mass is melted matter," I answer: 1. The air, having a free circulation in those deep pits, would cause the degree of heat to be greater at the bottom than at the top.

2. The crust of our globe, on which God designed should grow all kinds of vegetation, was wisely mixed with those minerals that would produce the required heat, and also be convenient for the use of man.

3. Those deep pits, where the experiments alluded to are made, penetrate those beds of different kinds of minerals in search of ore, and it is well known to chemists that a combination of different kinds of minerals will produce heat, and hence we see, in those ledges of mountains where mineral beds have been thrown together by the deluge, and in places exposed to the action of the atmosphere, they have ignited, and formed immense beds of burning matter which extend to a vast depth in the crust of the earth. These mineral beds, no doubt, in places extend round the globe, and when once kindled, they burn in some places under seas and oceans, and the waters breaking into them, produce a sufficient quantity of steam to upheave the bottom of the sea, and form islands. Some have disappeared, but many still remain.

As a proof that they do not communicate with any central fire, many volcanoes are extinguished. If they were the outlets of central fires, they would increase in volume and intensity, and we should never see the crater of an extinguished volcano.

Finally. If the centre of our earth is melted matter, the heat would extend to the surface, so as to bring about an equilibrium in the whole mass; the polar ice would melt; those parts of the ocean that [illegible] in the earth would become hot, and the result would be another flood. But the contrary of all this is the fact. The heat of the crust of the globe is no greater now than it was some five thousand years ago; therefore, I arrive at the conclusion, that the centre of our globe is granite or some very solid substance equal to granite, and that the crust contains more heat than the centre of the earth.

DUTIES OF METHODISM.

The Conference sermon, by Rev. J. Hamilton, D. D., published in connexion with the minutes of the Alabama Conference, discusses the duties, in view of its character, doctrines and circumstances, which Methodism, as an organised development of Christianity, owes to the world in general, and to itself in particular. It is full of weighty sayings, and the preacher taking suitable advantage of his audience, speaks them plainly. We present the last one:

"The maintenance of a higher standard of ministerial character and attainment. Methodism commenced its benevolent operations as an organised development of Christianity largely by the ministrations of men who had enjoyed but small advantages; but this was done at the imperative call of perishing souls, and at the bidding of Divine Providence. And Mr. Wesley, who was the leading spirit employed by the head of the Church in this movement, took early steps to prevent the remaining destitute of cultivation, by educating himself in giving them instruction. Mr. Wesley's example, and the Providence through him, show [illegible] allowable in an emergency—not what is a duty or propriety under ordinary circumstances. And when the practices of that day are quoted upon this subject, they may be quoted with the proper [illegible] time may never come, probably will not; it will be best for the Church to require all who enter her ministry to have graduated in some literary or theological institution; we hesitate not give it as our opinion, that the time has come when, as a Conference, we should take higher ground on this subject. We are laboring to promote the interests of education among our people, and urge them to give their children the highest advantages within their reach. But we may well fear that children and young people thus [illegible] and made familiar with books and men, will be restive under a [illegible] in marked violations of the [illegible] simplest rules of grammar, and [illegible] They will lose their in[illegible] for such a ministry, [illegible] from the Church. Our own [illegible] in the cause of education require us to [illegible] If they did not, those of the rest of the [illegible] would.

"Hitherto, the number of candidates [illegible] admission to the Conference has been [illegible] proportionate to our wants, the [illegible] tion has been left in selection. [illegible] numbers have been introduced to [illegible] try who, according to the early [illegible] the Church, and their own [illegible] covery, were ill prepared to [illegible] responsibilities. And the [illegible] of the Conference has [illegible] brother's feelings, and in[illegible] interests. The time [illegible] when circumstances [illegible] one more discriminating [illegible] dates and [illegible] at higher [illegible] their [illegible]

And finally—not to protract our remarks unnecessarily—Methodism owes it to itself to maintain a [illegible] theory and our practice—our principles and our results. It does little to [illegible] creed, if it be not made [illegible] and the rule of [illegible] positive dishonor [illegible] if it be habitually early Methodism showed to the world. It was appreciated: and extorted from spectators and even opponents many a compliment; but this state of things quite passed away. The world never has seen since the Apostolic age such a race of men as were our fathers for labors and sacrifices. But as we do not believe in living upon the virtue and credit of an illustrious pedigree, it becomes us to make good our boast by labors and usefulness.

NEW ORLEANS:

Saturday Morning, April 2.

Bible Agency.—Rev. H. S. Thrall, of Texas Conference, has been appointed agent and has accepted. He enters upon the work about the 1st instant. His late appointment will be supplied by Rev. L. C. Woods, from Batesville, Arkansas.

Friend of Moses.—This excellent work, by Dr. W. T. Hamilton, has been republished in Edinburgh. The Westminster Review sneered at it with some faint praise; but the Athenæum (better authority) bestows upon it large and discriminating praise.

A New Church Paper.—The first number of the Mississippi Presbyterian, a Church organ, published at Kosciusko, Miss., has been received. H. J. Bardwell, editor and proprietor.

Caughey.—Within the last twelve months eighteen thousand copies of Caughey's Revival Miscellanies have been sold. The work has been, in several instances, the means, and the promotor of revivals.

Livingston, Ala.—Rev. J. E. Newman writes, 23d March:

"The star of Temperance is in the ascendant in our village. We recently elected a Temperance Council, and Mayor, by a majority of four to one. They have carried out the will of their constituents by passing a 'Town Ordinance' which forbids the sale of spirits in less quantity than two gallons, which it may not be drank where bought. The law is backed by heavy penalties. So, you see, we are a little progressive."

THE COST OF MERCY.

Though hard to be aroused to a full sense of duty, and brought up to the requisite measure of liberality, we may not despair of the Christian world that it will yet be moved upon to furnish the men and means of gospel propagandism to the ends of the world. Let the cry of the imperilled and perishing heathen be kept ringing in their ears, and the love of Christ and his provoking example who became poor that others might be rich, held up before their eyes, and the glorious achievements of missionary enterprise, and the great reward, and the outfit will be soon coming.

In this connection we find comfort and encouragement (whether justly or not) in the immense sums of money and labor lavished upon the search of the lost navigators.

It is stated that the various expeditions that have been fitted out during the last five years for the discovery of Sir John Franklin, have cost an aggregate of £758,466. Nearly three years have elapsed without tidings from the missing voyagers. No less than twelve expeditions in all, consisting of thirty vessels besides boats, have been engaged in the pursuit, and the effort is still continued.

TRY THE TRACT SEED.

All precious seed are not the same seed. The husbandman knows another thing—that all good ground is not the same ground. He casts the seed to the soil. A full harvest may be realized of one kind, when another would fail. If you have been talking to a friend—trying to persuade him to a neglected duty, or out of a wrong practice—and have failed, try the tract seed. Perhaps he is reflective, and would be more deeply impressed sitting down alone and reading it. Or, may be, somebody has written on the subject better than you can talk on it. If you have preached to a people, and have not fully carried your purpose, try tracts—enlist them as helpers.

We once heard a poor woman in love-feast tell a happy experience to the praise of tracts. She was deeply convinced of sin, and miserable, and inquiring. When, in her darkest hour, the milk-man came round, and dealing out his wonted pint of milk, asked permission to leave a tract. It was a God-send. It was just what she needed, and led her to Christ. Scatter them, broad-cast. Many will be thrown by and used as waste paper. But one, well done, will pay you for distributing thousands in vain.

All sorts of persons, in every station of life, in all lands, at sea and on shore, are numbered among the known fruitage of tract effort. Who, then, can doubt the approval of God, or question the advantage of such labor? Who, listening for the voices of duty to guide his steps, can fail to hear them singing:

"Give tracts—they live when you are dead;
Light on the darkened mind they shed;
Good seed they sow, from age to age,
Through all this mortal pilgrimage.
They name the permit of holy trust;
They work unfed, when you are dust."

THE PUBLIC SCHOOL SYSTEM.

A memorial of the Romanists of this city was presented on the 24th ult. to the Louisiana Legislature.

The memorial was signed by twenty-five hundred names, headed by Archbishop Blanc. The object of it is to have a pro rata portion of the School fund and the taxes raised for Public Schools set off to them, to be disbursed by their priests in maintaining Schools where their faith is taught. Some weeks ago, a bill was presented to the same Legislature for the relief of the School conducted in the congregation of St. Patrick's by a priestly fraternity called the "Brothers of the Christian School." Verily, our Romish neighbors are getting impatient for the spoils. The bill was defeated, but how the imposing memorial will fare is yet to be seen. Step by step they feel their way. By the clamorous demand of the Romanists, the Bible was abolished out of the Public Schools; now the Schools themselves are to be abolished. Protestants, and the friends of free institutions, will, we trust, have their eyes opened, finally. They had as well make a stand and make it at once, and firmly, if they are not prepared to yield everything to the dictation and dominion of this foreign army that invades us under cover of cowl and cassock.

A simultaneous movement on this subject may be observed all over the country. The Romish Bishop and Priests of Chicago, Ill., have marshalled the votes they control, and made their demands.

At the instance of Bishop Lefevre, the question of devoting a portion of the Public School Fund to the support of Papal Schools, was tested at the Municipal election in Detroit, Mich., and the Bishop's party was signally defeated. A similar effort, to obtain a portion of the School Fund, for their sectarian schools, will be made in Cincinnati. Petitions, at the instance of Bishop Purcell, urging the diversion of a portion of this fund to their Schools, have been presented to the Ohio Legislature, and rejected.

Similar efforts are being made in Mobile, Ala., and elsewhere.

And who are these thus plotting and planning against our dearest institutions? Who thus turn, viper-like, and sting the bosom that has warmed and sheltered them? Why, those whom we have received and sheltered in their flight from oppressions brought upon them for the lack of the intelligence in the people which our Public Schools and Bibles impart!

The endowment of Maynooth is a foreign affair, and a small one to the endowment the Romanists in the United States are demanding of its citizens. Their Schools are but propagandist instruments. For the State to raise a dollar by taxation and give it to the Archbishop of Louisiana and his party to be used in education, is but to give them that much aid in training a Romanist. It is nothing short of an endowment they are asking for under a disguise, and this our Constitution prohibits.

If Roman Catholics may have a portion of the School tax to teach their religion, so may every other denomination of Christians—so may Infidels and Socialists. It would result in the destruction of the School system. It is not certain but this consequence is seen, and this the end desired.

WEBSTER'S DICTIONARY.

The Minister of Education in Paris, on a time, gave orders to have the street signs effaced and properly spelled and punctuated. The same thing was to be done to private and public and mercantile signs, and a correct and uniform style of orthography maintained. Now, this seems Frenchy, very. But there is something besides fastidiousness in it. Such uniform correctness, seen everywhere and by every eye, tends to promote a general accuracy. A badly spelt and punctuated sign-board is a crime, and a contagious one, against the public intelligence; at least a nuisance—to be abated.

We feel this, and are often reminded of the Frenchman in our perambulations of this city, where men of all nations and tongues trade, and have huge lettered advertisements hung out. Take one, and see how many ways there are of letting people know where it is for sale: "Sigars, cigars, segars, cegares, etc. Really, we are sometimes so confused we would not undertake to spell the word. On one corner may be seen, in rather stiff-jointed capitals, "Famelye Groceric"; not far off, "Famly Grosery," and so on. The Board of School Directors ought to put them right, or uniformly wrong. The scholarship of the rising generations stands a chance to be corrupted!

A member of General Conference moved that the Church editors be required to adopt the orthography of the Bible, instead of Webster, Walker and other lexicographers. The brother felt the need of uniformity. But how shall we pronounce the Biblo names? Out of the same pulpit you hear of Bala-am, and another prophet, much the same, as Balam; also of Mordeca, and of Mordeca-i—both kinsmen of one Esther, who, by the way, is variously known as Easter and Es-ther.

Now, this is not finding any more fault against other people than they can find against us. But that American standard, mentioned at the head of this article is worthy, according to the best judges, to be the world's standard. It ought to be in every school-room, family and private study. The edition (unabridged) which Merriam & Co. publish contains 1452 pages, three columns. The list of Scripture and Geographical names is very complete, and no man better understood the etymology of our language or defined better than Noah Webster.

LONDON CORRESPONDENCE.

[Special Correspondence of the Advocate.]

London, March 3, 1853.

The Lay-Committee System of England.

I am pleased to see that you have organized for the Louisiana Conference a lay-committee system. This corresponds substantially, though not formally, to our lay representation in the District Committees. For our District Committees correspond much more nearly to your Conferences, in many respects, than to your District Assemblies. The number of regular ministers (exclusive of supernumeraries or retired ministers) in one of our Districts very seldom falls so low as twenty-five, and in several instances rises to from sixty to one hundred. And the business transacted at our District Committee meetings is of the highest importance, as preparatory to the final supervision and determinations of the General Conference. Indeed, previous to 1792 all, and previous to 1797 most of what is now managed at the District Committee, was Conference work; and without the prior sanction of the District there are very few things indeed which the Conference has the power to do. The Conference, however, has the jurisdiction of appeal from the District in disciplinary cases, and the right to veto upon all determinations of the District affecting general connexional interests or funds. There are two meetings of the District Committee each year—one held at the end of September; that is, about five weeks after the close of the Conference, to settle the details of certain financial arrangements, the main outlines and general limits of which have been decided upon by the previous Conference. This is called the Financial meeting. The other is held in the third week of May, prior to the Conference, and is called the General District meeting. The business of this meeting is, besides questions of ministerial character and discipline, to inquire into the condition of Circuits, and to examine the claims of any to special assistance or relief, to review and decide upon chapel cases, missionary accounts and arrangements, and, in general, the affairs of all the Connexional Funds for the District. The two Stewards of each Circuit, and the District and Circuit Treasurers of Connexional Funds, are, ex officio, members of these meetings, for all purposes not connected with ministerial character and discipline.

A certain proportion of the Districts, also, in a kind of irregular rotation, determined by the proximity to the place where the Conference assembles, elect (the laymen, in this case, voting alone) representatives to attend the General Committee meeting, at Conference, of the Contingent or Home Mission Fund. And certain of the Circuits, in like manner, in a similar irregular rotation, choose representatives to attend, at the Conference, as members of the general Chapel Fund. Further, all District and Circuit Treasurers and Secretaries for the Missions, are members of the General Missionary Committee of Review, which meets at the time of Conference.

All our Financial Committees consist of an equal admixture of laymen and ministers, and have the power of nominating new members to fill up vacancies as they occur. But, in addition to this, we seem, in order to theocratic completeness, to require a system of direct District representation from all our Districts and for all our connectional branch-interests. With the direct Circuit representation in the District Committees, if we could thus unite a direct and universal District representation in our Conference Committees, our platform of church government would be tolerably complete in all its stages. At the same time, it is evident that such a direct representation in our Conference Committees should not be the only and exclusive method of constituting their lay members; for while several Districts would barely be able, if able at all, to furnish one lay representative whose pecuniary means, command of time, and general liberality and intelligence would fit him to be a member of General Conference Committees, others—as London, Manchester, Leeds, or Birmingham, could furnish each six or ten men, who not only well might, but really ought to have a share in transacting the general connexional business, because of their large benefactions, active zeal, extensive intelligence, and great and merited personal influence. A certain proportion, therefore, of each Committee ought to consist of such eminent lay men, nominated by the Committee, and approved by the Conference, the rest being chosen by the Districts as already indicated. Of course, to think of Circuit representatives to attend to our Conference Committees, on the part of our hundreds of Circuits, and to be provided for, in addition to as many ministers, or more, would be quite out of the question.

Such are our thoughts; that is, those of your correspondent, and some others. Your arrangement, however, in your circumstances, is admirable, being simple, practicable and efficient.

Our financial gathering of ministers and lay gentlemen is, for the present, postponed. Inquiries, in preparation for it, are being extensively made throughout the connexion.

Congregational Reformers.

They that "sow the wind," can only expect to "reap the whirlwind." "With what measure ye mete," says the Scripture, "it shall be measured to you again." A notable illustration of the truth of these Scripture maxims is at this moment being afforded in the history of the religious world of this country. You know that when our troubles arose the Congregationalists very extensively thought it their duty or privilege to join with the disturbers of our peace, and do their utmost to add to our confusion and aggravate our troubles. Now they are falling into the pit which their own hands so zealously assisted to dig.

The most unhappily notorious of all our Districts for the outrages of "Reform," so called, has been the Norfolk District. And the most influential in its evil example of all the Norfolk Circuits has been Norwich, the principal Circuit of the District. You know that Norwich is a cathedral city, and the chief town of the county. It has always been a place distinguished by low politics, and had too often given evidence of political corruption, nor has its Methodistical character and condition ever reversed the unhappy notoriety which it acquired in Wesley's days, who says that all the places in England together had not given him so much trouble as the one Society at Norwich. Here, in the last century, the cause of that infamous antinomian, Wheatley, expelled by the Wesleys from their connexion for gross immorality, found a congenial home and welcome, till gross and glaring excesses drove him at length even from Norwich, and the Wesleys were again enabled to organize a society, the turbulent fickleness and grievously inconsistent behaviour of the majority of whom gave them incalculable trouble and sorrow to the last. Such were the antecedents of the Methodist cause at Norwich, and these malign influences have never been altogether outgrown, nor such evil precedents abandoned and reversed; and the character of the Norwich Societies has been very extensively communicated, as a matter of course, to the younger Societies and Circuits of the county which have, one after another, been separated from this the parent Circuit; the original Norfolk Circuit, as it was called, having been now partitioned into a multitude of smaller Circuits named after the principal places (chiefly small towns or large villages) included in them.

Well, this is a digression. Yet such an instance of the descent and reduction of evil may not be uninstructive. Norwich, as might be expected, soon embraced the cause of "the expelled," far less, indeed, from any attachment of their cause personally than from a rooted spirit of discontent and insubordination; and its example was quickly followed by many of the other Circuits in the county. At the first, or nearly the first, important and numerous gathering on this subject held in the city, two Independent pastors of the city, who had long lived on terms brotherly friendship with the Wesleyan ministers stationed at Norwich, and had been accustomed to interchange services and to join in union prayer meetings, etc., thought it right and Christian to countenance the meeting by their presence and voice. But they little knew what they were doing, though they and their brethren who did the like things were not left without plain and earnest warning of what would be the consequences of their doings. After some months had rolled away, it was found that some of the members of their own churches had joined with the Reformers of Methodism to hold weekly meetings, sometimes, if I remember rightly, at the time that they should have been attending the ministry of their pastors, for the purpose of settling the principles, and, as far as possible, the details of a plan for the reformation, not of Methodism alone, but of all existing churches, and especially of Congregationalism. Here was the commencement of what has now grown into a separate movement for Congregational Reform. The principles of these Reformers and of the Methodist Reformers are, in fact, identical. But as the bodies to be reformed are so different, different arguments and methods are employed; and, of course, the leaders and active promoters of this Reform are, for the most part, those who are, or have been, Congregationalists. Still, one good turn deserves another, especially where the principles of both parties are alike, and hence the Congregational Reformers are extensively supported by the Methodist Reformers. The principal seat and centre of this movement is still the city of Norwich, which was its original birthplace. But its influence is deepening and extending. Public meetings have been held in Norwich, and are to be held, if they have not already, elsewhere. A London Committee has been organized at Exeter Hall, and a great metropolitan meeting is to be held in the spring. A weekly periodical is published entitled "Quo Warranto?" the aim of which is to shew that modern Congregationalism is contrary to Scripture and inconsistent with the "good old paths" of the fathers and founders of the denomination. The Rev. Andrew Reed, "minister of the old Meeting House, Norwich," one of the two ministers referred to above, has felt himself called upon to publish a two shilling book, entitled "The Scripture Warrant, or Congregationalism and its Reformers." The columns of the Non-conformist newspaper, and of the British Banner, have been filled with letters and discussions connected with this subject, and Dr. Campbell, in the Christian Witness, has found it necessary most energetically to deliver his sentiments and utter his monitions in regard to it.

Some points in Congregationalism to which the Reformers object, are the "one man system," were there ought to be for each church a plurality of pastors; the clerical monopoly of preaching and teaching functions; the pew system, by which the best seats are allotted to the rich and the worst to the poor; and the system of collections and subscriptions which these persons stigmatize as taxation, and denounce as being voluntary only in name, and in reality compulsory. They propose, also, to open the places of worship for meetings of discussion, at which the irreligious may be present and take a part.

It is easy to see that, as to some of these points of objection, Congregationalism is very vulnerable and can not effectually defend itself, and if Methodists were to follow the example which Congregationalists have set them, they would join with these Reformers in their assault on Congregationalism. They might do so quite as fairly and consistently as Congregationalists, in joining with our malcontents to assault Methodism. But far be from us such fellowship! There can be no doubt, indeed, notwithstanding the justice of some of the objections urged against Congregationalism, that the Reformers in question mean just what Dr. Campbell says they mean.

"It is needless to mince the matter. It just means setting aside the ministerial office to make way for men who have neither gifts nor graces themselves, to exhibit their imaginary capabilities and gratify a passion for distinction."

But then the main meaning of the Methodist Reform movement was identical with this, and yet the learned and reverend editor of the Christian Witness and British Banner did all in his power to patronize and support it.

But the course of the leading Congregationalists who have moved in this matter has been hitherto, in all respects, very inconsistent. The "Congregational Reformers" have determined to appeal, through the press and by public meetings, to the churches at large and to the public on this matter. Well, this is precisely what the "Methodist Reformers" did, and were applauded and supported in doing. It was to no purpose that Wesleyan ministers and Wesleyan journals urged the sinfulness of spreading discord and and division by controversial and schismatic publications throughout a connexion in which at least pure doctrine was admitted to be faithfully taught. To argue thus was, we were fiercely told by our direct opponents, and dictatorially warned by Congregationalist speakers and journalists, to attempt to fetter the press. As little did it avail to protest against making the indiscriminate public, in promiscuous and passionate meetings, the judge in matters of ecclesiastical discipline. This was priestism, and despotic denial of the right of liberty of discussion; and, altogether, our conduct was nothing else but sheer Popery.

Well, but how are our liberal neighbors and servere censers acting under the like circumstances? Mr. Reed objects in toto to any such proceedings as "a plain interference with the independency of our churches!" Certainly a lame reason! Surely the independency of their churches is a curious reason why one brother should not write and another read, or one speak and another hear, apart from his respective church and its ecclesiastical organization, whatever he may think proper. There is no rule in independency to prevent such a thing, and an Independent can fairly employ no argument against it except its opposition to the spirit of Christ, and purpose of Christianity. But when Methodists, in the like case, used this argument, Congregationalists clamored it down. Dr. Campbell says, in the Christian Witness:

"The notion of an organization for the express purpose of disturbing the peace of the churches, is not for a moment to be tolerated! For individuals to remain in a fellowship with the acknowled object of overturning its existing order by talk, by tracts, by committees, and by coteries, is an iniquity to be frowned upon by all right-minded men."

Now, is Dr. Campbell the most shameless or the most forgetful of men? What was, and is, "Methodist Reform," but "an organization for the purpose of disturbing the peace of the" Methodist "churches"? Yet Dr. Campbell has, from the first, lent his whole influence and energy to the support of this organization. Nay, not only so, but he has, again and again, advised Methodist Reformers not to retire from the Methodism with which they were dissatisfied, but to "remain in its fellowship with the acknowledged object of overturning its existing order by talk, by tracts, by committees, and by coteries." And yet Dr. Campbell, no doubt, esteems himself a "right-minded," an "honorable man." Yes, Campbell "is an honorable man, so are they all—all honorable men."

Mr. Reed's advice is good. But it had been well if he had bethought him of these truths somewhat earlier, and had inculcated them in his friends, the Methodist Reformers:

"How far," says he, "holding such views, can you remain a member of a Congregational Church? You can do so, so long as you are content to take part in our usages, till you can see some society nearer to your views; so long as you avoid disturbing the harmony of the church by forcing your views in a proselyting and factious spirit upon them; so long as they do not lead to party spirit and contention. When these consequences arise, it is your duty to retire, in order to avoid them. To remain, and break up the peace of the church, and irritate, by discussion and attempts to change the existing organization, in the hope of ultimately succeeding to carry your own way, were base and unchristian."

Such "base and unchristian" conduct has Mr. Reed heretofore favored and fostered.

Dr. Campbell is evidently in alarm at the sight of this evil, now that it comes forward to invade his own domains; and he counsels to precisely such prompt and energetic action as, when adopted in parallel circumstances, by Wesleyan superintendents, he held up to abhorrence as the cruelest spiritual tyranny:

"We would solemnly warn all, that safety will consist in resisting the evil at the very threshold. If from shrinking fear, or reckless confidence, or excessive candor, or spurious charity, they suffer it to enter, it may cost them more than they are prepared to pay, to exercise the spirit."

Accordingly, Mr. Reed's Church at Norwich have determined to expel all these Reformers who will persist in not keeping the peace. Of course I think this, in itself, quite right. But when this was done, however legally and christianly, by Wesleyan superintendents and leaders' meetings, they were denounced by Congregationalists as putting those out of the church who had committed no moral offence, and whom Christ would not exclude from heaven, as if schism were not a spiritual sin!

Dilemma of the Methodist Reformers.

The consequence of this state of things is, that the leaders of Methodist Reform are in an awkward dilemma. Hitherto the organs of Conservatism—the Patriot, British Banner, Christian Witness, Eclectic Review, and so forth—have been their great allies. To Dr. Campbell, in particular, they have been heavily indebted. To break with Dr. Campbell, and the other journalists of his denomination, would be to deprive themselves of their only allies of any pretensions to respectability or religious characters, and to sink at once among the dregs of low and not over-religious ecclesiastico-political democracy. And this would, of course, vastly diminish their influence in every direction, and complete the defeat and ruin of their cause as Wesleyan Reformers. The Wesleyan Times, therefore, and the most respectable—so far as any of them may claim a respectability which is worldly and political, rather than religious—of the leaders of Methodist Reform, feel themselves so bound to Dr. Campbell and the Congregationalist press, that they dare not, for fear of their own annihilation, adopt or sanction the cause of Congregational Reform. Hence, two of these Methodist Reforming leaders have felt it needful, in the columns of their organ, to disclaim all sympathy with Congregational Reform. And the Wesleyan Times has shown its respect and gratitude to its Congregational allies by putting forth a leading article in which it utters a similar disclaimer. But this, as might have been expected, has provoked rejoinders from some of those Methodist Reformers who, honestly and consistently, favor the cause of Congregational Reform. And one of these is a young man of energy and influence among Methodist Reformers (not Mr. Horton) who last year abandoned our ministry to become a leader in their ranks. Those persons tell the Wesleyan Times that the cause of the two classes of Reformers is identical; that to oppose the Congregational Reformers is, on the part of the Wesleyan Times, not only inconsistent, but ungrateful; that in committing itself in opposition to Congregational Reform that journal has taken a most imprudent course; that such conduct, together with the very evident general leaning of the journal in question in favor of "Campbellism" and "orthodox independency," has already lost it not a few subscribers and friends, and is likely to lose it many more; and, finally, that the principles and proceedings of the Congregational Reformers are extensively approved of, not only by the more "advanced Reformers," but by the party mis-called Moderates.

Out of this serious dilemma, the Reformers and the Wesleyan Times must extricate themselves as best they may.

Affairs in General.

In the case of the Madiai, Russell and Palmerston have spoken out as befits free Protestant Britons; but Maynooth is still to be endowed. The first step towards the admission of Jews into Parliament is once more successfully taken in the Commons.

Mazzini has written a letter which embodies a charge of base equivocation against Kossuth as to the proclamation to Hungarian soldiers in Italy, of which he had denied the authorship. Turkey has unconditionally succumbed to Austria, playing the game also of Russia, and people doubt only how far she is to be dismembered before she be totally destroyed. The Eastern affairs are indeed most complicated, Russia, France and Austria being all perplexingly involved with the Grand Turk, and the British Ambassador having been unfortunately long absent from his post. He is now on his way back.

CITY CORRESPONDENCE.

"The environs of New Orleans have nothing very remarkable." This was written in 1772, by Father Charlevoix, and indicates the state of the city at that time. It existed in name four years earlier, but was not established as the seat of government for the French colony until two years later, 1724. Bienville, a French officer of distinguished rank and merit, selected the site and made the first improvements. The historical romancer, Gayare, speaks of the event in the following terms:

"The space now occupied by New Orleans was then entirely covered with one of those primitive forests with which we are so familiar. Owing to the annual inundations of the river, it was swampy and marshy, and cut up with a thousand small ravines, ruts and pools of stagnant water when the river was low. The site was not inviting to the physical eye, but Bienville looked at it with the mind's vision. His intellect hovered over the whole country, from his native vallays of Canada, down the Mississippi, in the footsteps of LaSalle, through those boundless regions whose commercial emporium he foresaw that New Orleans was destined to be. Were I a painter, I would delight in delineating and fixing on living canvas the scene which my imagination conjures up.

"Bienville had arrived with his sturdy companions on the preceding evening; and now the sun is peeping through his eastern curtains, and flings a glow of radiancy over the dawning beauty of the morning landscape. In obedience to the command received, fifty axes have, in concert, struck fifty gigantic sons of the forest. With folded arms and abstracted look, Bienville stands on the bank of the river, and seems, from the expression of his face, to be wrapped up in the contemplation of some soul-stirring fancies. Perhaps he had glimpses of the rapid growth of the city of his creation, and was blessed with the revealed prospect of its future grandeur. Far aloft, above his head, the American eagle might have been observed towering with repeated gyrations, and uttering loud shrieks which sounded like tones of command. Of the Indian race, only one representative was there. It was an old, sibyl-looking woman, who had the wild glance of insanity or of divination; and with the solemn gesticulations of prophetic inspiration, she kept singing an uncouth sort of chant, in which she said that the time of which she had been warned by the Great Spirit had come at last; that her death hour was approaching, which was to be on the day when white men were to take possession of the spot where she had dwelt during a hundred summers and winters, and when they would cut down the oak, under the shade of which she had indulged so long her solitary musings. 'The Spirit tells me,' so she sang, 'that the time will come when, between the river and the lake, there will be as many dwellings for the white man as there are trees standing now. The haunts of the red man are doomed, and faint recollections and traditions concerning the very existence of his race will float dimly over the memory of his successors, as unsubstantial, as vague and obscure as the mist which shrouds, on a winter morning, the bed of the Father of Rivers.'"

The same writer thus describes the city as it appeared nearly ten years after its first settlement:

"In the beginning of 1727, the spot where now stands New Orleans, not being protected by a levee, was subject to annual inundations, and presented no better aspect than that of a vast sink or sewer. The waters of the Mississippi, and of Lake Pontchartrain, met at a ridge of high land, which, by their common deposits, they had formed between Bayou St. John and New Orleans, and which was since called the Leaper's Bluff. The whole city was surrounded by a large ditch, and fenced in with sharp stakes wedged close together. For the purposes of draining, a ditch ran along the four sides of every square of the city, and every lot in every square was also ditched all round, causing New Orleans to look very much like a microscopic caricature of Venice. Mosquitoes buzzed, and enormous frogs croaked incessantly in concert with other indescribable sounds; tall reeds, and grass of every variety, grew in the streets and in the yards, so as to interrupt all communication, and offered a safe retreat and places of concealment to venomous reptiles, wild beasts and malefactors, who, protected by these impenetrable jungles, committed with impunity all sorts of evil deeds."

"The boy is father of the man," says the proverb, and the visiter of this date will recognize the picture, though the sketch goes back more than a century. The swamp, the marshy flatness, and the exuberance of wild vegetation in certain localities, attest its truthfulness; whilst the sonorous croakers of Melpomene, and the ubiquitous gallinippers of everywhere, leave upon our minds the graphic impress of its veracity.

On the fifteenth of November of the same year, the first embankment was raised to protect the city. The New Orleans levee, so celebrated throughout the world as the depository of an immense and almost inestimable commerce, was then but eighteen hundred feet in length and only eighteen feet in width at its summit. The harbor, as described in a letter, was scarcely dreamed of at that time. The valley of the Mississippi and its tributaries, now the seat of large cities and numerous commonwealths, had not as yet yielded a tithe of its present tribute. The rich alluvion lay in virginal repose, the sugar cane was unknown to the soil, and the annual bale of cotton had not been grown. The savage and silent was the scene then. The steambent was unknown, and the commerce and congregation of a world-wide commerce, now pressing the shore, had not gathered even a nucleus of its present magnitude.

The limits of the city in 1770, eight years after it, with the territory of Louisiana, was ceded to Spain by the Government of France, extended from the levee, fronting Jackson Square, back to Rampart street, and from Customhouse street down to Barracks street, making a depth of six squares, and a width of about eleven or twelve. The little plan from which these items are taken, represents the space comprised in the city limits, as surrounded by stockades, with a ditch outside and a banquet raised within. This was calculated for defence against the water and hostile Indians, both of which proved the early Orleanais much trouble. The fortification is now known only in history; the Indians have melted away, and only the mighty waters remain, rolling on, just as they did when the canoe danced upon the wave and the old stockade looked down upon the unperturbed and muddy flow.

To the reflecting and contemplative there is always a luxurious region of thought and emotion, lying between early data and present facts. The transition from the novel, and germinal yere, to the glorious, modern manhood of moderndom, without stopping to watch the gradual progress from one point to the other, is abundantly pleasing; and there are few who have not coveted the dream ambulance of Rip Van Winkle, which conveyed him from the shores of one century to the splendid highland perspective another.

To enjoy the zest and exhilaration of such a phenomenon, we have only to pass from chronicled events before us to the realities that everywhere surround us. Let the historical interval of a century or more be blank as a night's repose, filled only with phantasies of obscure and flitting dreams, and the wakeful vision of to-day will be scarcely less marvellous than the tale of Aladin, reared in a single night by the skill of the genii.

The limits of the city have burst from the stockade durance, and have expanded miles in every direction. The few low rude buildings have multiplied into myriads of mansions, couples and edifices of architecture. The harbor is a crowded host of tongues, flags and freightage. The groans with cotton bales, tobacco hogsheads and the produce of all latitudes. A flag then unknown are now in the ascendancy, the flag of freedom, then unborn, floats all.

Placing our stand—point but a few farther in the future, and the grandeur of impressions is heightened. Railroads concentrate from the East, the North and the West. The iron horse, which amongst the gorges of the Pacific chain shames the speed of the mustang of plains, comes hither with the luxuries of the Indies and the precious metals of California; whilst others from the Alleghanies and the Atlantic coast come thundering like commercial glaciers, with their accumulated burdens of travel and trade! So the remote past, the present, and the future. In my previous communication I left you on the top of St. Patrick's. For the present, I leave you on terra firma, with other historical facts and reflections when you are well rested from this.

Baltimore Conference.—A correspondent of Zion's Herald reports the doings of this body. Of the body itself he says:

"It is decidedly the strongest corps of Methodist preachers in the United States—I mean numerically, of course, but I doubt whether it would be considered invidious to characterize it as such intellectually and morally. It includes a larger number than I had supposed of educated men. Old Hanson has repaid well its liberality in forcing its ranks with well trained youth. I have been especially gratified at the emphatic testimony which I have heard in all directions here in favor of the class of young men of the Conference. They are considered to be noble examples of ministerial fidelity and usefulness, and if there is ever a fear of education in the ministry, I think it has been dissipated forever. The moral force of the Conference is mighty. There is more of the old chivalry and enthusiasm of our itineracy in it than I think can be found in any of our more recent Conferences. Many old and effective men remain in it from the last generation."

A new institution, of no little importance, has been projected—a Metropolitan Collegiate Institute to be located at Washington City. The Metropolitan Church was rewarded with much enthusiasm—the pewholders subscribing on the spot $2350, and Mr. Slicer appointed general agent for the work. This writer says of the Conference:

"One of the best indications of its prosperity is in its missionary exhibit. Its contributions the past year amount to more than $23,500. That's not only munificent. The veteran Roszel, now in Heaven, once predicted that the time would come in which the Baltimore Conference would raise, annually for missions, the did sum of one thousand dollars! How the times changed! Let us not distrust destiny while the aggressive spirit of the cause gives such indications."

LITERARY NOTICES.

The agent of D. Ilingees & Co., Publishers and Wholesale Ilookseellers, No. 60 John street, New York, has laid on our table their catalogee, together with the following School Books, which are kept on sale by H. D. McGinnis, 56 Gravier street:

THE GRADUAL PRIMER.
INTRODUCTION TO THE GRADUAL READER.
EXERCISES IN ARTICULATION.
SEQUEL TO THE GRADUAL READER.
SECOND CLASS READER.
FIRST CLASS READER.

The two last volumes explain and illustrate the principles of elocution. The whole is a judiciously arranged series in progress, the author of which, D. B. Tower, A. M., has had large and honorable experience in the business of teaching.

The first steps taken by a child in a series of mental exercises, to end only with life, ought to be prescribed carefully, and upon philosophic principles. If Mr. Tower has not succeeded perfectly in this series, he has indicated a process that must exert a happy influence on the modes of primary education. His Primer is an Enunciator. Marked care is taken, from the first, to secure a distinct utterance of elementary sounds, and then of words in which these elements are combined; and so on inevitably and easily to good reading and speaking. The exercises in articulation, as here laid down, are calculated to develope and strengthen the organs of speech, —a sort of vocal gymnastics.

Another peculiarity is that the whole unmeaning alphabet is not forced down a learner at the start—a tasteless labor, and a prodigious demand upon the memory. In this system the child is required to learn only a few letters before he combines them into words—thus learning the force of letters at the same time with their names, and learning to read many words before he knows the entire alphabet.

We heartily recommend this series to teachers, who will study them to advantage, if not use them. They seem agreeable to the true philosophy of mind and language.

NORTH AND SOUTH.—A neat pamphlet, published by Carver & Ryland, Mobile, containing the "Impressions of Northern Society upon a Southerner." Dr. Lipscomb, of Montgomery, is the author. It must be acknowledged that there is no controversy between the North and the South. It is a family affair, however, in which the patriotism of each party will not allow the interference of strangers. This controversy has not given rise to a more able defence of the South than this pamphlet of thirty-two pages. Its analysis is profound, its discussion fair and calm, its style pure and forcible. We may have occasion to refer to it again. For sale by H. D. McGinnis.

LADIES' REPOSITORY for April is rich in ornament and very readable.

"THY KINGDOM COME."

On the 15th of February, Rev. Mr. Speers preached a sermon to a large audience, in the Chinese language, at the Presbyterian Church in San Francisco. A large portion of the audience were Chinamen who were recently from their native land, and yet strongly attached to their idols. They gave profound attention. Rev. Mr. Speers spent some years in China, under the supervision of the Presbyterian Board; there he learned the language. He was appointed by the same Board (who wisely foresaw this opening opportunity) a Missionary to the Chinese of California. Strange Providence this, and gracious. How does God make the wrath of man to praise him and all events subserve his kingdom. When a misunderstanding arose between our own Government and Mexico about a boundary line, and Gen. Taylor marched into the Valley of the Rio Grande with the Army of Occupation, who thought that the way was n preparing to Christianise China! Verily, the Heavens do rule.

The Christian Observer, from which we learn the facts, contains some excellent reflections on them:

"He was assisted by Rev. Dr. Bridgeman, late of China, who opened by prayer and also followed with an address, all in Chinese.

"This is probably the first attempt at public preaching to this class, out of their own land; and it is with no ordinary delight that the record the unfurling of Immanuel's banner in an almost new division of the army, on the last great battle-field, is made. That this country is the chosen spot; that this age is the appointed time, and these United States the favored instrument in bringing on and conducting this final struggle, previous to the reign of universal holiness, who can doubt? For centuries, this was an undesirable wilderness; suddenly a Christian people, with the fear of God before their eyes, and the book of God in their hands, determined to serve Him with all their substance. At once, under the smiles of Providence, they have arisen to influence and might; at which point, the heathen world has turned to us as the waters of the sea, being greatly desirous of learning our language, manners and religion. When here, they have been scattered throughout the land that they might not be herding together, retain their own customs and establish the worship of their native land. Who that sees this is not struck with astonishment, and ready to exclaim, how, and why is this? Is not the Church, in the day of comparative general defection, ready in her heart to exclaim, "who hath begotten me these, seeing I have lost my children, and am desolate, a captive, and removing to and fro? And who hath brought up these? Behold, I was left alone; these, where had they been?"

"Verily, none but he who said, "And I will make all my mountains a way, and my highways shall be exalted. Behold these shall come from far: and lo, these from the north and from the west, and these from the land of Sinim." It is supposed by some of those who have made it a study, that Sinim here spoken of is China. If so, has not the time predicted come upon us?"

P. S.—Could not our utilicted Brother Jenkins find a post of great usefulness in the Pacific Conference?

THE RULE OF LIFE.

The following is an extract from the address of Hon. R. M. Charlton, delivered at the request of the Young Men's Christian Association, in the Lecture Room of the Smithsonian Institute. Its theme is the Rule of Life. We need hardly say that it is characterised by the lofty religious tone which pervades most of its author's publications. Strange as it may seem in a professed Christian country, it demands no small measure of moral heroism on the part of a Senator or Representative, thrown amid the fashionable and political circles of Washington, to enable him to appear before a Christian Association, in advocacy of the Christian's "Rule of Life."

The following extract with which the lecture concludes, may be taken as a fair indication of the tone and talent which it exhibits:

"What rule of life shall we follow to insure our happiness?" What is the rule?

It belongs to no profession in particular; the monarch upon his throne can secure it; the captive in his loathsome cell may retain it. There is no station, there is no condition, where it is not to be found; and it is this: It is the faithful and conscientious discharge of every duty which may be allotted to you, no matter how minute, for if the little things of life are the terrible, they are also the beautiful—the unwavering attention to the suggestions of the monitor within our breast. No man, though surrounded by fame, by wealth, by science, by love, can be happy, who feels that he has turned a deaf ear to his bosom's lord. No one, however degraded, trodden down, athirst, hungry, wounded, can be miserable, who knows that he has been earnest in his thirst after truth, and unfaltering in his devotion to principles.

Act well your part, there all the honor lies."

It is the memory of our past life to which we must always look for comfort or for reproach; the present we are too busy with; the future has too much of hope's brightest hues. It is the stern realities of the past that must be our treasure-house of grateful recollection, or our charnel house of perished joys and perverted hours. Memory is the most prominent attribute of the mind; it is the golden thread that connects the jewels together, and if it break the gems will fall to the ground and lie scattered in useless profusion.

It is said, and I have no doubt of it, that what we have once learned we can never forget. The trifling incident of our boyhood's years, the passing event, which seemed to float by upon the stream of Time, almost unobserved, will, in more mature life, flash back upon our mental vision, with a startling vividness; it may be true, that we apparently forget much that we have witnessed; it may be, that we cannot recall each scene at pleasure; but in the lodgments of the brain they are hidden, and memory, when we least expect it, will re-produce them, and oftimes make our cheek grow pale, or our brow crimson, at the unwished-for recollection. And time is like the skillful workman, who is about to take down some ancient mansion; he begins at the roof, and after he has demolished that, then he takes down the higher story, and so on in an inverse order to their erection, until he reaches the foundation, which, last of all, he removes; and such is Time's attack upon the memory. He begins upon the last event, the top stone of our decaying tabernacle. The old man, tottering in the second childhood, will forget the scene that he has just witnessed—and yet remember well the incident of a score of years ago; and as he advanced nearer and nearer to the grave of all his faculties, and as a gloom more horrible than death is settling upon his worn-out mind, whilst the present is dark before him, his garrulous tongue will still prate to you of his childhood's visions, and tell you truly, the events of his early life.

What a warning does this give us; we are now laying up for ourselves blissful dreams, or we are heaping up layers of wrath; each deed we now commit, each thought we now harbor, whether it be of evil or of good, we are putting up in store for the retrospection of life's last hours! Oh, let us see to it, that when we draw nigh to our final rest, when the damps of death are gathering upon our brow, and the hand of the destroyer is uplifted to strike us down, we may look back upon the long avenues of years through which we have trodden, and see there the smiling countenances of those whose hearts we have gladdened, whose lives we have cheered, beaming upon us their gratitude; and that we may look forward with joy, and humble hope, to these bright and beautiful mansions prepared for us in Heaven, whose maker and builder is God!

I have recently met with a beautiful little poem, the author of which I am ignorant of, which gives the rule, in a few practical words, and with the recitation of which I will conclude this lecture:

"There are three lessons I would write—
Three words—as with a burning pen,
In tracings of eternal light,
Upon the hearts of men.

"Have Hope! Tho' clouds environ now,
And gladness hides her face, with scorn,
Put thou the shadows from thy brow—
No night but hath its morn.

"Have Faith! where'er thy bark is driven—
The calm'e disport—the tempest's mirth—
Know this—God rules the hosts of Heaven,
Th' inhabitants of earth.

"Have Love! Not love alone for one,
But man, as man, thy brother call—
And scatter like the circling sun,
Thy charities on all.

"Thus grave these lessons on thy soul—
Hope, Faith and Love—and thou shalt find,
Strength, when life's surges wildest roll—
Light, when thou else wer't blind!"

THE SPOILED SON.

Mr. Edmund Calamy relates, in his life, that a gentleman named Mart, in whose family he resided for some time, had a son who discovered the most wicked and impious disposition. When confined in prison, he wrote letters professing penitence; but, as soon as he had an opportunity, he returned to his former sins.

This young man had been the darling of both his father and mother; and the latter had set her affections upon him to so great a degree, that when he became a monster of wickedness, she became deranged, and attempted to destroy herself, which she at length effected. So far from being sufficiently impressed with this awful event, her son now proceeded to greater lengths in wickedness. At length he professed to be sorry for his depraved course, and applied to Rev. Samuel Pomfret to intercede for him with his father. He was made ready for sea, but unhappily became connected with a gang of villains, and on the very night before he was to set sail, he robbed Mr. Pomfret, was pursued, tried and condemned to die.

On the Sabbath preceding the Wednesday on which he was condemned to die, his father entreated Dr. Calamy to accompany him that evening to his cell in Newgate, to converse with his unhappy son, and to give his opinion as to the propriety of seeking to obtain his pardon. The doctor went, and found him in a very awful state of mind, resenting different things which he conceived his father had done wrong, and saying that he might obtain pardon for him if he would but part with some of his money. In vain did the doctor expostulate with him on the improper feelings he manifested, and entreated him to humble himself before God on account of his sins, as the only way of obtaining for him a reprieve. His reply was, "Sir, I scorn any thing of that nature, and would rather die with my company."

The doctor reasoned with him on the existence of a hereafter, charged him with the death of his mother, taxed him with the murder of some persons abroad, whose blood he had actually shed, and showed him the heavy punishment he must endure in an eternal world, unless he turned to God, repented of his sins, and prayed for pardon through the atonement of the Lord Jesus. He admitted the truth of all these things, but was filled with trifling unconcern. He frankly said that he had no hope of being better in his character, and that, on the contrary, he was satisfied he should grow worse.

The next morning, he was visited by Dr. Jekyl, who asked him whether, during the whole time he had been confined at Newgate, he had once bowed his knee to the Great God, making it his earnest request to him to give him a sense of his sins, and to create in him a tender heart? He admitted that he had not, nor did he think it of any use. He was promised that if he would engage to pray morning and evening for the grace of God, an effort should be made, with every probability of success, for a reprieve, and subsequently a pardon. But he would make no agreement, and was hung on the day appointed.

On the day of his execution, the father of this unhappy man told Dr. Calamy, that when the culprit was a very young child, he was exceedingly ill with a fever, and that both his wife and himself, thinking their lives were bound up in the life of the child; were exceedingly importunate with prayer that his life might be spared. A pious mother expostulated with him on the vehemence he manifested, and said she dreaded the consequences of praying in such a way, and that it became him to leave the matter to an infinitely wise God. At length the father said, "Let him prove what he will, so he is but spared, I shall be satisfied." The old man added, "This I now see to have been my folly. For, through the just hand of God, I have lived to see this wretched son of mine a heart-breaking cross to them that loved him with the greatest tenderness, a disgrace to my whole family, and likely to bring my gray hairs with sorrow to the grave. I read my sin very distinctly in my punishment; but must own that God is righteous in all his ways, and holy in all his works."

NEW YORK STATISTICS.—There are in New York city 5724 licensed liquor shops, and 851 unlicensed—making a total of 6575, of which number 5160 keep open on the Sabbath. During the year 1852 there were 8754 persons arrested for being intoxicated and disorderly, 4984 for assault and battery, 1218 for assault and interfering with policemen, 3293 for petit larceny, and 3014 for vagrancy. During the same period the visitors of the association for relieving the condition of the poor relieved 3890 families.

The City Inspector reports that during the year 21,601 deaths occurred in the city, of which 19,114 were by disease, and 2487 by other causes. The total for the year is 428 less than the previous year; but it is to be observed that the deaths by disease were 644 more in 1852 than in 1851. The increased fatality of cancer was, during the year, forty per cent., and of scarlet fever from the years 1849 and 1850 to 1851 and 1852, is 115 per cent. The law relating to the registration of births, marriages and deaths, is almost totally disregarded. Among the causes of disease, the Inspector notices underground moisture, bone and flesh-boiling nuisances, slaughter houses, filthy streets, and, above all, spurious milk; with regard to which latter article, he urges the enforcement of the most stringent regulations.

PARTIES IN NEW YORK.—Infant parties are among the latest novelties at New York. A correspondent of the Newark Advertiser recently saw a card of invitation from a lady on the Fifth Avenue, not quite two years of age to another miss of a little past one, requesting the pleasure of her company at a conversazione in seven days thereafter. Thirty of both sexes were to be invited, of about the same blooming age. Dog parties are also mentioned by the same correspondent. A lady, it appears, admits to her society a bonutiful poodle, for which she has a high regard. One day she resolved to show it by inviting twenty-five of the handsomest and most agreeable fellows of the same race to visit her friend. They came, every one; not a single excuse was sent. There were crop-ears and long ones; little puppies and great ones, as will always be the case at parties.

STOCK OF FLOUR AND GRAIN AT THE WEST.—A correspondent of the Albany Evening Journal publishes the following estimate of the present stock of grain and flour at different lake points. The Journal says it is reliable:

"The is of wheat in store at Milwaukee 150,000 bushels; oats 30,000; barley 20,000, and rye 10,000, and about 20,000 barrels of flour. They have 100,000 bushels wheat, 31,000 do. oats, 30,000 do. barley; Kenosha, wheat 25,000, oats 10,000, barley 2,000; Waukegan, wheat 30,000, oats 15,000; barley 5,000; Chicago, wheat 38,000, oats 30,000; Michigan City, wheat 25,000, corn 4,000, oats 6,000. The above is small compared with former years. Nothing of any amount is accumulated on the Southern Michigan and Indiana Railroad. Nothing at Toledo. Not a cargo of grain there. May be considerable in Ohio to come out this spring, but it is yet in farmers' hands. Unless there is considerable from Ohio, receipts of wheat and flour must be light forepart of the season."

We have often heard of trees in Oregon that were so tall that it took two men and a boy to look to the top of them, but the following account of a tree in Jackson county, Indiana, as given by the Jackson County Democrat, is pretty hard to beat in its dimensions:

The largest tree, perhaps, that can be found this side of Oregon, is a Sycamore standing on the land of Stephen Crabb, near this place. It measures eighty-nine feet in circumference and has a cavity measuring in diameter every way twenty-three feet. This tree is large enough to make a commodious depot for the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad. We suggest that it be appropriated to that use.

DEPLORABLE ACCIDENT.—At Jerseyville, Illinois, on the 13th inst., two young children of a Mr. Krodell, of Fieldon—one a boy of four, and the other a girl of two years younger—were so dreadfully burnt during the temporary absence of their parents, that they both expired in the course of a few hours. Just before his death the boy told his mother that his little sister having rocked herself out of the cradle into the fire, he took her in his arms, and carried her out into the snow in order to put out the flames, but without success. It seems therefore, that the noble child lost his own life in his efforts to save that of his sister. The unhappy mother is in a state bordering on insanity.

The Washington Republic of the 16th says that the Captain General of Cuba has notified the American Consul at Havana that in obedience to an order of the Spanish government, no transmission will be given in the mails of that Island to any newspaper unless it be secured with a single band only, in such manner as to admit of its examination without tearing the band or cover; and that if any letter be found therein it will be taken out and properly directed, and the postage charged on it according to the place it comes from. The Captain General further declares that under the name of newspapers (periodicos) all kinds of printed matter will be included. The order went into effect on the 1st instant.

MORMONS.—Three hundred and thirty Mormons arrived at St. Louis on the 18th, from this city. The Republican learns from Mr. Wheelock, late Presiding Elder of the church, that there are six more ships on the way, chiefly freighted with members of this church and their families. He estimates the number expected by those ships at from twenty-five hundred to three thousand. Arrangements are making for the transportation from Europe, next year, of about ten thousand. The growth of this body is one of the most singular novelties of the day.

THE AUSTRALIAN MOVEMENT.—The ships Gem of the Sea, St. Thomas, Florida, flockland, frigate Bird; barks Oregon, Theodosia, Amelia, Huntingdon, Josephine; the three-masted schooner Indianola, and the screw steamer City of Norfolk were up, at last accounts, at New York for Australia. Most of these vessels carry from 150 to 200 passengers, and upwards. The total number of vessels which have left the United States for Australia, since June last, is eighty-four—forty eight of which were from New York city.

The United States Senate on the 17th inst. proceeded in pursuance of an order adopted the day before, to the election of its officers for the Thirty-third Congress. Mr. Asbury Dickens, the old and faithful Secretary, was re-elected without serious opposition—receiving 37 votes out of 42. For the office of Sergeant-at-Arms, the vote was as follows: D. R. McNair, of Kentucky, 24; Robert Beale, 5; scattering, 7. Mr. McNair elected.

Isaac Holland was re-elected Doorkeeper without opposition.

WEEKLY REPORT OF THE CHARITY HOSPITAL: Admissions, 230; discharged, 206; deaths, 29; number remaining, 901. Monthly Report—Admissions, 972; discharged, 807; deaths, 80.

Messrs. Kendall Co., proprietors of the Biloxi Steam Brick Works, have lately sold off all their mules, and to land in a case operations for a time, in consequence of the very heavy stock of the article now in the market.

The Brandon (Miss.) Republican says, that the late heavy rains have caused Pearl river to spread beyond the usual high water bounds, overflowing many plantations and here before inundated since '42.

The Mobile Tribune of the 21st ult., says that there is every probability that Col. Kinney's efforts to establish a line of steamers between Matdle and Corpus Christi—touching at Galveston and Matagorda—will prove successful.

CORPSE FOR THE WORLD'S FAIR.—Col. John Pope, at his plantation, "The Oaks," about four miles distant from Memphis, Tenn., has grown and prepared a bale of cotton destined for the World's Fair, to be held at New York in May next. Col. Pope has taken great pains to put up this bale, as well as the one he sent to the World's Fair at Liverpool, to show the kind of cotton that can be raised in that region of the cotton growing country.

THE WILD MEN OF BORNEO.—The Mob at Jackson, La.—Our readers will recollect we published a few days since a telegraphic dispatch from Baton Rouge, stating that two men having an exhibition at Jackson, the so-called "Wild Men of Borneo" had been set upon by the citizens of that place and severely handled.

On last Tuesday the so-called Wild Men of Borneo were on exhibition in this place and crowds of men went in see them. We had the pleasure, mortification and vexation of seeing and examining them ourselves, and came to the conclusion that they are only pure human beings, though stinted in growth, being dwarfs, and somewhat deformed in their stature.

They were brought to town by two white men, who circulated a handbill stating that they were part "human and part animal," and again that they "have the features of the animal and the intelligence of the human."

During the day, nearly all who came to see these "part human and part animal," these curiosities of the "brute world," convinced themselves that these were human beings kept in ignorance and subjection, and that was their history known. It would be one of cruelty and foul play.

At dark a multitude gathered at the place of exhibition demanding that these beings should be examined by a committee of physicians. The keeper in the ocean time, locked himself in the building with his "wild men," blowed out his lights, and as there was a knocking at the front door, he stowed the dwarfs in a corner and lifting a window in the rear of the building he jumped out and fled. In jumping from the window or in clambering over several fences, he injured his ankle but not severely, and is doubtless before this time well.

In the morning Dr. T. Jones and Dr. L. G. Perkins instituted the examination and came to the conclusion that they were human beings; that they are much stinted in their growth, being dwarfs; that they are slightly otherwise deformed; that they have reason, memory, judgment, will and shame, being very delicate in their feelings and pleading earnestly that they might not be stripped and examined.

The showmen had designed to go on to Clinton, but as there seemed to be a necessity of getting out of town as soon as possible, and as the stage was in town on its way to Baton Rouge, they entered it and went back to the capitol, where they had before exhibited.

The Shreveport South-Western, of the 24th, says Red River is rising at that point and at Fulton. The boatmen have fears that the rise does not extend to the head of navigation.

The survey of the Vicksburg, Shreveport and Texas Railroad has been completed. The engineer's report will be published in a few days.

OPELOUSAS AND GREAT WESTERN RAILROAD.—The Opelousas Whig of the 23d inst. says that this entire work will be ready for contract in few days. The Western route is the one settled upon. The road is located within a few feet of the buildings of Franklin College, and thence in a straight line to the eastern limits of the town of Washington.

All accounts from the interior make mention of heavy rains, and the unusually backward state of vegetation. The crops are in a similar state of backwardness.

Washington Items.

The sale of the household furniture of the late Daniel Webster took place in Washington on Friday, the 18th. Many persons, wishing to possess memorials of him, gave for various articles prices far exceeding their original cost. An ordinary cane-seat chair, with castors (generally occupied by Mr. Webster,) was sold for fifteen dollars; and a time-piece, that could have been put into his overcoat pocket, thirty-nine dollars and fifty cents.

Ion, the well-informed correspondent of the Baltimore Sun, writing under date of the 21st from Washington, says:

The statement to the paper that a treaty, founded upon the contract between the Mexican Government and Colsloo and his mixed company, is before the Senate, is a mistake. The contract and correspondence between the Mexican Minister of Foreign Affairs and Mr. Conkling, in relation to the subject, are before the Senate.

Mr. Conkling has sent no treaty as yet. He is not authorised to make one, but he will transmit whatever project may be offered to him, as a new proposition, and within his instructions.

The Senate is very thin, and is expiring daily by desertion. Seventeen present at the democratic caucus, which regulated the appointment of officers of the Senate, state that no charges were made against Mr. Beall, the late Sergeant-at-Arms.

The appointment of Dudley Mann, as Assistant Secretary of State, is unexceptionable. He is an able and liberal man, and well informed as to foreign affairs. He was the agent selected by the late administration to visit Hungary.

The Sun's correspondent further adds: "The debate on Central American affairs, so fraught with interest, and so productive of alarm, was concluded to-day, by a peace oration from Mr. Everett. Mr. Everett has dispelled the war clouds for the present, and held out a promise and a prospect that the pending question will be settled in a manner consistent with the interests and policy of this country, and of all other parties concerned.

"Mr. Everett says that the overture made by Lord Aberdeen, Government seeks an adjustment of the pending difficulties upon almost any terms; that they are ready to abandon the Mosquito protectorate, and aid in reconciling the conflicting views of the Central American States. Mr. Everett's proposition to send a full minister to Central America for this purpose has been embraced by Congress, and Mr. Everett has no doubt that a proper person, such a person as the President will no doubt appoint, will succeed in this object—one more important, as Mr. E. thinks, than any that the Ministers to European Courts can be charged with.

"If the hostile States be reconciled to terms, the Nicaragua canal, so important as the commerce of all nations, will be prosecuted, and if not, that important work may be considered as indefinitely deferred.

"The Bay Islands affair, Mr. Everett thinks, will be explained, and their colonization abandoned. The Truxillo matter he also explained, as affecting only a disputed right of British subjects to cut logwood in a certain place, and as limited to the object of recalling the force of Mosquitos, until the right in question be properly ascertained.

"In fine, Mr. Everett's speech would seem to show that the Administration and the country will have no trouble in regard to any of these matters.

"Some of the British newspapers have held, and still hold, a different tone. But it is very probable that Mr. Everett's views are correct.

"It will be a surprising event in British history to see her giving up anything, but, in this case, her interests may dictate that policy."

LETTER FROM EX-PRESIDENT FILLMORE.—The Charleston Courier, of the 22d inst., publishes the following letter, received by the Mayor of Charleston, from ex-President Fillmore, in relation to his tour South:

WASHINGTON, March 18, 1853.

Hon. T. L. Hutchinson, Mayor of Charleston: SIR—Your letter of the 16th inst., enclosing a resolution of the Common Council of the city of Charleston, tendering to me in the name of the corporation, the hospitalities of the city has been forwarded to me here, where I am still detained by the severe indisposition of Mrs. Fillmore. I am happy, however, to say, that she is slightly improving, and her physicians give me reason to hope that all immediate danger has passed, and that she may soon be able to travel. Should her health be restored in time to enable me to prosecute my intended journey South, before the weather should become too warm, I shall be happy to avail myself of the generous proffer of the hospitalities of your city; but whether I do or not, I beg leave to return to you, and through you to, the City Council, my unfeigned thanks for this unexpected mark of its respect, and to assure you that I anticipate much gratification in visiting your hospitable and noble city.

I am, respectfully yours,
MILLARD FILLMORE.

CONSTRUCTION OF THE COINAGE LAWS.—Congress having essentially altered the Coinage Laws, and in different acts contradictory, in some respects, it has become important to ascertain what construction the Mint will give to the laws. The following information is given by Geo. N. Eckert, Esq., Director of the U. S. Mint at Philadelphia, in reply to a letter from Messrs. Adams & Co.:

1st. The new currency and coinage laws, relating to silver coins, (fractions of a dollar,) go into operation April 1st. [The Mint has already bought large sums of silver to have a fair start, and some of the new coins will be issued early in April.]

2d. A seigniorage of ½ of 1 per cent. is to be charged on all coin from April 1st. [If this charge excludes the cost of assaying, parting and refining, as it is presumed it will, (now ½ of 1 per cent.) there will be an addition of only ½ per cent. to make the ½ of 1 per cent.]

3d. Bars, ingots, and disks of gold, are to be taxed only the cost of putting "the dust" into that form, which the Mint says will be less than ½ of 1 per cent. Regulations will be issued in a few days.

EXTRA COMPENSATION VOTED BY CONGRESS.—It is stated that over $20,000 were voted at the late session of Congress to its officers and various employees, as extra compensation, and, during a debate in the Senate on the subject, on Wednesday, Mr. Bright said:

"The Secretary, whose salary is $3000, received $5000 extra; another officer, with a salary of $1500, the same amount extra; another, whose salary is $1500, receives $250 extra; and clerks at salaries of $1600, received $250 extra each; and the employees receiving $300 or $400, receive $250 each extra. This too, for the short, as well as the long sessions. Even the gate-keeper, remote from the capitol, got the extra. The Senate had reached a point where the abuse should be checked. If the employees are not satisfied with their regular salaries, there are plenty of well qualified gentlemen who would be glad to fill their places in fifteen minutes."

The Senate, however, has resolved that hereafter no allowance of any kind, beyond the regular compensation, shall be made to any officer of the Senate.

TELEGRAPHIC.

NEW YORK, March 29.

The New York and Havre steam packet Franklin has arrived here, having left Southampton on the 16th, and bringing dates from Liverpool to the 13th instant, inclusive. Her advices state that the Cotton market at Liverpool opened with a dull appearance on Saturday, the 12th, and the sales were barely 4000 bales. There was but little change on Monday, and the sales were limited to 5000 bales, of which 1500 were taken for export; but on Tuesday there was an improved demand, resulting in sales of 8000 bales, one-half of which was for speculation and export. Prices were without alteration since the departure of the Asia, but a better feeling prevailed at the close of the market on Tuesday. Flour was in fair request, and the decline of 1s. per bbl., noticed at the close of the previous week, had been recovered. Wheat had also recovered from the decline previously reported.

General News.

The steamer El Paraguay, Lieut A. Baldwin, U. S. N., sailed from New York on Saturday, the 19th instant, for the Republic of Paraguay, a destination never yet had by any vessel sailing from any North American or European port. She goes, says the New York Courier and Enquirer for the purpose of carrying on a regular trade on the Rio de la Plata and the Paraguay River, between Montevideo and Assuncion, a distance of eleven hundred miles, never yet traversed by steam craft of any description. She will perform a regular monthly trip between the two cities, carrying passengers and freight, and will be the means of opening a commercial communication—which has never yet existed with all the tributaries of the Rio de la Plata—comprising an extent of three hundred thousand square leagues of territory, rich in articles of commercial exchange. She has also been fitted, continues the Courier and Enquirer, especially for this service, and a stauncher craft than she now is could hardly be found. She is two two hundred feet in length by 27 in breadth, and has a cylinder of forty-eight feet, with eleven feet stroke.

She takes with her 25 passengers and 180 tons of coal but will stop for further supplies at Grenada, in the Wind, ward Islands, at Pernambuco and at Montevideo, and her running time to Assuncion will probably be about twenty-eight days. In every respect, both in construction and equipment, she goes completely adapted for her destined service, and, so far as human sagacity can guarantee success, she has, says the Courier and Enquirer, that guaranty.

The Baltimore American says that the contractors for carrying the mail between New Orleans and California, via Vera Cruz and Acapulco, are actively engaged in the necessary preparations. In Mexico the mail company are engaged in making their arrangements with the utmost rapidity, so that in two or three months the road will be stocked completely for the transportation of the mails. On each side of the ocean steamships are now ready.

A proposition has been submitted to a vote of the citizens of Memphis to subscribe $350,000 to the Central Arkansas Railroad. The proposition is one of inestimable benefit to Memphis, and a doubt is barely entertained that it will not meet with a favorable consideration.

I WAIT FOR THEE!

The hearth is swept—the fire is bright,
The kettle sings for tea;
The cloth is spread—the lamp is light,
The white cake smokes in snowdon white,
And now I wait for thee.

Quick, come, love, home, my task is done;
The clock ticks listeningly;
The minutes are shut, the curtain down,
The warm chair to the fireside drawn,
The boy is on my knee.

Come home, love, come; his deep fond eye
Looks round him wistfully,
And when the whispering winds go by,
As if thy welcome step were nigh,
He cries exultingly.

To you he finds the welcome vain,
And cares his glances on mine,
Of earnestly, that yet again
His form unto my heart I strain,
That guess is so like thine.

Thy task is done—we raise thee here;
Where'er thy footsteps roam,
No heart will speak such kindly cheer,
No welcome sound so charming ear,
Like this upon each home.

[illegible] step doth come;
[illegible] the gate to past,
[illegible] with joy at last—
Welcome welcome home!

AL. OF THE FALCON.

Mail Steamship Falcon, Lieut. H. Rodgers, reached her wharf Sunday morning, bringing Havana papers of the 17th instant, and California to the first of March—thirteen days later than previously received.

The Falcon brings the U. S. Mail from California, 200 passengers, and $150,000 on freight and in hands of passengers. The Falcon sailed from Aspinwall on the afternoon of the 19th, at 5 o'clock. The Georgia sailed at the same time for New York, with 550 passengers and $2 600,000 on freight. The steamship Union went to sea on the 18th for Kingston. The roads on the Isthmus are in good condition, and passengers make the passage to and from Panama in ten hours. The health of the town is very good; business is good, and the many buildings that are going up prove at once to the stranger that the town is rapidly progressing.

SAN JOAQUIN.—The City Assessor of this thriving place has made his return, showing the following result:

Real estate, unimproved	$670,867
Improvements	674,840
Personal property	828,900
Total	$2,374,307

The assessment of 1852 amounted to $1,830,572. Thus it will be seen that there has been an increase in taxable property within twelve months of $543,735, or nearly 90 per cent.

BUSINESS AT SACRAMENTO.—The State Journal says the [illegible] streets of Sacramento present stirring and lively scenes. We noticed decidedly a greater number of teams loading than at any time since the flood. The steamboats hitherto plying between Sacramento and Hoboken have drawn off, and no more goods are being transported there. Many buildings [illegible] houses have returned to Sacramento city, and now receive their customers at the old stands.

NEWS from Vancouver's Island reach the 12th. One or two English ships from Liverpool arrived in January with a large number of immigrants.

ARRIVAL OF PASSENGERS.—Since the 1st of January, according to a statement by one of the clerks of the Custom-house, there arrived at San Francisco, by steamers, 5,478 passengers, as follows: Men, 4,695; women, 179; children, 206.

NEW TOWN.—A new town, called Kingsbury, has been surveyed off at the head of navigation on the San Joaquin, about twenty miles below Fort Miller, which promises to become very important from two favorable circumstances. It is at the head of navigation on the river, and at the same time a road has been discovered leading from the proposed direct to King's river, over a high, sandy, level road, composed of a narrow ridge running through the whole length of the route. This road will cut off fifty or seventy miles on the old trail leading up by the foot hills, and which is altogether impassable at present. Kingsbury contains twenty-five or thirty houses, and is destined to engage much attention.

The Superior Court at San Francisco was abolished by the unanimous vote of the Assembly, on the 25th ult.

The weather in San Francisco and through the interior, up to the 22d, continued exceedingly fine; since then there have been occasional showers of rain, retarding business slightly. Business is gradually improving.

RESIGNED.—Dr. Dart, the accomplished Superintendent of Indian Affairs in Oregon, has forwarded his resignation to Washington, which is to take effect on the 30th of March.

WILLIAM H. Hamilton, one of the editors of the San Francisco Herald, died on board the Golden Gate, of yellow fever, on the 15th inst., having been sick only two days. Every attention which friendship could dictate or humanity afford, were paid him in the last moments of that beloved man, whose loss is deeply deplored.

The Monumental City steamship sailed on the 16th ult. for Australia, under the conduct of Mr. Peter Strobel. Over 400 souls, passengers and crew, are on board. The ship has been despatched by the owners, Messrs. Sherwood & Sutherland, in the Express Company to establish a regular communication. The News Letter will follow in the Monumental City on the 5th of March. Both take many passengers. Numerous sailing vessels are now loading for Australia.

The rising population of San Francisco turned out en masse on the occasion of the Anniversary of Washington's birth-day. The Stevens was in business transacted during the day.

The citizens of Sacramento are organizing a Plank Road Company to connect that City with Nevada.

The steamboats on the route from San Francisco to Sacramento, lately reduced the fare to fifty cents in the cabin, have, however, been restored to the old rates.

There have been no disturbances of the public peace in this city of any unusual character.

MINING INTELLIGENCE.

Miners are still yielding richly to the industrious and well-persevering laborer.

FINE RICHES is the name of a rich ravine near Diamond Springs, which is now worked with great advantage. Gold Flat, at the head of the place, is paying the miners handsomely. Yankee Slide, at Middle Fork, is yielding large quantities. At Mazon Slide, twenty miles above Georgetown, claims have been sold as high as three thousand dollars each.

The claims at Big Canon have been retaken, and are now worked with profit. They have not been touched since 1849 and 1850.

New and rich diggings have been discovered at a place called Poor Man, two miles east of Placerville. The gold is very fine.

The election of last Republican that considerable excitement exists among the miners in regard to the new digging at Curtisville. It is said three Mexicans took out three days. A gentleman, upon whose word we have no reason to be placed, had the curiosity, while passing the camp, to [illegible] and examine the hole from which the treasure was said to have been taken. While he was there three pieces were picked out, the largest being [illegible] as a brick.

The Columbia Gazette we extract the following:

INDIAN MEAL.—On Sunday last three Frenchmen brought in a lump of gold weighing 240 ounces, and valued at $4,800. This specimen is in a small gulch about one mile from [illegible].

MINE.—This remarkable hill still pays in places [illegible] have been dug to the depth of seventy feet, and [illegible] found at the bottom.

MAMMOTH.—Some ounce lumps was found on this gulch a day or two since.

BIG STRIKE.—Two Mexicans commenced sinking a hole on Saturday last below Campo Seco, on the other side of Coleman's gulch, near Page's Ranch, and struck a pocket from which they took out by 12 o'clock on Thursday [illegible] one piece of which weighed eight pounds.

MAMMOTH.—The claims at and around the camp are still paying well. Counter & Co. took out a lump a day or two since, weighing 16 ounces. The same day they made a [illegible] lump. On Wednesday last Lincoln & Co. had in their essential specimens of pure gold which weighed at least [illegible] ounces. The same day they washed out $ [illegible] of fine gold from the same claim.

A lump of gold weighing 247 ounces, was picked up at Rich Bar, in the vicinity of Bongara, last week, valued at $4,940 [illegible].

YANK ROBINSON'S CAMP.—We are glad to see that [illegible] are beginning to roll out in our favored vicinity. A [illegible] was shown on Monday last by Mr. Todd, an irregular [illegible] piece of gold, weighing 110 ounces and 14 dwts.; coming from Tennessee Flats, and purchased by that gentleman at the rate of $7 per ounce. On Sunday last we were shown by Mr. Saltzgiver, a piece weighing 297 ounces, taken from the Yankee Slide diggings, and containing not more than one-third part rock.

ROBBERIES, MURDERS, ETC.

There appears to be a well organized band of Mexican robbers in the Southern counties headed by a desperate character called Joaquin, plundering and butchering every American found unprotected. Parties have been [illegible] and rewards have been offered for Joaquin's head, but he has so far eluded them.

The Governor had offered a reward of $1,000, but at last accounts this noted bandit still pursued his career of crime, and each day's intelligence from the interior [illegible] a fresh story of some new deed of atrocity. There are said to be white men acting with him, but the Blacks [illegible] with all the advantages they possess, that it will not be many days before the entire party are caught and brought to the condign punishment their crimes deserve. They will be hunted down like wolves and will receive as little mercy.

The following are some of the recorded exploits of Joaquin and his band:

ROBBERY MURDER AND ROBBERIES.—On Sunday, Feb. 22, 1853 the large parties from this town and vicinity, who have for the last week been scouring the country in pursuit of the Mexican robbers, though successful in capturing but one, (who was hung in Jackson last Tuesday) have still been the means of expelling them from the north side of the Mokelumne river. Not a murder or robbery has been committed in this vicinity for the last four days.

One of Joaquin's party, who had been severely wounded in a skirmish a few days ago, was captured near Kea Andreas on Sunday, and hanged the same day. He made a full confession, and gave an accurate description of Joaquin and thirteen of his party, which will be of much advantage in detecting the others.

Last night Joaquin and his party attacked a Chinese camp, near Norman's Ranch, killed five Chinamen, and wounded five others, some of them mortally, and robbed them of seven thousand dollars. We have just seen a letter from Mr. Allen, of Norman's, detailing the affair, and calling on the people of San Andreas for assistance, and for [illegible] to attend the wounded Chinamen. Several citizens [illegible] were stolen by the same party from American [illegible] Maria Camp, on Sunday.

The secret of Joaquin's successful escapes seems to be in his always being well mounted. As soon as his party ride down one set of horses, they immediately procure others. The horses deserted by them are generally used up, and of no value. Probably a hundred horses have been stolen in this county the past month by this band and at least thirty persons have been murdered.

Large parties are still in pursuit of him, and his escapes seem almost miraculous. When this state of things will end, no one can tell. In haste, yours, S N

Republican contains a few letters from Mokelumne Hill, the immediate vicinity of the Mexican robber Joaquin's depredations. One dated February 16 says:

The company that left this place on foot Monday last to pursue the robbers returned to-day, but brought no news of any particular importance except what had reached us before.

Another letter to the same paper, under date of 17th, gives further intelligence upon this matter:

Again has the sad intelligence been brought to me of another foul and daring addition to the black catalogue of crimes in this country. A German who was yesterday traveling in broad day on the Sacramento road, when about two miles from Jackson, was stopped by two Mexicans, knocked down and ordered to deliver his money on penalty of being shot. He was robbed of six hundred dollars.

A teamster, who was last seen on the Sacramento road, near Jackson, is missing, and it is feared that he has met an untimely fate. His wagon remains near where he was last seen, but he and his animal are missing.

A party of five men from Murphy's camp passed through this place to-day on their way to the scene of depredations, determined on the capture of Joaquin and his band.

A letter from Mokelumne Hill to the Republican, under date of February 23, says:

The company of six that left this place under the direction of C. A. Clark, to hunt up the murderers, returned this evening after an absence of six days. The party in pursuit went on Monday, by way of Double Springs, to Forman's ranch, where they stopped for the night. A short distance from Forman's, four Chinamen were murdered, and four or five others wounded. The party in pursuit followed on the trail of the villains immediately, but lost it and were obliged to remain till daylight before they could continue the march.

Towards evening they came upon the robbers again, in the vicinity of Reynolds's Ferry, and found them in the act of robbing three Chinamen, [illegible] they been mounted upon fresh horses at the time, the robbers might have been captured, but with animals that had been jaded by a week's search among the mountains, the capture was impossible, for the robbers were mounted on fine horses and understood the country trails, and the best mode of escape. It is reported that a robbery was committed at Mokelumne this morning.

INDIAN OUTRAGES.—FROM THE NORTH.—A correspondent of the State Journal, under date of the 20th, writes from Shasta:

The Indians on the Sacramento route to Yreka, near the Sugar Loaf, some three days since, attacked a train belonging to Horsley & Delop, but were finally repulsed, not however until they had killed six mules.

On the same day they attacked another train belonging to Archer & Owen, the result of which was the killing of Owen, the wounding of one of the men in the left shoulder and driving off the entire lot of pack mules. There were but three men in the train, Mr. Rhodes' informant being one, he saving his life by flight.

The remains of the unfortunate Owen, who was highly esteemed wherever known, were found the next day and decently interred.

One of the party of the train, the day after the difficulty, met three miners who had in their possession three of the mules and their packs, which they refused to give up until rewarded for their capture. They alleged that they wrested the mules from the savages by force, and killed one of their number in the encounter.

The Sacramento route between Shasta and Yreka is extremely hazardous. Open hostility has been declared by the Indians, and murders and depredations ensue whenever an opportunity occurs.

AGRICULTURE.—The Stockton Joucual says:

The farming interest in this State is developing new sources of profit to the thrifty agriculturist, and our soil this year will almost supply the market with all the grain required. It is a matter of astonishment how rapidly the land is being taken up and improved; how fast this wilderness is becoming the abode of hardy men and industrious, intelligent women; how great the transition from its past barrenness to its present health and value. Our steamer Star State, with a number of our citizens, [illegible] to-day on their way to the scene of depredations, determined on the capture of Joaquin and his band.

We copy the following account of another steam boiler explosion from the Galveston News of the 24th instant, received Monday by the steamship Texas. The News says:

We have to record the most dreadful explosion that has ever taken place in Texas. The steamers Neptune and Farmer again undertook to race last night, coming from Houston to Galveston.

About 11 o'clock the Farmer blew up a little west of Pelican Island, in sight of Galveston.

The number of killed and wounded has not yet been ascertained. The Neptune was closely by when the explosion took place, and immediately took off the survivors and some of the killed and wounded.

Among the killed were S. E. Hart, W. Hubby, T. Hale, the assistant bar-keeper, and several others.

Missing and supposed to be killed, are Capt. Webb, the commander; Thomas Critchard, the clerk; Josh Robertson, who kept a coffee-house in this city; Wm. Warner, second engineer, and C. H. Storms.

Among the wounded are Mr. Dixon; flakemen, the mate; Curtis, the engineer; McCormick, the pilot; G. Hunter, of Cincinnati, and McReynolds.

The ladies all escaped unhurt. We learn that the Neptune was about an hour employed in taking off the killed and wounded. The scene of distress is described as heart-rending in the extreme. The Neptune returned immediately after discharging her passengers, to renew the search for the missing, and has not yet got back. She is now in sight, as we write, together with some part of the Farmer's wreck.

We learn that there were some fifty passengers on the Farmer, but we cannot get a list of names.

Mr. E. M. Stackpole was slightly wounded. It is said that he was expostulating with Capt. Webb against such reckless exposure of the lives of his passengers, when the boat blew up, and was getting the passengers to sign a written protest.

Since writing the above, we learn that Mr. Dixon is not expected to survive, and that Mr. McReynolds is very badly, though, it is hoped, not fatally injured.

We have just seen Mr. Weskop, the steward of the Farmer, who is very badly wounded, and can hardly be recognised. Wm. Hale, assistant steward, is also badly wounded, one leg being broken. His recovery is doubtful.

Mr. Hunter, of Cincinnati, is severely hurt. Mr. Norman, of Maine, has had to have his arm amputated.

James Cotton, of Houston, is one of the missing.

Mr. Geary, formerly connected with the Journal, of this city, is also among the missing.

Half-past 7, A. M.—The Neptune has just come in, with the body of Mr. Sternes, the only one of the missing that has been found. Nothing can be seen of Capt. Webb or the rest. All the forward part of the Farmer is blown to atoms.

It is the opinion of all whom we have seen that fully half of the passengers are lost.

1 o'clock, P. M.—Since the above was issued, we have the following additional particulars:

Mr. Dunlevy, carpenter, is among the missing.

Phillipi Mandus, a Mexican, from Gaudalajara, employed in the steward's department, died this morning about 10 o'clock.

The mail, books papers and money are lost. The ladies are also totally gone. We add the following names of some of the passengers of the Farmer, who are saved.

C. M. Hubby, Wm. Snodgrass, Mr. McGown, Mr. Thos Martin, Rev. Mr. Petway, Mr. Charles Brainerd, Mr. Turley, (slightly hurt.) Mr. J. P. Davis, Mr. Stansbury, S. A. Nichols, Gen. Sherman.

Ex-dov. Wood, with some two or three others left the Farmer while the boats were locked together and were on the Neptune when the accident took place.

PASSENGERS WOUNDED.—Geo. Hunter, of Cincinnati, severely scalded; Mr. McReynolds, of Galveston do., and leg broke; E. M. Stackpole of Palestine, slightly hurt; Mr. Doenum, of Mo., arm amputated since; Geo. Morgan, of Houston, slightly scalded; Dr. Juuman, of Crockett, slightly hurt; G. W. Grubbs, of Yazoo City, thigh broken.

LATER—DEATH AND MUTILATION.—Friday Morning, 25th inst. The steamer Star State, with a number of our citizens, spent most of yesterday at the wreck, and at night came in with five dead bodies, Mr. Cottoe, Mr. Geary, and three negroes. She also brought some of the furniture of the Farmer. She has again returned this morning to the wreck with a common, in hopes of raising the bodies of the rest of the missing. Since of yesterday we have obtained the following particulars; G. W. Grubbs, of Yazoo City, Miss., thigh broken; T. F. Royel, of Yazoo City, uebort.

Mr. Woodward, Manager of the Houston Railroad Company, is missing.

O. St. John, formerly of lynchburg, but residing at Bellville, Austin county, died last night at 11 o'clock.

There are yet many passengers whose names cannot be learned. They were mostly strangers, and their names will probably be found on the registers of the Houston hotels.

THE BOAT'S CREW.—Thirteen of the Farmer's crew have been killed. In addition to those already named are the following: Lewis Hildebrand, Charles Swiser, and one name unknown. Also, two negroes of Mrs. Gardiner; one negro of Captain George Dalesdernier; one negro of Jas. Cox, of Houston; one negro of Thomas Westrop, died yesterday.

Of the crew saved without injury, are three negroes of Thomas Westrop; one negro of Mrs. Gardiner; one negro of Col. John Manly; one negro of Captain Brown; second cook, name not known; Frita, a German, was wounded; also another German was slightly hurt.

Messrs. McReynolds, Dixon, Hale and Huntee are all considered in a very critical condition.

Passengers killed, whose bodies have been found, 8; officers and crew killed, 13.

Passengers escaped, including wounded, 20; adding to these eight killed, and supposing, according to the best information, that the total number of passengers was 45, we have 17 others missing, and consequently killed, making the total number of souls lost 36.

FURTHER.—The steamer Star State again returned from the wreck of the Farmer, at half-past two o'clock this afternoon, bringing the bodies of Captain Webb, Thomas Critchard, Clerk; A. F. Dunlevy, carpenter, and a German, (name unknown) who was a passenger.

Three of these bodies were found by grappling about sixty yards ahead of the wreck.

It is known that there were five others killed whose bodies have not been recovered. One of these, the second engineer, it is supposed was blown to atoms, as the bricks of the furnace were scattered with much apparent force in the direction of his usual position.

It is believed that but a small amount of money was in the Clerk's charge, as the safe which Mr. Pritchard, the second Clerk, had formerly held the key of was sold in Houston, and Mr John, the chief Clerk of the Farmer, remained here on her last trip, and held the key of the other. As the second Clerk had then no safe in which to deposit money, it was presumed that he would not receive any large amount.

THE MAILS.—Mr. Cleveland, our Deputy Marshal, who was dispatched to Hollvar by our Postmaster, to obtain the letter mail found there by Lerl Parr, has returned. The lock of the bag appeare to have been blown off, but the packages of letters, so fac as casual observation could determine, appear to be safe.

John Bolivar beach for miles is strewn with fragments of the wreck. The pieces are generally as small as wood would be split for kindling purposes.

We understand a jury of inquest have been empanneled, and are now taking testimony. We trust the examination of witnesses will not stop till the causes of this fearful calamity are fully exposed to the public.

THE LATE TROUBLE AT HONDURAS.—By the brig Helen Jane, from Truxillo, Honduras, Feb. 27, which arrived at New York on the 19th inst., we have the following account of the trouble on the Mosquito coast:

About four months since the Commandant at Truxillo, dispatched troops to Limas, on Romain river, to put a stop to the cutting of mahogany by the English, they refusing to pay the duty enacted by Honduras, on the ground that the place belonged to the Mosquito King, which Honduras always denied.

The English cutters were driven off—the English flag hauled down, and the Honduras troops permanently stationed there. The mission of the British elsewhere Devastation, at Truxillo, was to demand the immediate withdrawal of the troops from himas, with the intimation that if the demand was not complied with by 12 o'clock, the English commandee would proceed to remove them by force. It also stated that no claim for damages to English subjects, would be made. He likewise demanded that English subjects should not hereafter be interfered with. The Commandant of Truxillo complied with the demand under protest, and the troops at himas were removed. The people of Honduras claim Limas as indisputably a part of Honduras, and deny the right of the English to cut the valuable mahogony without paying the usual duty.

A THRILLING INCIDENT.—A correspondent of the St. Louis Republican relates the following incident as having happened at Jefferson Barracks, a few miles below that city, a few days ago:

The old flag staff at the Barracks had been shaking and tapping all winter, and the day being calm the General had a party detailed to take it down.

A soldier, Michael McAnally, of Col. Dragg's battery, accordingly mounted in the cross-trees and unshipped the top-mast; from some cause it became unmanageable and glided through the platform to the ground. The man at the mast-head kept his post composedly and gave timely warning to the party below "to stand from under." Nine out of ten men with a spar fifty feet long shooting and rasping like an arrow through their hands, with an insecure footing at a dizzy height, would have "left the yard" and tumbled from the platform.

While the party below were removing the top-mast, to the disney and consternation of the by-standers, the main-mast with the soldier still poised at the mast-head, now swayed over, broke short off at its base, and plunged with a tremendous crash to the ground.

The soldier in the mean time was seen to change his position as the mast went over, and sireling high through the air with frightful velocity, in with perfect self possession adjusted himself to clear the frame-work of the cross-trees, and as the mast neared the ground, he, evidently with a well measured leap, alighted with safety amidst his comrades. All were startled with amazement, as much by the intrepidity displayed, as by the imminent peril it severed.

The main-mast was forty-eight feet high; the soldier landed at fifty feet from its base.

The spiritual rappings are o topic now every where, and some queer scenes are described in Kittion to them. A fortnight ago a "circle" commenced operations in Tullytown (N. J.) and several of the "unbelievers" were permitted to be present. After various interrogatories, to which no satisfactory answer was given, one of the party put the following question: "Will the spirit inform us who is present in this room?" A rapping so loud commenced as to alarm several women who were present. All were silent and eager to hear the answer. The spirit finally answered, "The Devil!" A dead silence ensued, while all present gazed intently upon each other. At last one of the unbelievers groaned in a very unnatural tone, whereupon the whole party fled. One man ran all the way to Morrisville, and declared to his neighbors that the devil had kept close upon his heels the whole distance.

THE SMALL POX.—The Oglethorpe (Georgia) Democrat of the 10th inst. says: "By a private letter received at this place a day or two since, we learn that a case of small pox has occurred at Albany. We also learn from a reliable source that there are eight cases in the northern part of Macon county—all of whom are considered convalescent by the attending physician."

CONSULSHIPS OF THE UNITED STATES.—We see it stated that the most lucrative of our Consulships is that at Panama, which is rated at between thirty-five and one hundred thousand dollars per annum. Havana is next, then Liverpool, and afterwards in order come Buenos Ayres, Matanzas, Havre, Alexandria, and Hong Kong, or Canton. The commercial agency at St. Thomas, Danish West India Islands, is said to be worth from six to ten thousand dollars a year.

One hundred tons of copper from North Carolina were sold in New York a few days ago for $18,000, at the rate of $180 per ton. This copper was mined in the course of two months, at an expense of about $1000. Such a result proves that mining may, in this country, be made as profitable an enterprise as it is in England.

It is stated that Gen. Abner Curtis, a great shoe manufacturer of East Abington, Mass., has issued proposals to some twenty or thirty young men in his manufacturing warehouse, that if they will, the current year, be prudent, economical, and faithful in their duties—show a balance sheet of savings, individually, of one hundred and fifty dollars, and consummate marriage on or before the first day of January next ensuing, then he will add, as a New Year's present, a house lot upon his domain, and one hundred dollars for the purpose of assisting in the erection of a cottage-house, severally, to his corps of assistants aforesaid.

His Majesty, the King of Sweden, has ordered that the Swedish navy co-operate with Lieut Maury by making observations for his wind and current charts. These observations are to be kept in the form of the "Abstract log" prescribed by our Navy Lieutenant. They are to be sent to the Academy of Sciences at Stockholm, and after having been discussed by that body, the results are to be communicated to the Superintendent of the National Observatory at Washington.

A Commercial Convention has been concluded between the United States Government and the Government of the Netherlands, for goods and merchandize, whatever their origin may be, imported into or exported from the ports of the United States, from and to any other country, in vessels of the Netherlands, or reciprocally in vessels of the United States, from or into the ports of the Netherlands, shall pay no higher or other duties than shall be levied on the like goods and merchandise imported or exported in national vessels.

It is alleged that railroads in four of the avenues to New York were obtained from the Common Council by bribes amounting to several hundred thousand dollars, and that those members who voted for the Broadway Railroad, are to receive $20,000 each in its stock, in addition to what they have already received. The Sunday Atlas mentions one member who was $5000 worse off than nothing when elected, but in one year has become rich by selling his votes.

The omnibus system of New York seems to be declining, since the establishment of street railroads, through various public avenues of travel. The largest omnibus firm, that of Kipp & Brown, have discontinued their Greenwich street line, and stopped twenty of their stages within a few months. Last year, there were running within the city 25 different lines, employing 550 omnibuses, and paying, in the aggregate, $10,500 for licenses.

Capt. Ericsson has made a contract with the Navy Department to construct for the government a caloric engine of sixty-horse power—such an engine as Capt. E. proposes to apply to a screw frigate. This engine, the New York Tribune says, is to be made forthwith and sent to Washington, to be put up in the navy yard before the next meeting of Congress.

True happiness is of a retired nature, and an enemy to pomp and noise. It arises, in the first place, from the enjoyment of one's self, and in the next, from the friendship and conversation of a few select companions. Rare happiness loves to be in a crowd, and to draw the eyes of the world upon her; she does not receive any satisfaction from the applause which she gives herself, but from the admiration which she raises in others.

The steamship Pacific sailed from New York at noon on the 19th instant for Liverpool, with one hundred passengers, but no specie. Among the passengers were Herman D. Abbott, Esq., bearer of despatches, and his brother, Jacob Abbott, Esq., the author of various educational works chiefly historical. The visit of these gentlemen to Europe is connected with literary and scientific pursuits.

The returns of the General Post-office, England, for the year 1852, give additional proof of the efficacy of the penny postage system in every respect. In 1839 the number of letters was 76,000,000; in 1840, first year of the new system, 160,000 000; in 1845, the number reached 271,500,000; in 1850 it was 347,000,000; and in 1852 it had increased to 379,500 000.

Congress has prescribed the Ailanthus tree in an especial act. To the item in the Civil and Diplomatic bill, providing for setting out the public grounds in Washington with trees, is the condition: "That no more ailanthus trees shall be purchased or planted in the public grounds."

It is stated that the annual cost of the army and navy of the United States per head for the population is 67 cents. The expense of the same establishments to Great Britain and Ireland per head is $2 56; to France, $2 19; to Germany $3 32

A METHODIST CLASS.

What is a class?

A band of saints, united each to each
In heart, by cords of Christian sympathy;
United all to God! In motive, deed,
And aim, coincident. Their common rule
Of life, the word of God; their power to act,
His grace; their highest end, His praise.
Like those
In days of Malachi, the seer, they meet
To tell the battles fought with adverse powers—
The world, the devil, flesh and sin; of fierce
Temptation with its deadly scenes: the scourge
Of persecution, and the lash of scorn;
Affliction's furnace, and its seething heat;
Mental anguish, and the doubts and fears
That spring from absent faith. Sometimes they mourn
A heart deceitful, cold, repulsive, hard,
That will not yield to God; complain of prayer
Which seeds not up the incense cloud to heaven;
Unbelief, that blights their peace of mind,
And leaves an aching void; of struggles oft
'Twixt duty and desire—the spirit and
The flesh—corruption and the grace of God.
Sometimes they speak of joys far better felt
Than told; of pardon, peace and happiness,
Of carnal minds unknown; of intercourse
With Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; of hopes
That gild the path to heaven; of prospects bright,
And full of blissful immortality.
From Pisgah's top they view the promised land,—
Anticipate its pure unmingled joys.
Hence they learn the nature and design
Of God's discipliceary plan; that woes
And weals together blent promote the end
Of life; that trials borne submissively
Are blessings in disguise; that chastening is
A pledge of God's unchanging love. 'Tis here
That each gains counsel, motive, courage, power,
To trace his passage to the skies, and scale
The mount of heaven!" And thus the little band
Knit up in fellowship divine—matured
In grace, and fashion'd by the hand of God,
Go forth in full relief the character
And power of gospel Christianity.

HISTORY OF METHODISM.

In the April number of the National Magazine, Rev. Dr. Durbin submits an interesting, learned, and valuable historical sketch of Methodism in the United States. He writes originally to the Editor of the Magazine, who had inquired, Why American Methodism has not done more in the Missionary Cause?

In answer to the question, Why has it not done more in the Missionary Cause? I offer the readers a few remarks.

It is not yet seventy years since the Methodist Episcopal Church was organized in America. Up to 1784 she had no existence as a Church; there were about thirteen hundred members of the Society scattered through the length and breadth of the Colonies, and the Canadas, the oversight of whom was committed to about one hundred men authorized to preach the gospel, among whom were only a dozen were ordained to the ministry. These Societies assembled in private houses for worship, and there heard the Word preached. They had not probably one meeting-house, or as they were usually called from the old country, a meeting-house in the land. In 1784 the Church was regularly organized in the States, and a ministry regularly ordained. From this time, say sixty-nine years ago, we may date the existence of a Church, and began to grow and expand as such. Of necessity our growth was by accessions from without; made by planting ourselves in the older communities of the land, and by advancing westward with the new settlements and forming beyond the Alleghanies in the great Basin of the Mississippi and its tributaries. Thus our whole movement was missionary, acting upon the people without and with those forming the new States and Territories. Is this stage of our growth as a Church could not have done any thing else; it was a necessity—the law of our condition and mission. We were, successively, in our infancy and youth, and advancing to maturity; and in this condition our increase was necessarily from without—not from within—not from communion by the children born within us. This was our missionary work—done within the borders of our own land. Of course, but not the less a missionary work, and a very great one, too.

The first thirty or forty years, after our organization as a Church, were passed in the work of acquiring a communion of our own gathering in members from the people among whom we executed our mission. These now began to appear everywhere as our Church was coming to maturity; and most of the institutions and arrangements of the well-organized and established communion began to be felt and expressed. The circuits began to yield up their towns to stations, city churches, which had been formed as circuits, began to separate into distinct charges; Conferences began to feel the need of schools and academies for their children within the congregations, or to be sent from without. In brief process of time colleges were required, and then universities, and they were produced; for the growth had arrived at that point they necessarily arose within her limits, if she meant to maintain herself in the execution of her mission.

As she was thus executing her divine mission, some thirty years ago, she entered formally into the modern missionary enterprise by the formation of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Her first formal missionary efforts were necessarily directed to her home work, and she did not enter upon the foreign work until Providence called her to establish a mission in Liberia, in Africa. Thus growing, first by spreading among the people and advancing into new countries, and then advancing to maturity by a rapid and vigorous internal growth, she, within a few years past, has become conscious of her mature and permanent existence in the land, and with this condition she is becoming conscious of her responsibilities and duties as a permanent living body as a Church, and is feeling that she is called to exercise her foresight and judgment, and to take her station and post as a mature and full-grown Church of our Lord Jesus Christ.

It is only within a few years that she has reached this maturity, and awoke to a consciousness of her responsibility and duty growing out of her mature and strong condition: It could not have been otherwise, as will appear from this single fact: Taking the whole body of Methodists in the United States, they have grown in seventy years from thirteen thousand to one million two hundred thousand members, besides the many hundreds that have died during the seventy years of her growth. A body growing so rapidly and vastly, in so short a time, could not have attended to any thing but its own interior growth, and the perfecting of its own organization.

That you may conceive of the greatness of this growth, and the extent and vigor of the organization, I will note the population it includes. The lowest rule of estimate for the population of a church is three hearers in the congregation, including men, women and children, to one communicant. By this rule the population of the Methodist Episcopal Church is one million two hundred thousand members; three hearers for one member would be three million six hundred thousand—add these two numbers together, and we have four million eight hundred thousand people composing the congregations and families of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Let us make a deduction of eight hundred thousand, and then one-sixth part of the whole population of the States and Territories are now settled in the bosom of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and look to us for their religious instruction and comfort.

I have made this exposition simply to show that the condition of the Church since her organization has been one of unparalleled acquisition and growth, and that her whole attention and strength were necessarily absorbed in her own development; but, having attained to maturity, she is now called to wider and more vigorous action in the missionary cause.

I cannot conclude these remarks on the progress, the present condition, and the future duties of the Methodist Episcopal Church, without referring to another product of her growth—I mean her growth in wealth.

About two months since I said in a public missionary discourse that the Methodist communion, taken as a whole body, was the wealthiest Church in this country. This declaration was received with great surprise, general incredulity, and some little censure. A few weeks afterward an abstract of the returns of the census of the United States, taken by the General Government in 1850, was published in which my opinion was fully sustained. It was ordered that the value of the property of each Church should be returned in the census: the value of the property of the several Churches may be fairly taken as an index of the wealth of their respective populations. This being the rule of estimate, we find the census returns make the Methodist Church the wealthiest in the land. I will give the whole table, and ask attention to the fourth column, headed—"Total Value of Church Property:"

I am aware that the remarks and results given above will surprise almost everybody, and confound many; but a moment's reflection will explain the whole matter. The general opinion has been that the Methodist Church is not rich, nay, even is poor because but few remarkably rich persons are found in her communion. But we do not note the vast number of her members, viz: twelve hundred thousand, and the vast numbers besides that compose her congregations. The wealth of the whole body distributed among so many hundreds of thousands does not attract attention in any one church, or city, or town, as is the case often times in other churches. The great wealth of individuals in some other churches, and their munificent donations, together with the grandeur of their church-edifices, attract public attention. In the Methodist Church this is rarely if ever the case. Our people, considered individually as persons or churches, are not wealthy; but, being sober and industrious, most of them have substance, and many of them are rich, and the aggregate wealth of so large a body is very great. This explains how we are, contrary to common opinion, the wealthiest Church in the country, as shown by the census of the United States.

I am aware that there will be some incredulity still on this subject, particularly in the Eastern States. Perhaps this may be partly removed by the following fact: our Church in the West and South is very far richer in proportion than in the East. Our people were in the West from the beginning, and grew up with the country, and increased in wealth with the wealth of the country. The greatest part of the wealth of the Methodist Church is in the West and South. She will shortly come to understand this matter, and act accordingly.

The conclusion of the whole matter is this: the Church can never fulfill, as she ought, her great mission, until the contributions of her people shall be as general as the distribution of her wealth among them. Now, the great mass of our people do not contribute to any of the general or extraordinary objects among us, except the penny or shilling they throw into the public collection on the occasion. The well-being of the Church, the better and more steady support of her ministry, and of all her great enterprises, call upon her pastors, and leading members, to use their best and persevering endeavors to train our people to a regular and systematic support of all our Church enterprises, according to the ability of each one. This is the secret of the great success of our Wesleyan brethren in England in their financial affairs, and will explain how the Roman Catholic Church in this country creates such splendid church-edifices, schools, and colleges. Every man, woman and child, contributes, systematically, according to the ability of each. They do not receive large sums of money from Europe, as is supposed by many; the money is contributed by themselves here in our midst. Let the Methodists take note and learn.

Yours, etc., J. P. DURBIN.

FINE MATCHES—GOOD CHANCES.

Mrs. Alvarez: "Is it not natural for a mother to wish her only daughter the fairest fortune?"

Mrs. Alvin: "But what is that fairest fortune is the question?"

Among the visitors at my father's house was a Methodist lady, who was very interesting; the object of my childish admiration. Her personal appearance was fine; her manners pleasing—even bewitching, from the mixture of dignity and child-like earnestness. Her house was the Methodist preacher's home; and she their warm-hearted sister. Wealth, and a good position among men, were hers; and she approciated those advantages at their full value—perhaps above it. She made a mistake in the matter of her daughter's settlement in life, which led me to think that wealth, and family influence, held too high a place in her esteem. In appearance this daughter realized the poet's dream of beauty:

"Her form was so distinctly wrought,
That one might almost say her body thought."

Her beautiful appearance only indicated her beautiful disposition.

"None knew her but to love her."

As was natural this fair girl did not lack for suitors: one of her lovers was a young lawyer. He had a handsome address; was intelligent, agreeable, and splendid looking; but he was poor—wanted the chief attraction in the eyes of those who estimate worth by the acre.

But, Lulu loved him. Poor, unsophisticated, young creature! Love—the great leveler—taught her that intelligence, manliness, wit, and amiability, had made him the choice of her heart. To him she plighted her troth.

Another suitor appeared on the carpet. He was the mother's choice for her fair young daughter. And what was he? He was not agreeable in manners; he was not intelligent; he was a great awkward, untaught, young man,—with great freckled hands, and an ill temper; was of an aristocratic family. He was rich; and because he was rich, and had what is called position, and influence, Lulu's friends wished her to marry him. Alas! alas! it boots not tell the arguments that were used to induce her to give up her heart's chosen companion for one, at whom her whole nature revolted. Many were her struggles between her love to her mother, and her betrothed. Wearied out, at last, she discarded the poor, young lawyer. It is an old story—as old, I suppose, as our sin-stained world, in which altars are reared to Mammon in almost every house, and young hearts are laid upon them, even by fond parents.

Lulu, in about a week from the time that she gave up her brightest hopes of happiness in life, gave her hand to her wealthy lover—then she died! With that sacrifice, all life's interest, and charm died for her. True, she breathed, and moved, on earth for perhaps two years; but such being was existence—it was not life!

I saw her at our school; she came to call on some relatives. Poor, blighted lily! she looked as if the storm had past over her, and bowed her head to earth; but she tried to be cheerful, and to appear happy. Since I know of her sad story, I have disliked to hear tell of "fine matches"—"good chances," etc.

I have noticed that those who marry for wealth are always disappointed. Either the tempers are incompatible, the health fails, or the riches suddenly melt away. I have been an attentive observer, I think, and nine times out of ten, one or other of these disasters occur.

Don't take me for a romantic young lady, or old lady, either. But, I think, in a connection so sacred, to make dollars and cents a motive, is sacrilege. A prudent regard to the means of future livelihood should govern those who are about to enter into the bonds of matrimony. But never, never, should wealth be the inducement.

Mary.

Clinton, La., March 31, 1853.

GREEN OLD AGE.

"A hundred years, a hundred years—
How much of human power and pride,
Of lowering hopes of trembling fears
Has sunk beneath its whelming tide."

It is a common instance of the inconsistency of human desires, that although almost every person would wish for long life, yet no one likes to become old. It is true, that men sometimes are proud of gray hairs, because they think these will give the reputation of experience and wisdom, and thus, they shall be more likely to obtain some office or object of their ambition, which depends on the respect and confidence of their fellow men.

But women, even the best and most discreet, seldom learn to grow old gracefully. There seems so few compensations for the loss of the bloom and attractiveness of mature womanhood and joyous youth, that the female heart is inclined to believe the old age of one of her own sex must be indeed "days of darkness." And true it must be dark for the woman who is growing elderly, unless the affections can be exercised. The warm affections of the heart make the sunshine of her lot. Give her but and her strength will be renewed, and her youth come back, like the flowers that bloom on the cheek of alpine snows, in her warm hopes for those she loves. But as she goes down further and farther into the vale of tears, and her sight becomes dim to the beauties of nature and art, and her thoughts shrink from the cares of life, as from an insupportable burden, what shall then be her support, and where shall her hopes be directed for enjoyment?

Could you, my fair girl, look forward a hundred years, and fancy yourself then living, and so happy that you did not regret that youth had passed away, and would not, were it possible, go back and live over again your days of health and gayety?

There have been instances of this spiritual triumph over physical decay, and its loveliness is of such heavenly grace that we feel sure our readers will thank us for giving them a living example.

Mrs. Elizabeth Chase, of Boston, will on the 27th of this month be one hundred and two years of age. In 1839, on her hundredth birthday, she told a friend, a pious lady who called to see her, that she was far happier than in her days of youth and strength, and that she would not, for anything the world could offer, be willing to live over again, even her happiest years of life. And yet she must, when young, have been very pretty; and even now, her eyes retain a lustre and expression which is pleasant to look upon. She was, for all the earlier period of her life, surrounded by relations and dear friends, was loved and married, and lived happily in her domestic relations. She has also enjoyed affluence, or at least, sufficiency of all things—now, all these worldly blessings are gone, vanished like a mirage in the desert, and where the green groves and bright waters appeared, all is, to the eye of sense, a desolate barren waste, which stretches to the utmost boundary of the horizon of life. She is old and poor, and without relations or family connections. She has outlived all her generation. She is alone in the world. Where can she find a source of happiness?

She finds it—where it is always to be found—in true piety, in Love to God, and good will to all mankind. She has the same cheerful trust in the protection of divine Providence, which an infant has in its mother's love; and she seems as happy in the thought that each day brings her nearer to her Saviour, as a tired child would be, when he saw his mother stretching her kind arms to receive him. The natural buoyancy of her disposition has, no doubt, had much influence in predisposing her to this happy state of faith and hope. And probably this cheerful spirit has had considerable affect in prolonging her life, for the wisest of men has said, that "a merry heart doeth good like a medicine." Yes, cheerfulness is the true elixir of life, and Mrs. Chase appears always to have found its well-spring in her heart. To this cause also, we must attribute the wonderful preservation of her faculties. She looks fragile, and says that her constitution was always delicate; but now, at the age of one hundred and two years, her memory is better than that of many who have not lived half her days, her hearing tolerably good, and her sight—but that has come a second time—so strong that she reads fine print and hems fine muslin without the aid of glasses. She has taste and the love of order in active exercise—keeps her apartment in order, making her own bed, and very nicely it looks—also she makes her own caps and capes, and ruffles these with as much care as though she were a young lady. She usually rises about six in the morning, and retires before ten in the evening; and, what shows her wonderful energy of character, mental as well as physical, she very rarely takes any repose during the interval. Many women, not very aged ladies either, impair their faculties, in truth become sadly imbecile in mind as well as invalid in health, merely from their inactive habits. If you wish to live long, engage in some pursuits that call forth the energies of the mind, while properly employing the hands, and above all, develop and strengthen the best and warmest affections of the heart.

But how can Mrs. Chase, at her great age, improve her time? Surely she may be excused from employment? She does not desire this. A state of rest, or inaction makes no part of her theory or happiness. Every moment of her waking hours is strictly employed. She now cuts and makes all her own clothing, and, till within the last two years, performed sewing for others. And she reads many hours of each day. Not long since she read one hundred and sixty pages in "Baxter's Saint's Rest," aloud, during one afternoon. But her Bible is her chief treasure. She studies it daily, comparing passages and illustrating texts with the promptness and readiness of a scholar and a divine. Religion is her theme of power and eloquence. Her language, when engaged on this, her favorite subject, is clear, and even elegant, and her words pour forth with an energy and earnestness which impress the hearer almost like a voice from the spirit land. And then her dark eyes kindle with the light of perfect faith and holy joy, and her pale, withered features are so expressive of the gladness of her hope, the rapture of her soul in its near approach to the Saviour, that we have looked on her, at such times with an adoration which the most beautiful young face (and we love to look on youth and beauty) never inspired.

Here, then, is exhibited the principle which can beautify old age, and make the closing years the best and brightest of a woman's life. What would be the lot of this aged, lonely woman if her affections had not these heavenly hopes, this love of the Saviour on which to centre? What would be her lot where the Christian religion was unacknowledged and unfelt, or its precepts disregarded? In heathen countries, a female old and poor, without family or kindred, would left be to perish in want and sorrow. In our favored land, the Gospel has diffused a holier, a happier sentiment, which the case of this old lady most strikingly illustrates. She has for several years been unable to earn her own support, though she does what she can, but all her wants have been cared for. A number of benevolent ladies pay her board and provide whatever she needs. Nor is this done in the cold manner of constrained relief to the needy; but with that warm, heartfelt love and reverence which the pious character and conversation of Mrs. C. inspire. Rich and accomplished ladies, young and lovely girls, consider it a privilege to visit this aged saint, and listen to her fervent eloquence to her Savior's cause. And we are happy to add, that this mansion of charity, this appreciation of piety is not confined to the ladies of any particular sect. Mrs. C. is herself an Episcopalian, and a most devoted believer in the doctrines and forms of the church. But her heart can unite with and love all the friends of Jesus.

"WAITING FOR THE ADOPTION."

"And not only they, but ourselves also, which have the first fruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves, groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to-wit: the redemption of our body. For we are saved by hope." [Rom. viii., 23, 24.

A stranger might ask, would it not have better become them to have given thanks for what they already had, than groan for what they had not? Who can better stay for the evening feast than those who have shared the mid-day meal? This would apply in respect of bodily food, but not in spiritual. No doubt the first fruits they had in hand did cheer their spirits, but instead of satisfying them, these only served to whet their desires after the joys of the vintage. The earnest never was intended to quench the hope of the inheritance. It was, therefore, neither ingratitude nor despondency, but hope and heavenly desire, which made these early Christians groan for the banquet of the skies, while they were "always delivered unto death for Jesus' sake." It is of the very nature of hope to long after the possession of its object; and the more mature Christian hope becomes, the more vehement will these longings be. Foretastes of Heaven heighten and enlarge our conception of its joys, and of the felicity of its inhabitants, and our augmented knowledge naturally excites desire to share its blissful repose.

"Waiting for the adoption," etc. It was not uncommon among the Romans, for persons who had been adopted into noble families to be brought into the Forum and there publicly acknowledged as the sons of those who had previously adopted them in private. This was done especially when the act of adoption involved high privileges, or affected public interests. And as "the redemption of our body" from corruption to glory, and immortality, will consummate that chain of blessings of which our adoption into the family of God was the first golden link; and as it will at the same time introduce us to a new stage of blissful existence, and demonstrate our own filial relationship to God and brotherhood to Christ, it is here styled the adoption—implying that when our vile bodies shall have been fashioned like to Christ's glorious body, and not till then, we shall inherit all that glorious patrimony to which our primary adoption entitled us, and of which it was the earnest. For this great deliverance and public recognition the saints wait with longing expectation, and that not on their own account, alone, but because Christ, their Lord, will then be "glorified in His saints, and admired in all them that believe."

TRIBULATION.

This word is derived from the Latin "tribulum," which was the threshing instrument or roller, whereby the Roman husbandman separated the corn from the husks; and "tribulatio," in its primary significetion, was the act of this separation. But some Latin writer of the Christian Church appropriated the word and image for the setting forth of a higher truth; and sorrow, distress, and adversity, being the appointed means for the separating in men of their chaff from their wheat—of whatever in them was light, and trivial, and poor, from the solid and the true, therefore he called these sorrows and griefs "tribulations," threshings that is of the inner spiritual man, without which there could be no fitting him for the heavenly garner. [Trench's Study of Words.

And to this end be not afraid of those trials which God may see fit to send upon thee. It is with the wind and the storm of tribulation that God, in the garner of the soul, separates the true wheat from the chaff. [Milinos.

Practical Thoughts.

A house of correction is a kind of almshouse. It being as charitable a work to reclaim the wicked as to relieve the wanting; and were it not for prisons, all the land would be a prison. [Fuller's Worthies of England.

If you had rather not serve God, you do not serve him while you seem to serve him. If you had rather live in sin, you do live in sin; for in God's account the heart or will is the man, and what a man had rather be, habitually, that he is. [Baxter.

Make use of affliction as a great advantage for your purest and unmixed delight in God. The servants of Christ have usually never so much of the joy in the Holy Ghost as in their greatest sufferings, especially if they be for his sake. The soul never rejoiceth so readily and delightfully to God as when it hath no one else that will receive it, or that it can take any comfort from. God comforteth us most when he hath made us see that none else can or will relieve us. When all friends have forsaken us save only one, that one is sweeter to us than ever. When all our house is fired down except one room, that room is pleasanter to us than it was before. He that hath lost one eye will love the other better than before. [Baxter.

True Theology.—The true theology—that which is real, and which speaks, to use the popular phrase, to the inner consciousness of man—is the theology which starts from the fact of human sinfulness. It was the theology which gave life to the practical piety, and such pregnancy to the writings of Augustine and Luther. We want no systems that proceed from a priori deduction; want nothing so sentimental and subjective as Newman, and nothing so vague as Schleiermacher. The true theology is learned by bringing one's inner self face to face with God's holy Word; and, as in that light we study the phenomena of our own morbid spiritual anatomy, we shall learn to cry to the Great Physician, "Lord, save, or I perish!" Pectus facit theologum. This theology, alone, will save the souls of those that hear and of those that preach. [Eclipse of Faith.

The annexed poem, to which we call the attention of every lover of poetry, originated, we do not exactly know where or when. It is, however, evidently of New England origin; and, no one can read it without beholding before him the impressive image of one of those Pilgrim Fathers, as the representatives of the Puritans, founded the old Colony of Plymouth. Whilst we write, we see "The Aged Pastor" before us. The poem is entitled to the respect and homage of all for the purity of thought and piety it breathes.

THE AGED PASTOR.

With an eye still bright, though his cheek is wan,
And his long white locks are backward rolled
From his noble brow of classic mould,
Somewhat of his primal beauty wears.

He opens the page of the Sacred Word—
Not a whisper, nor low nor loud, is heard;
Every folly assumes a serious look,
As he readeth the words of the Holy Book,
But the thoughtless and gay grow reverent there
As he opens his lips in fervent prayer.

He stands as the grave old prophet stood,
Proclaiming the Truth and the living God—
Pouring a proof on the ears of men—
Whose hearts are at ease in their folly and sin,
With a challenge of guilt still unforgiven,
To the soul unfilled, unmeet for Heaven.

Oh, who can but linger that good old man,
As he unreeth his three score years and ten—
Who hath made it the work of his life to bless
Our world in its woe and wickedness;
Still guiding the few which were wont to stray
In paths of sin, to the narrow way.

With a kindly heart through the lapsing years,
He hath shared your joys, he hath wiped your tears,
He hath bound the wreath on the brow of the bride,
He hath stood by the couch when loved ones died,
Pointing the soul to a glorious Heaven,
As the ties which bound it to earth were riven.

Methinks you'll weep another day,
When the good old man has passed away,
When on the last of his ebbing sands have run,
When his labor is o'er and his work is done!
Who'll care for the flock and keep the fold
When his pulse is still and his heart is cold?

We'll miss him then; every look and tone
So familiar now, forever gone;
Will fill the heart with inward pain,
And ye'll long and listen for them in vain;
When a stranger form and a stranger face
Shall stand in your honored pastor's place.

Christian Liberality.

There are certain great principles laid down in Scripture in relation to giving, and the use of property generally, respecting which there is much practical scepticism. They are as follows:

First, That which we have, we hold as stewards that must give an account.

Second, The way to increase is to distribute. Some are rich because liberal.

Third, That which is given to the poor is loaned to the Lord.

Fourth, That which is done to Christ's little ones is done to himself. [Dr. Nevins.

TABLE MOVINGS.

As a fact, in the natural world, one must allow something in those wonderful "table movings" of late. There are too many witnesses to leave much doubt. If only here and there a heavy object were suddenly moved, without apparent muscular effort, one could pass over the matter, or explain it by the usual self-deception. But every body is at it here in New York. Doctors of Divinity of indisputable orthodoxy, dignified leaders of ton, refined young ladies, people above all suspicion of humbug or deception, are suddenly finding themselves possessed of a new motive power over articles of furniture. The whole thing is so ludicrous that sensible people can hardly speak soberly upon it; and yet few have doubts that either some old law is now showing itself in new workings, or that a new imponderable agent is being discovered. For ourselves we neither affirm nor deny. The phenomena we have witnessed thus far seem very much like those of a new application of electricity—much as if the wooden object and the person were surcharged with similar electricities repelling one another.

Still, believing firmly as we do in the illimitable capacity of man to deceive himself, we have seen nothing as yet which would establish surely any new law in physics. The whole however looks, both in the superstitions accompanying it and the facts, like the introduction to a new discovery in the natural world. We have called attention to it here, in order to speak a moment of certain side matters which it has revealed.

An earnest, though often skeptical, writer of this age has said, "To indulge in mere play with the ideas of things infinite, is more fatal to religion than any other corruption."

The profound, religious Bunsen, in his "Hyppolitus," says, "Demonism has its root in the moral hopelessness of the age—the despair of mankind as to itself and as to God." We think so of those late "spiritual manifestations." The strangest thing in them is that people are found to have such degraded conceptions of the spirit world. These men, professing to be the free thinkers, the teachers of the times—to come forward to the thousands of unsatisfied hearts, longing for Light and Truth even as for life, and offer such trash! To plant Davis's Revelation on the Bible! We do tearfully long and gaze for more glimpses into that dark shaded Unknown. We dream in the still night, and in the noisy sun-light, of the Departed, whom to see again would be like the opening of heaven; and then for some prophet to appear, and tell us of a great and noble soul returning here, in spirit, to talk about "cigars soaked in vinegar," or "a roast beef of last year," or some equal twaddle, it is disgusting! It is worse than a mythology—such a belief! It belittles and degrades the whole aspect of the next world. If we believed that the other life was to be peopled with such puerile spirits, and that this was the growth of the soul, we should not wish for the Resurrection. One could labor still for the unhappy, but when death came we should lie down sadly, feeling that it was a mean finale to such a beginning. No; the philosophic mind to all such revelation brings up in answer the long history of human self-deception; the infinite probabilities against any isolated miracle; and points to the one Great Revelation, where natural wonders were united with an unfolding of the grandest moral truth, which alone made the other probable; and where every word and thought of the new revelation met the highest ideal of the soul, and corresponded in spiritual purity and beauty with the purity and beauty of the world around us. Till such comes again we must doubt utterly of all "spiritual manifestations." [Independent.

Cock-Fighting Preachers.

The following extract of a letter, from a gentleman of Panama, which is in the Republic of New Granada, will give some insight into the character of the priesthood, for which the Pope has taken up the cudgels; and also their influence upon the morals of society. There are no "godless common schools" in Panama:

"I have seen a priest gambling in public on two occasions. The citizens have a mania for cock-fighting, and there is a cock-pit to the steps of almost every door in the place. Sunday afternoon is the time established for the fights to come off at the town cock-pit, which is right opposite the large cathedral. I went, on one occasion, paying five cents admission. In two fights three chickens were killed, when I retired highly edified."

If Peter was really the first Pope of Rome, what would he think if he could look down now upon his infallible followers at the Isthmus? Would he not think it strange that they should show such fondness for that fowl which is so intimately associated with his fall, and his bitter repentance! The "cock-pit right opposite the large cathedral!" What a commentary upon the influence of Romanism—for in Panama it has full sway, undisturbed by the free breath of Protestantism!

Honesty in Business.

Two brethren were riding in a wagon one day; the conversation turned on the manner of doing business:

"Brother," said one, "if we would succeed in store-keeping, we cannot be strictly upright in every little thing. It is impossible. We could not live."

"It is contrary to religion not to be upright," replied the other. "Honesty is as much a part of religion as prayer, or reading the Bible. A man may pray and read the Bible, and yet if he be not strictly an honest man, he cannot be a religious one."

"I don't know about that. We must live; that is my doctrine."

"But you pretend to be a religious man, don't you? You are a professor as well as I am."

"But we must live. I shall break down in my store if I do not shave a little."

"And you will be more likely to break down if you do. I tell you, my brother, honesty is the best policy, too; and I will venture to say, the man who is honest will succeed better in his store, than the one who is not. The man who is unjust, even in little things, is a dishonest man, and an irreligious man; and the day of judgment will convince him of it fearfully."

The above conversation, in substance, took place in one of the counties of the State of New York. The store-keeper did business in a village, near which they were riding. Since that time he has failed in his business, and has been obliged to leave the village.

I wish every merchant, every store-keeper, would lay this truth to heart: "A man who is not strictly an honest man cannot be a religious man." [Christian Advocate and Journal.

The Expedition to Central Africa.

Dr. Vogel and his companions left London recently, en route for Malta, by the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Packet. With the least possible delay they are to proceed to Tripoli and Mursuk, and having reached the latter place, the state of the country between it and Lake Tsad will determine their further route—the most direct to be selected.

Dr. Vogel will be well equipped for astronomical, magnetical and botanical researches, and in this respect he has had the continued assistance and advice of the kind friends who recommended him. The astronomical instruments have been selected with a special view to replace those which have failed, or which have been injured during the three years' travels of Barth and Overweg. We are informed that among the instructions which will be given to Dr. Vogel, are the following:

When arrived at Lake Tsad he is to determine, in the most accurate and complete manner, the latitude, longitude, and elevation of that important point; and the following communications are to sent at the earliest opportunity:

1. Dr. Vogel's own observations. 2. His account of the astronomical proceedings of the expedition up to that time. 3. All plants and seeds of plants that he may have been able to collect. [This would be highly interesting, as the flora of these countries is almost unknown; neither Denham nor Clapperton, Barth nor Overweg, having been botanists.] 4. The collection of the natural products and manufactures of Bornu, which was making by Dr. Overweg's advice. 5. The geological and zoological collections. [Athenæum.

Distance to the Sun.

Imagine a railway from here to the sun. How many miles is the sun from us? Why, if we were to send a baby in an express train going, incessantly, a hundred miles an hour, without making any stoppages, the baby would grow to be a boy, the boy would grow to be a man, the man would grow old and die, without seeing the sun; for it is distant more than a hundred years from us. But what is this compared to Neptune's distance? Had Adam and Eve started by our railway, to go from Neptune to the Sun, at the rate of fifty miles an hour, they would not have got there yet; for Neptune is more than six thousand years from the centre of our system. The New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Christian Advocate.

Terms: $1 50 per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

Saturday Morning, April 9.

A Sunday School Volume.—The Book Agent has favored us with a copy of "Heart Blossoms," by Mrs. Cross. It is as neat as a nosegay, and as fragrant. These are gathered pieces that have appeared in the Visitor. Doctors Early and Summers could add more such volumes to the Catalogue of our Sunday School Books, if—they only had the money!

The Spirit Rappings Exposed.—A readable and closely printed expose, of fifty-four pages, by Rev. J. Porter, of New England. He admits some magnetic facts, etc., but denounces the Rappings as a reliable or legitimate means of information from the Spirit World. Shows the danger of becoming a "medium," and the wickedness of patronizing "circles." The reader may see a sensible article on this subject on our first page—"Table Movings."

A Newspaper Circulation.—The American Messenger, a monthly, published by the American Tract Society, has a circulation of five hundred thousand copies. Such a circulation has been reached by no other paper or periodical in Christendom. One-fifth the amount would satisfy the Publishing Committees of the New Orleans Christian Advocate the present year—they will will be content with one-fiftieth of that circulation, that is ten thousand copies. Who will assist in securing this amount?

Maryland, Wake Up!—Hitherto the Southern Conferences have had it between themselves—this noble contest for the Missionary Banner. But old Baltimore has entered the field, per saltum. The Missionary Secretary Correspondence increases the figures quoted by us last week:

"Twelve months ago this Conference pledged itself to raise eighteen thousand dollars for the year just closing; but, from the growing interest every where felt among us in the cause of missions, we report this year $24,050. We have pledged ourselves for $25,000 next year. This is too small a sum; it ought to have been $30,000."

Funeral Sermon.—On the death of Mrs. Allen, delivered in Athens, Ala., by Rev. S. W. Moore, 28th, November, 1852. We have been favored with a copy. It does not tell us much about the deceased, but estimates highly and properly the character and value of a "virtuous woman." [Text, Prov. xxxi. 10.] Many pious women have been scared off by St. Paul's words, "Suffer not a woman to teach or usurp authority." So have they been lost as "helpers" of the gospel to the full extent of their capacity. But Mr. M. corrects this wresting of the Apostle's language by well made reference to the many women mentioned with honor in the Scriptures as effective helpers of the cause of Christianity. In the Apostolic days there were prominent and active female members of the Church. Shall they hold now only a nominal place, who in its golden age were such zealous and indefatigable champions of Christianity?

The Press and the Pulpit.—Some of the dissenting churches in England, says an exchange, have taken measures to promote a systematic circulation of papers and books, as an aid to the services of the pulpit in the enlightenment and salvation of the people. They appoint an officer whose duty it is to endeavor to persuade every family to take some newspaper, and to bring to their access good books. This is a wise and thoughtful measure, which the churches in this country might adopt with the most salutary effect. The importance of the press as an agency in doing good is but poorly appreciated by religious teachers.

Made to Order.—The English Churchman announces that a "clergyman of experience and moderate views," who is abundantly competent, "will furnish original sermons in strict accordance with the principles of the Church of England, in a legible hand, at 5s. 6d., or $2,50, each;" moreover, "sermons will be made to order on any required subject on reasonable terms!" That such an advertisement should appear in a Church journal, open to all men, and addressed to men who "receive tithes," and avow themselves called of the Holy Ghost to the ministry, indicates a state of public sentiment in regard to Christian institutions, more morbid than can be readily conceived of in a land where every man stands or falls upon his own merits. Such degradation of the holiest office of Christianity might well mantle the cheek of a decent infidel with blushes.

Religious Statistics of Prussia.—According to a recent census Prussia contains 16,365,000 inhabitants—of whom 1,207 are of the Greek Church; 14,508 Mennonites; 218,773 Jews; 6,063,186 Papists; 10,037,277 Protestants. There are 6,135 Protestant clergymen, who officiate in 8,164 churches, being one clergyman for 1,623 souls, and a church for 1,223. 5,605 Romish priests officiate in 5,136 churches, being a priest for [illegible] souls, and a church for 1,176.

THE JUBILEE YEAR.

The British and Foreign Bible Society entered upon its Jubilee Year on Monday, the 7th March. This noble Institution, like our own American Bible Society, is the greatest and most practical of Evangelical or Protestant Alliances. It offers the most advantageous ground, yet surveyed, on which to exhibit the essential unity of that holy Catholic Church in which we all profess to believe, and has demonstrated that it is possible, if not to harmonize all opinions, yet to reconcile all hearts.

Taking advantage of the "redudant joy and benevolence" of the occasion, a Jubilee Fund was begun. On Tuesday, the 8th, when the great meeting was held, the Committee was able to announce a most respectable and encouraging commencement of the Jubilee Fund. Four generous names had headed the subscription with a thousand pounds each, there were several put down for the sum of five hundred pounds, and the number of fifties took a considerable time to read over. Thus the year has begun well, and the impulse from the centre has been vigorously given.

Every evangelical section of the Church was represented on the platform; and more members of more denominations were brought together than probably in any assembly of Christian people the world had seen before.

The Watchman of the 9th March describes the exercises:

"Exeter Hall was as full yesterday as it well could be, and for more than four hours, almost to the close of the proceedings, the ranks which occupied the body of the hall, the platform, and the opposite gallery, remained steady and unbroken. Of the speakers, and the speeches, we shrink from attempting to give a description. On no other occasion could so many men of Earth's true nobility—the Christian Statesman, and the Christian Bishop, Pastor and Missionary, the Christian Man, devoting all energies of heart and mind, employing social station and political influence, and sanctifying wealth in unreserved devotion to the Giver of all—have met to advocate the same object. Lord Shaftesbury, as President of the Society and Chairman of the meeting, set an excellent example of force and brevity. The Bishop of Winchester moved the first resolution in an address remarkable for its excellent tone and quiet benignity. The Duke of Argyll's speech was full of sense and spirit; and that of the Earl of Carlisle was marked by his usual grace, and by a deeply evangelical feeling. Dr. Duff delivered himself with greater vehemence, and more frequent flashes of genius than any other speaker; but the time was too short for him, and we fear that, though he did not spare himself, he was imperfectly heard in some parts of the hall. Though the sands of the hour-glass were sinking rapidly when the Rev. Hugh Stowell rose, he was well received and frequently applauded. The Rev. William Arthur followed, and condensed as much thought, feeling, and eloquent appeal into the brief time he chose then to occupy, as might advantageously be expanded into a noble chapter on the Biblical history of the last century. Dr. Cumming and other speakers succeeded: all due honor be to all. But to us the speech of the day, that which went the nearest way to the heart, stirred it the most deeply, and kept it beating the longest, was the speech of the Pastor of the Carr's-Lane Congregational Church in Birmingham. Seconding the first resolution, which had been moved by the Bishop of Winchester, and was supported by the Duke of Argyll, Mr. James found himself between a Bishop and a Cabinet Minister; and Congregationalism we are to think has never appeared by a worthier representative before Church and State and before a general Christian Assembly.

Having just listened for many hours to such men as those we have named, we might attempt to reproduce some of their views here, to borrow some fervid sentences, and echo some conscience-awakening appeals. But we had much rather and much better recommend the reader who was not at Exeter Hall yesterday, to possess himself of an ample and authentic report. Such a report will doubtless be published by the Bible Society itself; and in the meanwhile, within the few hours permitted us between yesterday's meeting, and our time of publication this morning, we have done the best that we could for our own readers. We will at present only mention one consideration that ought to animate us throughout the Jubilee Year of the Bible Society—that, as it is such an epoch as the Church of Christ has never celebrated before, so to us who write, and to most of those who read, it is one that will not return. To us this is the first and last Jubilee, but our humble work may have its portion in the triumphs of the next. Nothing was so affecting in the addresses given yesterday as their constant reference to those who founded the Bible Society in 1804, but of whom only a few patriarchs survive to see its fiftieth year. During that lapse of time nearly all of them have been borne peacefully into eternity, but their work as well as their names remain. To them belongs the triumph which their successors celebrate, and in the translation of Word of God into the languages spoken by six hundred millions of the human race, they have an imperishable record. Who can foresee the glory of the next Jubilee Year of the Bible Society? Who can say whether it will require more than another Jubilee to place the Gospel before the view or within the hearing of every human being on this planet?

AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY.

The monthly (March) meeting reports twelve new Societies recognized; of which three were in Ohio, three in Illinois, and one each in North Carolina, Alabama, Tennessee, Mississippi, Indiana and Iowa.

Letters were read from different parts of the world: from Rev. L. S. Jacoby, of Bremen, with encouraging statements as to the circulation of the Scriptures in Germany; from Rev. R. S. Maclay, of Fuh-Chau, in relation to distribution of the Scriptures in that provincial city, especially among students and scholars; from Agent Buel, in San Francisco, on Catholic and Protestant missions in Californin; from Rev. E. M. Dodd, at Malta, in regard to the Spanish Bible; and from Rev. Dr. Perkins, of Oroomiah, stating the completion of the Bible in ancient and modern Syriac, so that the Nestorians now have the entire Bible in both languages, published by funds from this Society.

As it was understood that the Rev. Samuel I. Prime is about to visit Europe, he was appointed Delegate to the British and Foreign, and to the French and Foreign Bible Societies.

The Hon. Joseph Henry Lumpkin, of Georgia, the Hon. David L. Swaim, of North Carolina, and Francis Hall, Esq., of New York, were elected Vice Presidents of this Society.

Grants of books were made for Germany, Arabic Testaments for Madagascar, French Bibles and Testaments to the American and Foreign Bible Society, Bibles and Testaments for Mosul, also for schools at Ceylon, and Scriptures in Mpongwe for the Gaboon Mission.

Appropriations in money for the publication of the Scriptures were, made viz: for China $5,000, being $1,000 each to American Board of Commissionsrs for Foreign Missions, to Methodist Episcopal Church, to the Protestant Episcopal Church, Presbyterian Board of Missions, and to the Methodist Episcopal Church, South; to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, for Madras, $1,000; to the same, for Madura, $1,000; Presbyterian Board of Missions, for Northern India, $3,000; to the Methodist Missionary Society for Germany, $1,000; for France, $2,000; and $100 to the Methodist Missionary Society, for purchase of Scriptures for the Chippewn Indians, in Michigan.

The receipts of last month amounted to $27,766 67, and the issues of Bibles and Testaments to 41,482.

SUNDAY SCHOOL BOOKS.

We are now using every effort to increase our Catalogue of Sunday School Books, and meet the demand of the Southern Methodist Church; have many valuable works on hand, and offers of many more that would be a great acquisition; but we lack the funds to have them stereotyped. We need Wesley's Catechisms, No. 1, No. 2, and No. 3; Bible Questions on Genesis, by Dr. Summers, our Editor; and also a Hymn Book for Children, by the same; and we make this publication that benevolent friends, scattered over the Southern States, may send us some $50, some $75, and some $100; and beg that those who have money to spare, and hearts to give, send us the funds without delaying to inquire whether so much has been given as to render it unnecessary for them to give. It will be seen by our forthcoming Catalogue that we are anxious to improve our libraries, but cannot do so without the means now sought for. We shall add, and continue to add to our valuable stock a few long-tried favored works, with new and heart-stirring productions that will tell upon the rising generation. Send us the funds as soon as convenient, and the good done shall be commensurate with the contributions made.

TEXAS CONFERENCE ITEMS.

Our Conference resolved to have their proceedings published in pamphlet form, but from causes of which I am ignorant they have not yet appeared. You have published such items as you could collect. I will furnish you with some additional statistics of membership:

	1851.	1852.	Increase.
Whites	4359	4761	302
Colored	1148	1386	238
Traveling Preachers	49	56	7
Superannuated	3	3	0
Local Preachers	80	86	6
Total increase			553

Nearly every effective preacher received his full quarterage claims, although there was a woful deficiency in the payment of superannuated claimants. Our Conference collections amounted to but $218 75.

We have 28 Sunday Schools; 28 Superintendents; 174 Teachers; 1106 Scholars; 4653 volumes in Library. $324 50 had been collected and expended for Sundry School Books. In addition to the above we have many schools auxiliary to the American Sunday School Union. And this will continue to be case until the Church, South, has an organization and a literature, and facilities for furnishing Sunday School Books.

Very little was done for the Bible cause. We hope in the future to do better.

For the cause of Missions we report $3132 94, an average of sixty-five cents to each white member. Now, Brother McTyeire, we have been almost stunned with the loud missionary crowing over in Alabama and South Carolina. In proportion to membership we are far in advance of either of them. We acknowledge our Conference second to none but Louisiana. Yours is the Banner Conference. Texas supports you on the right. Next year may change our relative position. Texas, the pride and glory of the Southern Church, ought to take the lead.

In the cause of education Rutersville was represented as in a flourishing condition under the management of President Halsey. Three new institutions were placed under the direction of the Conference—Bastrop Academy, under the management of President Hancock; Andrew Female College, of Huntsville, to which Rev. J. M. Follansbee, A. M., M. D., was appointed; and Payne Female Institute, of Goliad, conducted by Mrs. Steele.

Should you think any of our Conference documents worthy of publication, you can transfer them to your columns from our Minutes when they appear.

Yours, truly, H. S. Thrall,
Secretary Texas Annual Conference.

PREACHER'S ITEMS.

San Augustine, Texas, March 19.

It may not be altogether uninteresting to some of your readers to throw into a "nut-shell" view some statistics of the Ministers' changes in their relations to our Church since its organization up to the year 1840. It will be remembered that it is a matter of historical record that the first sermon preached in the United States by a Wesleyan Minister, was by Mr. Embury, in the city of New York, 1766. The first Conference in 1773; first organization into Societies 1784; the first regular General Conference 1792. From this period, till 1840, there were admitted into "full connection" five thousand five hundred and forty Ministers. Of this number there appears to have been expelled the "connection" ninety-two; withdrawn from us sixty-eight; died in "full connection" four hundred and ninety-six; located two thousand sixty-five.

The above statement of facts will doubtless suggest to the inquiring mind many thoughts which, when elaborated, may form material for several essays not inappropriate for the columns of your paper. By looking at the dates of withdrawal from the connexion, it might be ascertained that during the O'Kelly schism, greater numbers left the Church than at any period in our history including the same number of years.

A few, making the aggregate of those admitted into full connection, had been admitted in England under Mr. Wesley's jurisdiction; for as easly as 1762 we find S. Rankin and Asbury; 1767 R. Boardman and R. Martin; 1763 J. Dempster and Pillmore. The above named persons were "admitted into full connection" before the organization of the Church in America, and therefore could not have been received into full connection in the M. E. Church, according to the usual form as now prevailing among us. Dr. Bangs, in his Church History, must have set down the time of their admission in England, as there was no Church organization in America of the M. E. Church.

With these brief statements of facts we will leave the subject, hoping that the time consumed in gathering the recorded facts may be of service to the thinking.

LETTER FROM THE ISTHMUS.

Steamer Philadelphia,
Aspinwall, March 6, 1853.

In conformity with your courteous request, I snatch up my pen to fling you a hasty greeting from our weather-beaten vessel. We reached the Balize about five o'clock, P. M., of the 22d February, where we were compelled to remain all night in consequence of high wind and a rough sea. Next morning we ran on the bar and were detained for several days, where we were passed by steamer Webster of the Nicaragua line. Thus far we have had a tolerable trip—I use the word in its strictly derivative sense—the use of the term pleasant, in connection with a sea voyage, is a miserable abuse of language.

But I must not the part of a journalist and scribbler, rather than that of a critic and grumbler. And I must not forget, in recording my personal observations and adventures, that the Bishop is the chief object of solicitude and interest to those to whom I address my communications. When we left New Orleans he was much afflicted with asthma, but the wind and the wave seemed to give a buoyancy and elasticity to his spirits, and strength and firmness to his frame.

We had scarcely left our moorings before he began to pace the deck of the vessel with a steady step, his eye kindling with the faded lustre of his earlier days. The fixed and thoughtful expression of countenance, the elevated brow, gave an air of sublimity to the venerable man of God, and proclaimed him equal to his office and his mission. Age has made its impression, but has not conquered. I am now persuaded, and it gives me pleasure to promulge the cheering fact, that the journey will be of great benefit to his health.

We have yet to accomplish the most disagreeable and laborious part of our journey—to be fatigued and fleeced—put upon a ramadon fast. Requisition is now made for a sure-footed mule, and we expect to see the Pacific in a day or two.

Panama, N. G., March 8.

Thus much I had written at Aspinwall. We arrived safely at Aspinwall day-before-yesterday; traveled twenty-eight miles on the railroad—six in boats on the Chagres River to Gorgona, where we spent the night. Started yesterday morning from Gargona, and arrived here about dusk. The Bishop was very much fatigued, but rested well last night, and reports himself quite well this morning, and prepared to embark on the Californin steamship for San Francisco, 5 P. M., this afternoon. He escaped sea-sickness, and is perceptibly improved in health from the voyage. And now, under painful circumstances, which no expedient can counteract, I advertise you and your readers of the departure of the Bishop without the company of your humble correspondent. I have just returned from the vessel, where I saw him safely and comfortably ensconced in company with obliging friends, who promise every attention necessary to his comfort and convenience. His trunk did not arrive in time for the steamer, and he could not be induced to leave without it, until I proposed to remain and take charge of it on its arrival. To this proposition he reluctantly consented, just in time to get on board the Californin, a few minutes before she sailed, in company with most of the passengers who came with us in the Philadelphia. I regretted the delay, but he would not leave Panama without his baggage, unless I would remain.

The American Consul, and other Americans, advised me by all means to induce him to go, as a residence of twelve or fourteen days would almost inevitably superinduce disease, and imperil his life. My conviction was against remaining, but he would not go on unless I would remain, and I thought it better to risk one life than two, and that the Church could much more readily loose me than the Bishop.

On Sabbath I expect to preach in Panama, though the priests may grumble. God has written it, and the signs of the times betoken the approach of the era for its consummation, that this country shall be redeemed from the curse of ignorance and barbarism and the dominion of Popery.

God grant to hasten on the period, in the future history of New Grenada, when the temple of God, and the temple of Minerva, shall stand side by side, and bathe their turrets in the sunshine of freedom; and the ministers of grace, and the patrons of letters, hand in hand, and shoulder to shoulder, shall coöperate in the civilizntion and Christianization of the benighted priest-ridden people of Panama.

Yours, truly, B. T. Crouch.

LONDON CORRESPONDENCE.

Note from "X. Y."

[Special Correspondence of the Advocate.]

London, March 10, 1853.

I must beg for a correction of some errata in my communication dated January 6, and published in the Christian Advocate, of February 12, last to hand.

The reason I make this request in the present instance is that some of the errata affect questions of fact in regard to the late editor of a certain journal.

"Mr. Iiny, the Reporter," should have been, "Mr. Kaye, the Proprietor."

The sense of one long, over long sentence is quite spoilt by the insertion of "as," before "he, the editor," etc., instead of a dash.

These are in the postscript. In the letter itself there are two or three which it may be well specifically to correct:

Instead of the "second repeal of the malt-tax," should have been printed "the semi-repeal"—one of the measures proposed by the late Government.

"Disguisedly thrown overboard," (Protection understood) should have been undisguisedly."

"Traditions and manners of his Uncle's imperial policy," should have been "traditions and maxims."

I may add, as I am a writing, a few lines of recent intelligence:

On Tuesday evening, the 8th instant, the great Jubilee Meeting of the Bible Society was held in Exeter Hall. It was, and more cannot be said, a meeting worthy of the subject and occasion—the largest and noblest ever held even in connexion with the Bible Society. You know there is to be a Grand Jubilee Fund, and all the Wesleyan Chapels, by a collection made on one of the Sundays in the present month, will contribute their quota to a general offering on the part of the Wesleyan Body to the Bible Society. Mr. Farmer has also presented his special donation of £1000.

Turkey has completely succumbed to Austria. In this Britons can hardly rejoice; for Turkey has long been, in every sense, religiously, politically, and commercially, a far more liberal power than Austria.

Kossuth has satisfactorily replied to Mazzini's charge of equivocation in regard to the address to Hungarian soldiers.

The last tidings from the gold fields report that most of the old diggings were failing, and that thousands have had to start off "prospecting." X. Y.

[We intended last week, but lacked room, calling special attention to the letter of "X. Y."—long though it was. The case of Congregational Reformers is worth noting down by us, and by all who feel "called on" to aid and abet those who would trouble us in matters of Church Government.

The Committee Resolutions, of the Louisiana Conference, have engaged attention at home as well as abroad. Most of our cotemporary journals have brought them before their readers. A highly intelligent correspondent, in a neighboring Conference, was preparing to publish something on that subject when they appeared. He said he was satisfied: they met his views. It may be well to say that they were gotten up within the Conference, by no pressure or suggestion from without. Those who think them too progressive will see what English Wesleyan Conservatism thinks of them. We republish that portion of "X. Y's." letter:]

The Lay-Committee System of England.

I am pleased to see that you have organized for the Louisiana Conference a lay-committee system. This corresponds substantially, though not formally, to our lay representation in the District Committees. For our District Committees correspond much more nearly to your Conferences, in many respects, than to your District Assemblies. The number of regular ministers (exclusive of supernumeraries or retired ministers) in one of our Districts very seldom falls so low as twenty-five, and in several instances rises to from sixty to one hundred. And the business transacted at our District Committee meetings is of the highest importance, as preparatory to the final supervision and determinations of the General Conference. Indeed, previous to 1772 all, and previous to 1797 most of what is now managed at the District Committees, was Conference work; and without the prior sanction of the District there are very few things indeed which the Conference has the power to do. The Conference, however, has the jurisdiction of appeal from the District in disciplinary cases, and the right to veto upon all determinations of the District affecting general connexional interests or funds. There are two meetings of the District Committee each year—one held at the end of September; that is, about five weeks after the close of the Conference, to settle the details of certain financial arrangements, the main outlines and general limits of which have been decided upon by the previous Conference. This is called the Financial meeting. The other is held in the third week of May, prior to the Conference, and is called the General District meeting. The business of this meeting is, besides questions of ministerial character and discipline, to inquire into the condition of Circuits, and to examine the claims of any to special assistance or relief, to review and decide upon chapel cases, missionary accounts and arrangements, and, in general, the affairs of all the Connexional Funds for the District. The two Stewards of each Circuit, and the District and Circuit Treasurers of Connexional Funds, are, ex officio, members of these meetings, for all purposes not connected with ministerial character and discipline.

A certain proportion of the Districts, also, in a kind of irregular rotation, determined by the proximity to the place where the Conference assembles, elect (the laymen, in this case, voting alone) representatives to attend the General Committee meeting, at Conference, of the Contingent or Home Mission Fund. And certain of the Circuits, in like manner, in a similar irregular rotation, choose representatives to attend, at the Conference, as members of the general Chapel Fund. Further, all District and Circuit Treasurers and Secretaries for the Missions, are members of the General Missionary Committee of Review, which meets at the time of Conference.

All our Financial Committees consist of an equal admixture of laymen and ministers, and have the power of nominating new members to fill up vacancies as they occur. But, in addition to this, we seem, in order to theoretic completeness, to require a system of direct District representation, from all our Districts and for all our connectional branch-interests. With the direct Circuit representation in the District Committees, if we could thus unite a direct and universal District representation in our Conference Committees, our platform of church government would be tolerably complete in all its stages. At the same time, it is evident that such a direct representation in our Conference Committees should not be the only and exclusive method of constituting their lay members; for while several Districts would barely be able, if able at all, to furnish one lay representative whose pecuniary means, command of time, and general liberality and intelligence would fit him to be a member of General Conference Committees, others—as London, Manchester, Leeds, or Birmingham, could furnish each six or ten men, who not only well might, but really ought to have a share in transacting the general connexional business, because of their large benefactions, active zeal, extensive intelligence, and great and merited personal influence. A certain proportion, therefore, of each Committee ought to consist of such eminent lay men, nominated by the Committee, and approved by the Conference, the rest being chosen by the Districts as already indicated. Of course, to think of Circuit representatives to attend to our Conference Committees, on the part of our hundreds of Circuits, and to be provided for, in addition to as many ministers, or more, would be quite out of the question.

Such are our thoughts; that is, those of your correspondent, and some others. Your arrangement, however, in your circumstances, is admirable, being simple, practicable and efficient.

AUTHOR'S REPUDIATION.

Rev. J. H. Ingraham, now an Episcopal preacher, settled at Aberdsen, Mississippi, is (or was) the "Professor Ingraham" who wrote Novels. The recent republication of his novels has elicited from him the following disclaimer:

"Seven years ago I withdrew my name from connection with the light literature of the day, and since 1846 I have not published any thing under my own name save a Series, of a religious character, in the Evergreen, a Church Magazine. As I never retained copy-rights of my earlier books, and as my magazine and newspaper tales were unoopy-righted I, of course, have no control whatsoever over these works. But I trusted that they had had their day, and were things of the past. My surprise and mortification, therefore, now that I am devoted wholly to the duties of a minister of the gospel, I cannot adequately express, at seeing the papers once more advertising and noticing new editions of my old novels, and to find them once more put forward into public notice by extraordinary efforts of publishers. What aggravates the matter is they are mostly issued as if freshly written books, with no intimation to the reader that they are old written books—written fifteen years ago—now revived! Lest, therefore, there may be many persons, whose esteem I value, who are ignorant of this fact, and who suppose me to be still inconsistently engaged in writing novels and preaching the gospel, I beg you will give publicity to this communication."

Infidel Publications in England.—The Critic, an English literary publication, reports that the catalogue of Mr. Chapman, the London publisher of delistical works, consists of nearly one hundred pages, giving a list of books, of rare ability, written purposely to assail Christianity. To these remarks, must added the Westminster Review, which has become the property of the same publisher, and is devoted to the same object. This is, indeed, a sad picture.

A Scene at Washington.

Perhaps there is no part of the earth where more ludicrous scenes take place than at Washington. The gathering together of people from all parts of the world, the varied interest, and the numberless claimants, all help to form grotesque incidents, which, if they could be skillfully combined by a master-hand, would create a soul under the ribs of death. Having neither the time nor the ability, I will only mention one. There is in the Senate a gentleman of distinguished talent, of fine personal appearance, and of indomitable will. On one windy morning, he was wending his way through a by-street, when a gust blew off his hat. It had scarcely touched the ground before a huge New Foundland dog pounced upon it, and ran away bearing it as a trophy. The Senator, unwilling to part so summarily with his new beaver, pursued the felon, and the scene became highly exciting to the people of the metropolis, who, delighted with any incident that could give amusement, were thrown into perfect ecstacies of joy at seeing the race between the dog and the Senator, the one plunging at his utmost speed, with the hat between his teeth, and the other, his long hair streaming in the wind, and his stentorian voice making the air discordant with a multitude of fierce entreaties and impressive threats, pursuing with frantic strides the catiff quadruped. Finding that his biped antagonist was gaining upon him, the thief fled into an open door, and in two went his pursuer. The dog dashed up a flight of stairs, and up dashed the Senator. The dog fled into a chamber, and there too ran the avenger, and there they both encountered a beautiful girl, who was just robing herself after morning toilette, and who was scarcely in a condition to receive so unexpected a visit.

"What do you want, you wretch?" said the lady, with flashing eye and indignant scowl, to the Senator.

"My hat!" answered the somewhat affrighted but still determined intruder; "my hat, which your rascally dog has stolen from me."

"I believe that dog is Satan!" muttered the lady; and then fiercely added to the dog, "Give him his hat sir!" which the quadruped instantly obeyed, "And now be off with you, you pack of fiends!" (to the dog and to the Senator,) and rushing at them, they both fled down the stairs in congenial terror, forgetting in their present panic their former difference. The crowd in the street received them with three hearty cheers, and the honored representative of a noble State went home with his rescued chapeau in his hand, (to guard against a repetition of the direful occurrence,) but with a more humble and subdued spirit than ever before had throbbed within his bosom.

"I have learned a lesson," he said when he had reched home, and wiped his brow; "two, I may say. One is, to hold on my hat of a windy day; the other, and more important, is never, under any circumstances, to rush into a room where a lady is dressing; for of all the fierce volcanoes that nature ever produced, the most terrific is an angry woman! Why, (added he, with an impressive gesture, and a slightly-subdued expletive,) there was lightning enough in that girl's eyes to have furnished the material for a dozen tropical storms, and enough left over for a brilliant aurora-borealis!"

But the story lacks the mingled tone of fun and terror which the hero gives it, and which is so provocative of mirth, that one of the most distinguished and learned statesmen of our land, whenever he heard it, or it came back to his recollection, would give way to uncontrollable laughter, even when the heavy hand of disease had grasped his form—a grasp, that was never relaxed until the victim slept in death! THE OLD OAKEN BUCKET.

This beautiful and popular song or ballad is said to have had its origin under the following circumstances:

Some years ago, when Woodworth, the printer, and several "Old New Yorkers" were brother typos in a printing-office, which was situated at the corner of Chatham street and Chambers, there were very few places in the city of New York where one could enjoy the luxury of a really good drink. Among the few places most worthy of patronage, was an establishment kept by Mallory, on Franklin street, about the spot where St. John's Hall recently stood. Woodworth, in company with several particular friends, had dropped in at this place one afternoon, for the purpose of taking some "brandy and water," which Mallory was famous for keeping.

The liquor was super-excellent, and Woodworth seemed inspired by it; for, after taking a draught, he laid his glass on the table, (remember, reader, if you please, that in those "rare old times," a man rarely met a friend without asking him to imbibe,) and smacking his lips, declared that Mallory's eau de vie was superior to any he ever tasted. "No," said Mallory, "you are quite mistaken; there was one which, in both our estimations, far surpasses this in the way of drinking." "What was that?" asked Woodworth, dubiously. "The draught of pure, fresh spring water, that we used to drink from the old oaken bucket that hung in the well, after our return from the labors of the field on a sultry day in the summer."

The tear-drop glistened for a moment in Woodworth's eye. "True! true!" he replied, and soon after quitted the place. He returned to the office, grasped the pen, and in half an hour "The Old Oaken Bucket," one of the most delightful compositions in our language, was ready, in manuscript, to be embalmed in the memories of succeeding generations.

THE OLD OAKEN BUCKET.

How dear to my heart are the scenes of my childhood
When fond recollection presents them to view!
The orchard, the meadow, the deep tangled wildwood,
And every loved spot that my infancy knew;
The wide spreading pond and the mill that stood by it,
The bridge, and the rock where the cataract fell;
The cot of my father, the dairy house nigh it,
And e'en the rude bucket which hung in the well.
The old oaken bucket—the iron-bound bucket,
The moss-covered bucket which hung in the well.

That moss-covered vessel I hail as a treasure—
For often at noon, when returned from the field
I found it the source of an exquisite pleasure,
The purest and sweetest that nature can yield.
How ardent I seized it, with hands that were glowing,
And quick to the white pebble bottom it fell!
Then soon with the emblem of truth overflowing,
And dripping with coolness it rose from the well.
The old oaken bucket—the iron-bound bucket,
The moss-covered bucket arose from the well.

How sweet from the green mossy brim to receive it,
As poised on the curb, it inclined to my lips!
Not a full, gushing goblet could tempt me to leave it,
Though filled with the nectar that Jupiter sips.
And now far removed from that loved situation,
The tear of regret will intrusively swell,
As fancy reverts to my father's plantation,
And sighs for the bucket which hangs in the well.

The Heroine of the Australian Diggings. The Dublin Commercial Journal, in a letter from the heroine herself, tells a remarkable story of a young lady who, with her brother, were left very suddenly left orphans with only £300. They were both very young, and quite accomplished, having been well raised and well educated by proud and extravagant parents. No doubt, as she says, that she and her brother were the sole remnants of "so much prosperity and so little prudence." Having the battle of life to fight, and these children being but raw recruits, it became a matter of serious concern with them. After debating their case, they determined to lay aside their pride and ornamental accomplishments, and sail for Australia, and there go to digging gold to repair their fortunes. Aware of the exposure and hazards she was about to incur, the resolute girl, for greater security, disguised herself in male attire; and, like Sebastian and Viola, did the two set off to try their fortunes in the world. At the diggings she represents herself as cooking and washing, and taking care of the gold, while her brother and a young partner, who had joined him, were digging in their placer, which was on the side of as pretty a valley as you could wish to visit, says she. Her sex, she says, is known in the mines, and she is called "Mr. Harry," an abbreviation of her real name—Harriet; "but," she says, "no one intrudes the more on that account." She says, indeed, that her disposition has made her popular, and that she is greatly respected. She says the life is exciting, but she does not want to give it up. She also intimates that she and her brother are getting rich.

OBITUARY.

Died—In Marion, Alabama, Februnry 27, 1853, CORNELIA PHARES, daughter of Rev. C. Phares, of Sumpter county, Ala., in the fifteenth year of her age.

The subject of this brief notice presented an uncommon developments of a moral and religious character. I have rarely found in so young such nmture virtues. Her life and ecoduct were uniformly marked by industry, punctuality, and implicit obedience to duty. As a child she was affectionate and dutiful; as a pupil she was energetic, obedient, and docile; as a friend she was ardent, forgiving, and forgiving. If gentleness is beautiful, if modesty is becoming, if nmiability is commendable, if kind-heartedness is lovely, surely she wns an object of interest and affection to all who knew her. The unconscious of her heart was an unfailing witness. It was pure and disinterested—its sympathies of her nature noble, deep, and universal. It was her pleasure to blend her fears with those of the grieved and suffering. Always pleasant and happy herself, she sought to nmke all contented urround her. Her sweet temper, her gentle spirit, nttachied her to her with whom she lind to do. The acts of her pleasure were different from those of most young people. The emptiness of personal adornment, the sinful vnnities and unsatisfying pursuits of this world, had no charms for her. The tendencies of her nature were higher. She was a Christiun. Early in life she gnve herself to God. The vows and prayers of a fond und pious mother have found a blest fruition in her life and death. She lind mnde good nttainments in piety. She wns prompt to every religious duty—uniform and consistent in her whole conduct and conversation. A firm and faithful profession, nn orderly and dutiful and conscientious dischnrge of every known duty, are some of the comforting assurnnces that left her friends of her safe entrance into the rest of God's people. Cut down in the bloom and promise of youth, she rests free from all the ills nnd vicissitudes of life in the endless joys of the blest, at God's right hnnd.

J. B. BUNN.

GENERAL.—The Charleston Courier has compiled the following biographical sketch of the Archduke Maynau, the Austrian Field-Marshal, whose death was advised by the steamer Franklin from Redfield's Men of the Times:

Radetzky was born, at Cassel, in 1786. He is said to have been the natural son of the Duke of Lorraine, by a goldsmith's daughter, and was notorious for his eccentricities, which, while he was in the military command of Gratz the capital city of Styria, and one of the most important in the Austrinn Empire—led to his being considered insane. He does not appear to have distinguished himself by any great military exploits. He commnnded the Austrian army which stormed Brescia—a city of Lombardy on the railroad from Milun to Venice—after that town revolted, and it was probable in consequence of his efficient service on that occasion, he was appointed to succeed Baron Frimont in commnnd of the forces acting against the Hungarians. This appointment he received in May, 1849, with the style and title of Commander-in-Chief of the Austrian Army in the Kingdom of Hungary and the Principality of Transylvania, he being at the same time charged with the government of these two countries, declared in a state of siege. In August of the same year he captured Szegedin—a town of southeast Hungary, situated in a marsh, on the banks of the Theiss, at the influx of the Maros—and within a week he led the Imperial army to Temesvar—a fortified city of South Hungary, on the Alt Bega and the Bega Canal, which had been taken by the Turks under Solyman, in 1551, and re-taken by Prince Eugene in 1716—where a sanguioury conflict ensued, which terminated in the utter defeat of the Hungarians. The consequence of this battle was the surrender of Gorgey, and the termination of the war in favor of the Austrians, when peace was carried into effect the exnctions from the Hungarians with the most unsparing cruelty—indeed, he is reported to have avowed his intention to revenge through the scaffold all the machinations of the Austrians in urms, and retribution had to be dealt for the 60,000 men slain in battle by the Megyars. It is however, stated thnt after perpetrating acts of the greatest cruelty, he would often spend days and days in tears, In u wretched state of mental excitement, with his eyes red with weeping. The inhabitants of Pesth, however convent, presented him with a most beautiful vase as a "token of gratitude." In January, 1850, he was removed from his command in Hungary, having fallen into disgrace with the Imperial Court at Vienna, in consequence, it is said, of his chnaging to the opposite extreme and showing too great leniency to the vanquished. Shortly after this event, he set ott on a tour through Europe, and arrived in London in September, and, as is doubtless fresh in the recollection of our readers, on a visit to the brewery of Messrs. Barclay & Perkins, was treated by a mob of draymen and others connected with the establishment, and very severely mobbed, being badly beuten nnd dragged through the mud by his immense moustache, which was, with considernble difficulty rescued by the police. Latterly, but little has been heard of him. He was said, however, to have become quite liberal in his principles. He has been residing recently at Florence, but whether he died in that city, or on his estate in Austria, we are not luformed.

MURAT MET HIS FATE.—The sentence of the military commission was read to him with solemnity. He listened to it as he would have listened to the cannon of another battle. To his military life, equally without emotion or fear, now for appeal. He had advanced of his accord towards the door, as if to accelerate the catastrophe. The door opened on a narrow passage, lying between the towers of the castle and the outer walls. Twelve soldiers, with loaded muskets, awaited him there. The narrowness did not permit them to stand at a sufficient distance to deprive death of a part of its victim. Murat, in stepping over the threshold of his chamber, found himself face to face with them. He refused to let his eyes be bandaged, and looking at the soldiers with a firm but benevolent smile, "My friends," said he, "do not make me suffer by taking bad aim—your space unturully compels you almost to touch the muzzles of your muskets on my face—aim at the heart, here it is." As he spoke thus, he placed his right hand upon his coat, to indicate the position of his heart. In his left hand he held a small medallion, which contained in one focus of love, the image of his wife and of his four children, as he wished thus to make them witnesses of his last honr, or to have their images in his last look, as in his last thought. He fixed his eyes on this portrait, and received the death blow without feeling it, absorbed in contemplation of all he loved upon earth! His body, pierced at so short a distance by twelve balls, fell with the arms upon and his face to the earth, as if still embracing the kingdom which he had once possessed, and which he had come to reconquer for his tomb. They threw his cloak upon the body, which was buried in the Cathedral of Pizza. Thus died the most chivalrous soldier of the imperial epoch; not the greatest but the most heroic figure among the champions of the new Alexander. General Intelligence.

QUICK PASSAGE.—The steamship Texas, from Galveston made the extraordinnry run from port to port in 32 hours.

The recent passage of the steamship Daniel Webster from San Juan, landing passengers here in twenty-one days and eighteen hours from San Francisco, is the subject of general remark. It is, we believe, the quickest passage ever made between San Francisco and New Orleans by way of the Isthmus.

SUIT IN BALTIMAT.—Against the Pontchartrain Railroad Company.—Annie Holmes yesterday filed a suit in the Third District Court, in which she claimed of the Pontchartrain Railroad Company $805 10 on the following allegations:

She avers that she heretofore resided in Selma, Alabama, and for the term of six years, was employed as a domestic in the house of Mr. Hilton, receiving for her services $15 per month; and that by strict economy she saved from her wages $400 in cash. Early in February of the present year she determined to visit her uncle, who resides in San Francisco county, California, and accordingly she left Selma on her way to the latter place. She took with her two trunks—one a large black leather trunk, the other of smaller size, and covered with yellow leather. In the trunks were contained her clothes, well worth $150; a large gold watch and chain, worth $150, belonging to her uncle, Charles Holmes, and the sum of $405 10. She further represents that she arrived safely in Mobile with the trunks and contents, and thence took passage for this city on board the steamer St Charles, and the next day arrived at the Lake on the Railroad with the said trunks and contents. The trunks were placed in the baggage cars under the charge of an agent of the Road. On the arrival of the cars at the city, petitioner demanded the delivery of the trunks, but they could not be found.

In conclusion, she alleges that by the neglect and default of defendants in not delivering her property, she has been detained without funds in this city, at great expense and inconvenience, having paid, and still being compelled to pay, heavy board bills, and forced to remain in the city for want of means to complete her journey. She further alleges $100 damages—making her entire claim as first set forth. Ogden & Henry, attorneys for petitioner.

GRAND JURY REPORT.—The Grand Inquest for the Parish of Orleans made a report in the First District Court on Saturday through their foreman, H. F. Wade, Esq. It sets out by stating that in examining the public institutions of the city the Grand Jurors had found much to praise and not a little to condemn.

The Watch-house of the Third District was found to be damp, filthy, and in a bad condition. Its repair or the purchase of a new one is recommended.

The Second District Orphan Boy's Asylum is found in good order, and its general management is commended.

The Parish Prison was in every respect in most excellent order. The number of prisoners confined there for all offences is two hundred and fifty-four. The department attached thereto for the temporary confinement of the insane, previous to their removal to the State Insane Asylum, is pronounced wholly unsuited for the purpose, and better accommodations are recommended.

The Charity Hospital is spoken of as an institution of which the city may well be proud, and the politeness of Dr. Foster, the attending physician is acknowledged. The conduct and management of the Sisters of Charity in the premises are highly complimented. It is recommended that the Legislature grant a sufficient appropriation for a thorough repair of the building.

The necessity for an Alms House near the city for those who are well enough to leave the Hospital, but not well enough to work, is also spoken of.

Some repairs are recommended to the City Work-house, and an increased supply of blankets. Of the persons confined there, 173 are whites and 60 blacks. They are mostly engaged in useful employments, and are well fed and clothed.

The Boys' House of Refuge is described as a fit place for the confinement of wild beasts, and as "a burning disgrace" to all concerned in its management.

The Girls' Asylum, in Julia street, was found to be neat, clean, and well conducted.

The House of Refuge for Girls is pronounced to be neatly kept, though small. It has 29 inmates.

The Camp street Female Asylum was found to have 275 inmates of all sizes. The institution is greatly lauded for its admirable financial management, and is held up, in that regard, as an exauple to our City Fathers.

The Lock-up of the Fourth District contained but one prisoner, and he was so well pleased with his quarters that he refused to leave.

The Boys' Orphan Asylum for the Fourth District is well conducted, but limited in finences. A Legislative appropriation for its benefit is recommended.

The State Commissioner is censured in strong terms for alleged neglect of the duties of his department. Among the enumerated grievances alleged against him are the obstruction of the sidewalks by merchandize, filth in the gutters, etc. The Legislature is recommended to make a change in the law regarding the election of Street Commissioners, and to have the duties divided. And thus ends the report.

Arrival of the Philadelphia.

The United States Mail steamship Philadelphia, James P. McKinstry, U. S. N., commanding, arrived here at 8 P. M. Thursday, from Aspinwall, with the California mails and 140 passengers. The Philadelphia left Aspinwall at 8 P. M., on the evening of the 1st instant. The U. S. mail steamship Illinois, R. J. Hartstein, U. S. N., commanding, left for NewYork on the same evening, with 800 passengers, and $2 000,000 in gold dust on freight.

The health of the Isthmus was very good at the time the Philadelphia left, and the roads in fine travelling condition, enabling passengers to accomplish the transit in from one to two days.

Georgia is a model State. She has 860 miles of railroad in operation. Her credit is of the highest order, her six per cent. bonds selling at the highest premium, and she now gives notice of her readiness to pay the interest on her bonds for the next six months in advance.

LUMBER WOMEN.—The Savnunah (Ga.) News is credibly informed thnt a company of twelve women and girls in Taylor county, near the line of the Muscogee Railroad in that State, are felling the largest pines in the forest, sawing them into blocks, and riving and drawing shingles for market.

EMANCIPATION OF THE JEWS.—We learn by the arrival at the Niagara from England that the bill to emancipate the Jews passed the House of Commons by a majority of 51, in u vote of 475. It is reported that the Lords in the Upper House would soon succumb to the measure, provided the majority in the Commouse was over 40. If such be the facts, we may expect to hear by the next steamer that the notorious "Jewish disability clause," for so many years a bone of contention in Parliament, no longer mars the statute books of Great Britain.

The Boston Atlas states that a letter has been received in that city stating that Chang and Eng Bunkers, the celebrated Siamese, have announced their intention of making another tour of the United States and Europe. They have been induced to take this step in consequence of numerous applications from influential people on both sides of the Atlantic, and they will make their first appearance in Boston some time in April. Since they were last exhibited they have married, and they are now the fathers of eleven children, six belonging to one and five to the other. They have been settled for many years in North Carolina, engaged in agricultural pursuits, and are highly respected in the community where they reside.

The citizens of Montgomery, Ala., are discussing the propriety and expense of lighting that city with gas.

The Mobile Advertiser states that the Tombigbee river is falling rapidly, and it is doubtful whether Boats will be able to reach Aberdeen again this season.

The opium trade of the English with the Chinese, has drawn from China, within the last half century, over four hundred millions of dollars in silver. If the trade continues, it is believed that in less than twenty years there remaining five hundred millions which it was computed that country possessed will be exported to the commercial nations of the West.

ASTOR LIBRARY.—The funds and property of the Institution are valued at $450,000, the cost of the building and site $70,000, and the expenditure for books thus far $75,364. More than 50,000 volumes have been collected, and Dr. Cogswell is now in Europe, authorized to expend $25,000 in the purchase of additional works. Commencing with about eighty thousand volumes, free from debt, and having a vested fund of $180,000, the interest of which is to be steadily applied to enlarging the collection, this must ultimately become one of the largest libraries in the world.

The work upon the Washington National Monument has been resumed. The Monument Association have appointed Mr. Frederick Eckloff Cluss clerk to supply the vacancy recently occasioned by the death of Joseph W. Eckloff, the brother of that gentleman. The block of stone contributed by the Republic of Switzerland has arrived and been formally presented to the Association. The Samson Hook and Ladder Company, of San Francisco, have forwarded a check for one thousand dollars to aid in the construction of the column.

U. S. MINT.—The coinage at the Philadelphia Mint for March was in gold double eagles, $4 000 000 quarter do. $271,015, gold dollars 458 333, total $5 662 898; silver $5 857 698; copper $5 861 529 26. Of the latter there were 19 500 half cent pieces. Gold bullion deposited $7,510 000, silver bullion $22 000. The amount of gold received from California was $7,440,000. The gold deposits for January, February and March, 1853, exceeded those of the same months for 1851-2 by nearly $5 000,000.

RAILROAD RECREATION.—The Superintendent of the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad has established and put in force a number of excellent regulations to prevent accidents as the trains pass through the cities and towns on the route. The speed of every train shall not exceed four miles per hour. A runner precedes every train or engine as it passes with a red flag in daytime and a red lantern at night. The engine bell is to be sounded continually, and other arrangements are made which will prevent any accident.

KENTUCKY MARBLE.—An extensive marble quarry is located in Kentucky, along the Ohio river, from a point opposite the city of Portsmouth, Ohio, to the mouth of the great Ohio canal. The marble is said to be inexhaustible in quantity, and of various qualities and shades, admitting of a high polish and equal to ornamental purposes to any marble in this country or Europe. A NewYork company, with a capital of $2 0.0ot, has been formed to work it, and has purchased about 1000 acres of land on which it is located. The want of building stone is said to be much felt in the Western cities.

PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE.—The Philadelphia Conference of the Methodist Church is now in session at Harrisburg. The Conference statistics for the past year are now completed. From them we learn that the total amount of missionary money collected was $14 103 60. Bible money $1,573 13. Education $630 84. Sunday School money $788 70. The increase of white members during the year was 842, while during the same period there has been a decrease of 415 among the colored members. One thousand dollars was obtained by subscription on the 20th in aid of the Metropolitan Church at Washington.

LIBERIA AND THE UNITED STATES.—President Roberts, of Liberia, in a recent letter, expresses himself highly pleased at the fact that our Government has dispatched Commander Lynch, U. S. Navy, on a reconnoissance of the African coast, as it indicates something good for Liberia. He says the United States must soon adopt measures to avail themselves of the immense trade which will in a few years spring up in the new Republic, or England will secure a monopoly, as she has already two steamers, which touch regularly at Monrovia and Grand Bassa, that are doing a large business.

THE LATE BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAILROAD ACCIDENT.—The Cumberland Journal of the 31st states that Dr. Cadwalader, injured by the late railroad accident, is still at Cheat River, and doing well, as is also Mr. Gardner the brakesmnn. Dr. C. is not yet aware of the death of Miss Isaacs, who was under his charge. Louis Delino, one of killed, had with him a bill of exchange on the Rothschilds of Paris, for 25,000 francs, another for a small amount of sterling exchange on the Rothschilds of London, together with an assignment of one-half of a claim in the United States Government growing out of the seizure of a vessel called the New Bee. Flavel S. Wooton, another of the killed, was a native of Rockville, Montgomery county, Md., and had settled at Green Bay, Wisconsin, in the practice of the law. He was on his return to visit his friends for the first time since leaving his native State. His body has been forwarded to his friends in Montgomery county. All the wounded are rapidly recovering.

The Washington papers of the 31st state that Mrs. Fillmore died at Willard's Hotel, from a bronchial inflamation of the lungs. She retained consciousness until within a brief period of dissolution, and died calmly, and without apparent pain. In the presence of her family.

On learning the melancholy bereavement, President Pierce directed the postponement of the meeting of the Cabinet, and the closing of the various Executive Departments for the day. He also addressed the following letter of condolence to Mr. Fillmore:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 30, 1853.

My Dear Sir—Information has just reached me of the death of Mrs. Fillmore. I beg you to accept the assurance of my earnest condolence in this great bereavement.

Yielding to my deep feelings of sympathy, and in testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, I have directed the meeting of the Cabinet this day to be suspended, and the public offices to be closed.

I am, with great consideration, your friend,

FRANKLIN PIERCE.

Hon. Millard Fillmore, Washington, D. C.

FROM WASHINGTON.—In the Senate of the United States, on the 1st inst., Mr. Mason, by leave, withdrew the memorial and accompanying papers of Francis W. Rice, late U. S. Consul at Acapulco, relative to certain outrages committed on him and other Americans by the Mexican authorities. The object was to present the papers to the Executive with a view to redress, which was due both to those upon whom the gross outrage had been committed, and the Government itself.

Mr. Brodhead offered a resolution, which lies over for consideration, calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish the Senate, at the commencement of the next session, with a statement showing the aggregate amount of Federal, State, City, County, Railroad, Canal, and other corporation bonds, stocks, or other evidences of debt, held in Europe and other foreign countries on the 30th June, 1853, specifying separately, so far as the same can be ascertained, the amount of each of the above description of bonds and stocks.

The Senate went into an executive session, and afterwards adjourned till Monday.

Elias E. Blackburn, to be Marshal of the United States for the Northern District of Florida, in place of John T. Myrick, removed.

Postmasters.—Augustus Hasaway, Annapolis, Maryland.

Richard Elward, Natchez, Mississippi.

William P. Pryor, Vicksburg, Mississippi.

FROM NEW YORK.—Ex-President Fillmore and son reached the city on the 31st ult., with the remains of Mrs. Fillmore. They were met at Jersey City by a number of their friends, and proceeded to the Astor House.

Maj. Gen. Scott reached the city on the 31st, and put up at the Union Place Hotel.

Dr. Kane, of the Arctic Exploring Expetion, and G. P. R. James, the novelist and the English Consul at Norfolk, are also at the Union Place Hotel.

The milkmen of the city, who deal in country milk, having determined to furnish the pure article, have fixed the wholesale prices at four cents per quart, from the 1st of April to the 1st of October, and at five cents for the remaining six months.

EMANCIPATION OF THE JEWS.—We learn by the arrival at the Niagara from England that the bill to emancipate the Jews passed the House of Commons by a majority of 51, in a vote of 475. It is reported that the Lords in the Upper House would soon succumb to the measure, provided the majority in the Commouse was over 40. If such be the facts, we may expect to hear by the next steamer that the notorious "Jewish disability clause," for so many years a bone of contention in Parliament, no longer mars the statute books of Great Britain.

The Boston Atlas states that a letter has been received in that city stating that Chang and Eng Bunkers, the celebrated Siamese, have announced their intention of making another tour of the United States and Europe. They have been induced to take this step in consequence of numerous applications from influential people on both sides of the Atlantic, and they will make their first appearance in Boston some time in April. Since they were last exhibited they have married, and they are now the fathers of eleven children, six belonging to one and five to the other. They have been settled for many years in North Carolina, engaged in agricultural pursuits, and are highly respected in the community where they reside.

BARTHOLDI AT BERLIN.—With respect to the cavalier treatment of the subjects of Great Britain in Austria the Vienna correspondent of the London Times writes as follows:

The resolution which the best families here have taken to admit no English guests into their houses, is just as silly as the bunganess of the Lloyd which says "If Messrs. Ledru Rollin Kossuth and Mazzini continue to enjoy the hospitality of the Britons, the generous hosts cannot longer enjoy ours." We can as easily dispense with the visits of the sons of Albion as with those of the people of Tuscany. The importation of English goods is not indispensable, etc. In this touchy style does the public discuss a slight international question. Southern country gentlemen feel very acutely annoyed at being sent to Coventry but the "demonstration" is so petty and ridiculous as to be unworthy of notice.

ITALY.—The political consequences of the late attempt at revolution in Milan, is thus alluded to by a correspondent of the London Daily News, writing from Naples under date of February 24:

"An error, said Voltaire, is a crime and so, I fear, Italy will find it to be. Already is the untimely effort of Milan producing its unhappy fruits in this Kingdom, as might have been predicted, for bad or weak Governments are ever willing to seize on the mistakes of others to cover their crimes. Arrests are the order of the day again, and amongst those unprepared some consideration of whom I may mention two noble exiles and the fashionable medical map of Naples, who was much liked by the young nobility. Other arrests are expected. Thus it would seem that the cause of terror would never cease and that the powers that be, determined, to rule upon the fate which inevitably awaits those who are involved in a regular fear."

A TERRIBLE RAILROAD ACCIDENT IN ENGLAND.—A very serious accident recently occurred to the express train of cars for Liverpool bringing passengers from Scotland and the North of England. It appears that the train, which consisted of an engine, tender, and eight cars, from some unknown cause, shot suppeared from the high rate of speed at which it was driven, ran off the track at Hadshaw Moor, within a few miles of Manchester. The tender and one of the cars were thrown with great force against the embankment at the side of the road and the other cars were crowded with great force one upon the other, upon more of them being completely crushed. After the accident every exertion was used to relieve the sufferers, and it was found that a fearful sacrifice of human life had taken place. Three persons were killed instantly on coming suddenly shortly after, and two others were not expected to recover. Several were badly scalded, and a great many suffered from fractured limbs and severe wounds and bruises. The engineer of the train was among the killed. The train was going at so high a speed at the time of the accident that the collision rendered it difficult for the passengers to keep their seats.

A VENERABLE INDIAN CHIEF.—John Skin O'Brien, an Indian Chief, who will be 100 years of age on Sunday next, visited the House of Industry in Philadelphia on the 24th ult., with his wife and five of his youngest children. He was born in Massachusetts, in the timeless tribe of Indians. His mother was a daughter of a chief of the tribe, his father an Irishman. At the age of twelve years he was sent to Europe to be educated as a physician, where he remained until twenty-years of age. He was in Paris when Lafayette was preparing to join the revolutionists, and there formed the determination to return and engage in its struggles. He joined the Eastern division of the army under General Washington, and acted as surgeon's mate under Dr. Comstock. He was engaged in nearly all the battles of that eventful period; received two wounds from balls, and one from a bayonet in the chest. In the war of 1812 he again joined the army; commanded a company of sharpshooters under Wilkes, Scott and Brown. He is the father of thirty-one children, all living, he having had his third wife. His intellect is good and unimpaired, stands over six feet in height, and very athletic. His face is handsome, and covered with a venerable beard.

A HEROINE.—On a recent occasion, in Cincinnati, a family, consisting of a mother and four children was residing in the third story of Kiostman's factory, which, unfortunately, took fire. Finding herself cut off from retreat in consequence of the stories beneath being on fire, the mother ascended to the roof, carrying her children with her. Here, tying one of her babies to her shoulders, she boldly leaped across an alley, six feet in width, to the roof of another building from whence leaving her burden, she returned and in like manner carried over in safety each of the others. The act was witnessed by a large concourse of spectators. The mother was in feeble health, and nothing but maternal love could have carried her through so trying a scene. We are unable to give her name; but, whoever she may be, she is a true woman, and her devotion deserves to be remembered. Her furniture was all destroyed.

DESTRUCTION OF LETTERS.—Recently, at Washington, seven hundred bushels or about one million, of dead letters were destroyed, in accordance with the usages of the Post-office Department. They were carted to Monument Square, and spread over a line of two or three hundred feet, when the match was applied. The entire mass of combustible material was soon in a blaze, and several hours elapsed before the conflagration was completed; the official attendants meanwhile raking the burning fragments to facilitate operations. The atmosphere for thousands of feet around was filled with charred fragments. A large number of persons witnessed the proceeding with much interest.

SNAILS.—A French paper says that snails have become quite a fashionable article of diet in Paris as they were in the days of the old Romans. There are now fifty restaurants, and more than twelve hundred private tables in Paris, where snails are accepted as a delicacy by from eight to ten thousand customers. The monthly consumption for this lenten-tide is estimated at half a million. The market price of the great vineyard snails is from 2f. 50c. to 3f. 50c. per hundred, while those of the hedges, woods and forests, bring only from 2f. to 2f 25c. The proprietor of the auberge in the vicinity of Dijon, is said to get over 7000 francs annually.

EXPLORATION OF AFRICA.—The United States ship John Adams sailed from the river Gambia on the 14th February, leaving on board Commander Lynch, of the United States Navy, who arrived there the day previous.

A letter in the Journal of Commerce says that Commander Lynch is under orders from the Secretary of the Navy, in connection with the Pennsylvania Colonization Society, to examine the West Coast of Africa, and decide upon a location suitable, in regard to healthfulness, fertility, etc., for the colonization of our free colored population. He had orders for any United States vessel he might fall in with to transport him to whatever point he might wish to proceed.

Congress declined making any appropriation for this exploration; and hence, we suppose, it must drop, so far as an exploration of the interior of Africa was desired.

It appears that the brazilian slave trade has become nearly extinct. This is mainly due to the measures of the Brazilian Government itself, which, of late, has become sincerely and resolutely in earnest to suppress the traffic. The importation of slaves into Brazil in 1848, amounted to 60,000, and in 1851 to only 3286, of which 1006 were captured by brazilian cruisers and declared free. During the past year, one vessel, and one only, it is said, is known to have landed a cargo of slaves on the coast of Brazil; and this occurred last June. The Brazilian Government deals very summarily with the slave traders.

The manufactory of jewelry is carried on in New York city to a large extent. It is estimated that the annual manufacture amounts to $3 000,000. There are seventeen houses engaged in it on a large scale, and twice as many small manufacturers. The wages given range from $10 to $18 per week. Some earn from $20 to $25; and a few have been known to get $30 per week.

ONE VOTE.—Within the last dozen years the Governor of Massachusetts was twice elected by a majority of one. At present paper says that a single vote sent Oliver Cromwell to the Long Parliament; Charles Stuart to the scaffold, revolutionized England, and made New England free. One vote gave us the tariff of 1842, and one vote made the tariff of 1846. One vote gave us Texas and made war with Mexico, and purchased California, turned thither the tide of emigration, and will change the destiny of the world. Those who are in the habit of excusing themselves from attending elections, in the belief that one vote will not make much difference, will do well to treasure up these facts, and act under their influence.

PREVENTION OF RAILROAD COLLISIONS.—Dr Clayton, of Norfolk, Va., has invented a machine for the prevention of collisions on railroads, and, as a consequence, the preservation of human life, and is now in Washington exhibiting his model, having taken the necessary steps for obtaining a patent right. The contrivance, it is said, is simple. There is a jointed lever at right angles with the rail, connected by a wire with a pulley wheel, by means of which a signal is raised from an upright timber, say at the height of eight feet, directly the axle of the car touches the lever. The same machinery depresses the signal just after the train passes it.

NUTS FOR UNCLE TOM.—At a funeral of an aged and faithful slave, which recently took place at Lynchburg, Va., ore hundred colored persons attended. Nearly all of these were slaves, who had been released from service by their masters, in order that they might pay the last tribute of respect to fidelity, honesty, and duty well discharged. In the procession there were also some dozen private carriages of the citizens, sent by their owners as a token of their respect to fidelity, however humble may have been the occupation in which it was exhibited.

EMIGRATION FROM IRELAND.—The Irish papers are filled with accounts of emigration. Every day, says the Tuam Herald, we witness the departure of crowds. The Waterford Chronicle states that on a recent occasion a vessel left with 221 persons directly for the United States. Remittances were pouring in from this country in great numbers, accompanied by earnest appeals to parents, brothers and sisters, to take up their departure for the New World. It says the Tuam Herald have many aged parents, whose years and infirmities render them averse to change, been persuaded to join their children in the United States.

The clerks in the Pension-office at Washington have made a formal acknowledgment of the kindness and courtesy uniformly manifested towards them by the late Commissioner, J. E. Heath, Esq.

Of the population of Ohio, 36,098 are natives of Maryland; 598 of the District of Columbia; 200,634 of Pennsylvania; and 85 762 of Germany; 112 257 of Germany; 51,562 of Ireland, and 25 660 of England.

Mrs. Fillmore, the late wife of the ex-President, was the daughter of Rev. Lemuel Powers, of Aurora, Cayuga county, N. Y., where she was married to Mr. Fillmore, then a young lawyer, just beginning the practice of his profession, in 1826.

The Boston Post states that Gov. Stevens, the newly appointed Governor of Washington Territory, is to be put in charge of one of the three surveying parties which will be sent out to explore the several routes for the Pacific Railroad.

A new telegraph line is to be put up along the entire length of the Ohio and Pennsylvania Railroad. The railroad company have contracted with Messrs. J. H. Wade, of Columbus, and T. P. Eckert, of Wooster, for its immediate construction.

The general impression appears to be that at the late session of Congress, the salaries of the U. S. Ministers to many of the Courts of Europe were increased to $20,000. This, however, is erroneous. The proposition failed through a disagreement of the two Houses.

It was stated some time since that a man named John Neald, who died in England last year, had left a will bequeathing all his property, worth £250 000, to Queen Victoria. The validity of the will, we notice by late London papers, has been duly confirmed, according to law, without opposition.

Austria has renewed former rigors towards Englishmen traveling through her dominions and has revived the passport, which is the subject of general complaint and has attracted the attention of the English Government.

Turkey.

The haughtiness of Turkey towards Russia induced the Russian envoy to repair to the Porte, which caused quite a flutter among the diplomatists. It was reported that the Russian fleet was clustered near Constantinople. The English Charge ordered the English fleet from Malta, but the commander refused to move unless ordered by Government. The French fleet, from Toulon, came up soon after, as if in be in readiness. Later information received at Paris stated that the affairs of Turkey had been amicably adjusted.

MY CHILDREN.

I have two little darlings,
With eyes of deepest blue,
There's just a year between them,
And the younger is but two;
I watch their minds expanding
With fond and earnest hope,
Like fragrant little blossoms,
Whose fatal daily ope.

Frank says he's mother's rosebud,
And little brother Willy,
With chin like alabaster,
Is budding my water lily;
I call them both my block-birds,
For like music to my ear
Are their merry little voices,
All silvery and clear.

What dew is to the flowers,
The rainbow to the sky,
Are these children to my pathway,
With their cheer and beauty.
To fill my heart with gladness,
With thankfulness and praise;
They chase away My sadness,
And leave no gloomy days.

Though many other blessings
Around my footsteps fall,
My children and their father
Are chief among them all;
My life seems crowned with joys
Whether I look on them;
And they the brightest jewels
Within the diadem.

Then thankful am my darlings,
Bright blessings from above,
God grant their tender boyhood
Rise not a mother's love.
Oh, may my days be lengthened
Throughout their early youth,
To lead them in the pathway
Of Honor and of Truth.

God grant me, too, His Spirit,
To guide their souls aright,
To teach them by example,
To walk as in His sight;
And when this life is ended,
May all whom He has given
United to form a family
Within the courts of heaven.

Arrival of the Steamship Daniel Webster. Fifteen Days Later from California—Important and Interesting from the Pacific.

The steamship Daniel Webster, O. F. Graffam commanding, reached her wharf early Wednesday morning, bringing fifteen days later news from the Pacific coast.

The Webster left in port at San Juan U. S. sloop-of-war Cyane, H. M. steamer Ocyne, and steamship Prometheus, which latter vessel sailed for New York on the 31st ult. with a full complement of passengers.

The officers of the Webster state that the difficulties heretofore existing between the inhabitants of Greytown and the Nicaragua Transit Company have been amicably adjusted by the arrival of the sloop-of-war Cyane, which vessel will remain on the Station until further advices from the War Department at Washington have been received.

The news by the Webster from California will be found quite interesting.

The Pacific mail steamship Tennessee was lost within a short distance of San Francisco, on the 12th ult., having been run ashore in a fog. Fortunately no lives were lost. Apprehensions are entertained for the safety of the Vanderbilt steamship Independence. Nothing has been heard of her up to latest dates. It is presumed, however, that some of her machinery has given out, and she has been obliged to run for some of the Pacific ports for repairs. The steamer Sea Bird has been dispatched with the endeavor to ascertain her whereabouts. The Independence left on board a large number of passengers. She connected with the Webster on her trip from NewOrleans, Jan. 1, and the Northern Light, from New York on the 20th of the same month.

GENERAL SUMMARY OF NEWS.

From the various exchanges, but principally from the San Francisco Journal of the 16th ult., we compile the following summary of news:

TOWN OF WEAVERVILLE BURNT—Loss $100,000.—The Alta California of the 16th ult. learns from the Shasta Courier that Weaverville was destroyed by fire on the 7th of March:

The fire broke out about two o'clock in the afternoon in the American House, and spread up and down the same side of the street with the rapidity of thought. From the Magnolia Saloon it crossed over to the building opposite, and there swept both sides of the entire street as far up as the Spanish Corral, a house of ill-fame. In the opposite direction from the American House, and upon the same side, nearly, it swept every building in the Main Saloon. Thus, in a few hours, has another of the most flourishing of our mining towns been almost destroyed by fire.

All the buildings on the side of Main street opposite the American Hotel, from the United States Hotel towards the Union Saloon, were saved, though many of them are much charred and otherwise injured.

An immense amount of goods in the Pastoche were consumed, the Pastoche barely having time to make his escape.

The fire spread with such amazing rapidity that but few personal effects were saved from the buildings.

It is reported heard whether the fire was supposed to be the work of an incendiary, or the result of accident or carelessness.

Considerable excitement prevailing to a considerable extent among the citizens on the Columbia river, and places on the Sound.

From Shasta, the most northern of the counties, at last accounts the snow had disappeared, the stages commenced running, business brisk, and miners doing well.

In Shasta, improvements are rapidly progressing. Twenty-three new buildings were observed, in process of erection, from one immediate vicinity.

At the Sacramento State Hospital during the past year, 1505 patients have been admitted; 1239 discharged cured; 238 died, and 31 are at present in the hospital. Total current expenses for the year $55,546 81.

The opening of the Mercantile Library Association in San Francisco was celebrated on the evening of the 4th of March with an oration by J. B. Crockett, Esq., and a poem by J. B. Kewen.

The preliminary survey of the Benicia and Marysville Rail Road is completed. The general character of the route is highly favorable to the proposed enterprise, the highest grade upon any point being but 13 and 3-10ths feet to the mile. The whole length of the road will be 85 miles.

There are three flouring mills in Sacramento, capable of turning out 300 bbls. of flour per day.

A young man named John P. Cryder, said to be a son of one of the firm of Wetmore & Cryder, of New York, was arrested a few days since, charged with having obtained credit of money upon a letter of credit from the above named house. Two or three of the bankers of this city had advanced money to a large amount. He represented himself as the accredited agent of Messrs. W. & C., of New York, for California. He is now in prison, waiting an investigation.

MINING INTELLIGENCE.

The intelligence from the mining districts is encouraging.

In Columbia and Vicinity miners are averaging $10 per day.

A lump of gold has been taken from Poor Man's Creek weighing twenty-three lbs., and is valued at $5000.

A tunneling company on the South Fork of the Yuba, made a push into the hill about one hundred feet, and struck rich pay, $200.

A number of large and very rich diggings have recently been discovered on Nevada and also in the neighborhood of Coloma.

A fine vein of silver was recently discovered near St. Johns, Mariposa county. According to a letter in one of the city papers, six different veins of silver have been recently found in the same county.

At Columbia miners are doing well, and times brisk. A row occurred on the 26th of February at a fandango house, in which revolvers, bowie knives, and tumblers were freely used—a regular "free-fight" knock down and drag out affair. The inauguration ball of the U. and L. Fire Company No. 4, came off on the evening of the 4th March. Upward of fifty ladies graced the occasion by their presence.

Considerable numbers of miners are leaving the mines at the present time for the new gold fields of Australia.

THE HERMITAGE.

Within a wood, one summer's day,
And in a hollow, ancient trunk,
Idled me from the world away,
To live as lives a hermit monk.

My cell—a ghostly sycamore,
The roots and limbs were dead with age;
Some had carved the gothic door
Which looked into my hermitage.

My library was large and full—
Where, ever as a hermit pinds,
I read until my eyes were dull
With tears, for all those tomes were God's.

The vine that at my doorway swung,
Hid verses writ on every leaf,
The very songs the bright bees sung
In honey-seeking visits brief—

Not brief—though each stayed never long—
So rapidly they came and went;
No pause was left in all their song,
For while they borrowed still they lent.

All day the woodland minstrels sang;
Small feet were in the leaves astir;
And often o'er my doorway rang
The tap of a blue-winged visitor.

After the stately river swayed,
And poured itself in giant swells,
While here the brooklet danced and played,
And gayly wrung its liquid bells.

The springs gave me their crystal flood,
And my contentment made it wine.
And oft I found what kingly food
Grew on the world-forgotten vine.

The moss, or weed, or running flower,
Too humble in their hope to climb,
Had in themselves the lovely power
To make me happier for the time.

And when the starry night came by,
And, stooping, looked into my cell,
Then all between the earth and sky
Was circled in a holier spell.

A brighter, and deeper, and breadth sublime,
O'erspread the scene and reached the stars,
Until Eternity and Time
Seemed drowning their dividing bars.

And voices which the day never hears,
And visions which the sun never sees,
From earth and from the distant spheres,
Came on the moonlight and the breeze.

Thus day and night my spirit grew
In love with that which round me shone.
Until my calm heart fully knew
The joy it is to be alone.

The time went by, till one fair dawn
Law against the Eastern fires
A visionary city drawn,
With dusky lines of domes and spires.

The wind, in sad and fitful spells,
Blew o'er it from the gates of morn,
Till I could clearly hear the bells
That rung above a world forlorn.

And well I listened to their voice,
And deeply pondered what they said,
Till I arose—there was no choice—
I went while yet the East was red.

My watered heart for utterance yearned—
The clamorous wind had broke the spell—
I souls must teach what I had learned
Within my simple woodland cell.

THE ELEVENTH COMMANDMENT.

T. S. Arthur tells a good story, we heard an age, about a loving couple in New Jersey, belonged to the Methodist Church. A new ceiling elder, Mr. N., was expected in that ; and as the ministers all stopped with r W. and his wife, every preparation was to give him a cordial reception. The hon- ople thought that religion, in part, con- ls in making some parade, and therefore the se was put in order, and a nice fire was e and the kitchen replenished with cakes, s, and every delicacy, preparatory to

While Mr. W. was out at his wood-pile, a plain ng, coarsely dressed, but quiet-like person came along and inquired the distance to next town. He was told that it was three s. Being very cold, he asked permission to and warm himself. Assent was given very ingly, and both went into the kitchen. wife looked daggers at this untimely intru- , for the stranger had on cow-hide boots, an t, and a thread-bare, but neatly patched t. At length she gave him a chair beside Dutch oven which was baking nice cakes for Presiding Elder, who was momentarily ex- ted, as he was to preach the next day at the a mile or two beyond.

The stranger, after warming himself, prepared ve, but the weather became more inclem- , and as his appetite was roused by the vi- s about the fire, he asked for some little re- shment ere he sat out on a cold walk to the n beyond. Mrs. W. was displeased, but on sultation with her husband, some cold bacon d bread were set on an old table, and he was somewhat gruffly told to eat. It was ing dark, and hints were thrown out that stranger had better depart, as it was three s to town. The wife grew petulent, as new preacher did not arrive, and her hus- and whistling the air of "Auld Lang Syne," le he thought of the words of the hymn— then I can read my title clear," and felt as he could order the stranger off without any ther ado.

The homely meal was at last concluded—the thanked them kindly for the hospitality he received, and opened the door to go. But was quite dark, and clouds denoting a storm ed the heavens.

"You say it is full three miles to D——?"

"Ah," said Mr. W. coldly; "I said so when first stopped, and you ought to have pushed like a prudent man. You would have reached re before it was quite dark."

"But I was cold and hungry, and might have died by the way."

The manner of saying this touched the far- 's feelings a little.

"You have warmed me, and fed me, for which thankful. Will you not bestow another kindness upon one in a strange place, and, s goes out in the darkness, may lose himself perish in the cold?"

The peculiar form in which this request was , and the tone in which it was uttered, put out of the power of the farmer to say no.

"Go in there and sit down," he answered, ning to the kitchen, "and I will see my wife hear what she says."

And Mr. W. went into the parlor where the per table stood, covered with a snow white h, and displaying his wife's set of blue- gged china, that was only brought out on spe- occasions.

The tall mould candles were burning thereon, t on the hearth blazed a cheerful fire.

"Hasn't that old fellow gone yet?" asked r. W. She heard the voice as he returned n the door.

"Yes, and what do you suppose? He wants to let him stay all night?"

"Indeed! we'll do no such thing! We can't ve the likes of him in the house now. Where uld he sleep?"

"Not in the best room, even if Mr. N. should come."

"No, indeed!"

"But really, I don't see, Jane, how we can him out of doors. He doesn't look like a y strong man, and it's dark and cold, and three miles to D——."

"It's too much. He ought to have gone on le he had daylight, and not lingered here, as did, till it got dark."

"We can't turn him out of doors, Juns, and no use to think of it. He'll have to stay, now."

"But what can we do with him?"

"He seems like a decent man, at least; and don't look as if he had anything bad about m. We might make him a bed on the floor somewhere."

"I wish he had been at Guinea before he came here!" said Mrs. W., fretfully. The dis- pointment and conviction that Mr. N. would arrive, occasioned her to feel, and the in- trusion of so unwelcome a visitor as the stranger completely unhinged her mind.

"Oh, well," replied her husband, in a soothing voice; "never mind. We must make the best of it. He came to us tired and hungry, and we warmed and fed him. He now asks shelter for the night, and we must not refuse him, nor grant his request in a complaining or reluctant spirit. You know what the Bible says about entertaining angels unawares."

"Angels! did you ever see an angel look like him?"

"Having never seen an angel," said the farmer, smiling, "I am unable to speak as to their appearance."

This had the effect to call an answering smile to the face of Mrs. W. and a better feeling to her heart. It was finally agreed between them that the man, as he seemed like a decent kind of person, should be permitted to occupy the minister's room, if that individual did not arrive, an event to which they both looked with but small expectancy. If he did come, why the man would have to put up with poorer accommodations.

When Mr. W. returned to the kitchen, where the stranger had seated himself before the fire, he informed him that they had decided to let him stay all night. The man expressed in a few words his grateful sense of their kindness, and then became silent and thoughtful. Soon after, the farmer's wife, giving up all hope of Mr. N.'s arrival, had supper taken up, which consisted of coffee, warm short cake and broiled chickens. After all was on the table, a short conference was held as to whether it would do not to invite the stranger to take supper. It was true they had given him as much bread and bacon as he could eat, but then, as long as he was going to stay all night, it looked too inhospitable to sit down to the table and not to ask him to join them. So, making a virtue of necessity, he was kindly asked to come to supper, an invitation which he did not decline. Grace was said over the meal by Mr. W. and the coffee poured out, the bread helped, and the meat carved.

There was a fine little boy six years old at the table, who had been brightened up and dressed in his best, in order to grace the minister's reception. Charles was full of talk, and the parents felt a mutual pride in showing him off, even before their humble guest, who noticed him particularly, though he had not much to say. "Come, Charley," said Mr. W., after the meal was over, and he sat leaning back in his chair, "can't you repeat the pretty hymn mamma learned you last Sunday?"

Charley started off without further invitation, and repeated very accurately two or three verses of a new camp meeting hymn, that was just then very popular.

"Now let us hear you say the commandments, Charley," spoke up the mother, well pleased at the child's performance.

"How many commandments are there?" asked the father.

The child hesitated, and then, looking up at the stranger, near whom he sat, said, innocently:

"How many are there?"

The man thought for some moments, and said, as if in doubt:

"Eleven, are there not?"

"Eleven!" ejaculated Mrs. W., in unfeigned surprise.

"Eleven!" said her husband, with more rebukn than astonishment in his voice. "Is it possible, sir, that you do not know how many commandments there are? How many are there, Charley? Come, tell me—you know, of course."

"Ten," replied the child.

"Right, my son," returned Mr. W., looking with a smile of approval on the child. "Right! There isn't a child of his age in ten miles who can't tell you there are ten commandments. Did you ever read the Bible, sir? addressing the stranger.

"When I was a little boy I used to read it sometimes. But I am sure I thought there were eleven commandments. Are you not mistaken about there being only ten?"

"Could any one believe it? such ignorance of the Bible!"

Mr. W. did not reply, but rose, and going to one corner of the room where the good book lay upon the small stand, he put it on the table before him, and opened at that portion in which the commandments are recorded.

"There!" he said, placing his finger upon the proof of the stranger's error. "There! look for yourself."

The man came round from his side of the table and looked over his shoulder.

"There! ten, d'ye see?"

"Yes, it does say ten," replied the man; "and yet it seems to me there are eleven. I'm sure I have always thought so."

"Doesn't it say ten," inquired Mr. W. with a marked impatience in his voice.

"It does, certainly."

"Well, what more do you want? Can't you believe the Bible?"

"Oh yes, I believe the Bible; and yet, it strikes me, somehow, that there must be eleven commandments. Hasn't one been added some where else?"

Now this was too much for brother and sister W. to hear. Such ignorance of sacred matters they felt to be unpardonable. A long lecture followed, in which the man was scolded, admonished, and threatened, with divine indignation. At its close he modestly asked if he might not have the Bible to read for an hour or two before retiring for the night. This request was granted with more pleasure than any of the preceding ones.

Shortly after supper the man was conducted to the little square room, accompanied by the Bible. Before leaving him alone, Mr. W. felt it to be his duty to extort him to spiritual things, and he did so most earnestly for ten or fifteen minutes. But he could not see that his words made much impression, and he finally left his guest, lamenting his obduracy and ignorance.

In the morning he came down, and meeting Mr. W. asked him if he would be so kind as to lend him a razor, that he might remove his beard which did not give his face a very attractive aspect. His request was complied with.

"We will have prayers in about ten minutes," said Mr. W. as he handed him the razor and shaving-box.

The man appeared, and behaved with due propriety at family worship. After breakfast he thanked the farmer and his wife for their hospitality, and departing went on his journey.

Ten o'clock came, but Mr. N. had not arrived. So Mr. and Mrs. W. started for the meeting-house, not doubting that they would find him there. But they were disappointed. A goodly number of people were inside the meeting-house and a goodly number outside, but the minister had not arrived.

"Where is Mr. N——?" inquired a dozen voices, as a little crowd gathered around the farmer.

"He hasn't come yet. Something has detained him. But I still look for him—indeed, I fully expected to find him here."

The day was cold, and Mr. W., after becoming thoroughly chilled, concluded to go in, and keep a good lookout for the minister from the window near which he usually sat. Others, from the same cause, followed his example, and the little meeting house was soon filled, and one after another came dropping in. The farmer, who turned towards the door each time it was opened, was a little surprised to see his guest of the previous night enter, and come slowly down the aisle, looking from side to side, as if searching for a vacant seat, very few of which were now left. Still advancing, he finally got within the little enclosed altar, and, ascending to the pulpit, took off his old overcoat and sat down.

By this time Mr. W. was at his side, and had his hand upon his arm.

"You mustn't sit here. Come down, and I will show you to a seat," he said, in an excited tone.

"Thank you," replied the man, in a very composed voice. "It is very comfortable here." And the man remained immovable.

Mr. W. feeling embarrassed, went down, intending to get a brother "official" to assist him in making a forcible ejection of the man from the place he was desecrating. Immediately upon his doing so, however, the man rose, and standing up at the desk, opened the hymn book. His voice thrilled the finger ends of brother W., as in a distinct and impressive manner he gave out the hymn beginning—

"Help us to help each other, Lord,
Each other's cross to bear;
Let each his friendly aid afford,
And feel a brother's care."

The congregation rose after the stranger had read the entire hymn, and had repeated the first two lines for them to sing. Brother W. usually started the tunes. He tried this time but went off on a long metre tune. Discovering his mistake at the second word, he balked and tried it again, but now he stumbled on short metre. A musical brother here came to his aid, and led off with a tune that suited the measure in which the hymn was written.

After singing, the congregation kneeled and the minister—for no one doubted his real character—addressed the Throne of Grace with much fervor and eloquence. The reading of a chapter in the Bible succeeded. Then there was a deep pause throughout the room in anticipation of the text, which the preacher prepared to announce.

Brother W. looked pale, and his hands and knees trembled. Sister W.'s face was like crimson, and her heart was beating so loud that she wondered whether the sound was not heard by the sister who sat beside her. There was a breathless silence. The dropping of a pin might almost have been heard. Then the fine, emphatic tones of the preacher filled the crowded room.

"And a new commandment I give unto you, that you love one another."

Brother W. had bent forward to listen, but now he sank back in his seat. This was the Eleventh Commandment.

The sermon was deep, searching, yet affectionate and impressive. The preacher uttered nothing that could in the least wound the brother and sister, of whose hospitality he had partaken, but he said much that smote upon their hearts, and made them painfully conscious that they had not shown as much kindness to the stranger as he had been entitled to receive on the broad principle of humanity. But they suffered from mortification of feeling. To think that they should have treated the Presiding Elder of the district after such a fashion was deeply humiliating; and the idea of the whole affair getting abroad, interfered sadly with their devotional feelings throughout the whole period of service.

At last the sermon was over, the ordinance administered and the benediction pronounced. Brother W. did not know what it was best for him to do. He never was more at a loss in his life. Then Mr. N. descended from his pulpit, but he did not step forward to meet him. How could he do that? Others gathered around and shook hands with him, but he still lingered and held back.

"Where is brother W.?" he at length heard asked. It was the voice of the minister.

"Here he is," said one or two, opening the way to where the farmer stood.

The preacher advanced, and catching his hand, said—

"How do you do, brother W.? I am glad to see you. And where is sister W.?"

Sister W. was brought forward, and the preacher shook hands with them heartily while his face was lit up with smiles.

"I believe I am to find a home with you," he said, as it was settled.

Before the still embarrassed brother and sister could reply, some one asked—

"How came you to be detained so late? you was expected last night. And where is brother R.?"

"Brother R. is sick, replied Mr. N., "and I had to come alone. Five miles from this my horse gave out, and I had to come the rest of the way on foot. But I became so cold and weary that I found it necessary to ask a farmer not far from here to give me a night's lodging, which he was kind enough to do. I thought I was still three miles off, but it happened that I was much nearer my journey's end than I supposed."

This explanation was satisfactory to all parties, and in due time the congregation dispersed, and the Presiding Elder went home with brother and sister W. One thing is certain, however, the story never got out for some years after the worthy brother and sister had passed from their labors, and it was then related by Mr. N. himself, who was rather eccentric in his character, and, like numbers of his ministerial brethren, fond of a joke, and given to relating good stories.

Was Bishop Ives Mad?

Our Episcopal cotemporaries have been discussing this question with a good deal of zeal. High Churchmen and Puseyites account for his late "reconciliation" with Rome, on the ground of alleged insanity. Several of the more evangelical papers deny the allegation, and contend that Rome was but the natural terminus of the road he had long been travelling. The Protestant Churchman says:

"As to insanity there is not a single mark of it in this last step, but the reverse. And why should it require insanity in his case to forsake truth for error any more than in the case of a score of others who commenced Romanizing in the Church about the same time with himself—some of whom preceded him, while others are lagging behind. That these last should now join in the attempt to pass him off as insane, is certainly a now, but not an unaccountable development. We say join in the attempt, for some no doubt by an effort of true, though unintelligent charity, seek to excuse Mr. Ives' career. By this last act he shows himself saner than his late companions; and we trust that those who, during the past ten years, have sympathized with him in doctrine while continuing in our Church, will first vindicate their own sanity, before they undertake to impugn that of Mr. Ives."

Just Conclusion.

Grace Greenwood, in a letter from Italy, after close observation of the state of things in that country, remarks:

"The more I see of the pomps, superstitions, mummeries, frauds, avarice, and arrogant domination of the Roman Church, the more am I convinced that it is the source, strength, and subtle essence of European tyranny—that it narrows, blinds, grinds down, and crushes out the very soul of the age. It is a fungus growth of error and falsehood, mocking the fair and fruitful forms of truth—a dark and gigantic unreality, for the time fearfully real—the nightmare which oppresses the world. As it seems to me so must I speak of it; I cannot do otherwise, and keep my own truth toward God and my fellows."

LETTER FROM ENGLAND.

STAFFORDSHIRE, March 10, '53.

In this country we have the most indubitable signs and evidences of social and economical prosperity. Nothing appears to be languishing except it be spiritual religion. The abundance of God's earthly gifts, in too many instances, are allowed to engross that attention and energy that God claims supremely for Himself. Even in political affairs we have progress, and that too in the right direction. D'Israeli, as the last Cabinet was falling to pieces, declared that a coalition Government never had succeeded in this country, and never would: but thus far our new Cabinet, though made up of a combination of different political parties, bids fair for a permanency. Many social, and free-trade, as well as educational questions, they are eminently qualified to grapple with; and already measures are shadowed forth which, if carried, cannot but be of immense advantage to England and her Colonies.

The principle of making over the Canadian Clergy Reserves to the local Legislature, to be either secularized, or re-distributed by that body, was affirmed in the House of Commons, the other night, by a majority of 83. Such a majority, of course, secures the safe passing of the Ministerial measure through the Lower House, and it is not probable that it will be thrown out in the House of Lords. The debate was enlivened with some rather rough blows directed, not against the respective debaters in the Commons, but against the Bishops who had borne a part in a similar debate, a few nights before, in the House of Lords. Sir J. Pukington, who opposed the bill, began this amusing sort of warfare, by an attack on the Bishop of Oxford, who had in his own House defended the Government measure, contending that the Canadians should deal with this matter as they pleased. The example of thus attacking the Bishops was too good a one to be lost, and accordingly the new Cabinet Minister, Sir W. Molesworth, followed it up by an onslaught on the Bishop of Exeter, who had taken the other side of the argument in resisting the radicalism of his Brother of Oxford. Sir W. Molesworth described the Bishop of Exeter as the Right Rev. Prelate, famed for his legal lore, and for a litigious spirit which made him the pest of his diocese. This sally was too much for the House to bear, especially as coming from one who ought to preserve the grave and decorous bearing of a Cabinet Minister. His colleague, Mr. Gladstone, looked, it is said, exceedingly scandalized and amazed; and Sir R. Inglis, the champion of the Church of England, reproved him sharply for his indiscretion. But after all, Sir W. Molesworth, who has devoted much attention to our Colonies, made an excellent speech; and his arguments, together with those of Mr. Gladstone, also a great authority on Colonial questions, may be considered as having settled the whole matter. What we call the Church Establishment principle is doomed; for the arguments employed in reference to Canada, if applied to Ireland and Scotland, would have equal force—the Establishment adherents, in both Ireland and Scotland, being in the minority. There are good men undeniably in the Irish and Scotch State Churches; but for their sake, as well as on other grounds, I would demolish their house of bondage, and set them free. Let the Gospel have an open field—let it be upheld and propagated by those who love it, and know its transforming power, and it must advance to the conquest of the World!

A very important decision has been come to by the Government respecting Colonial Postage. If the consent of those Colonies who have independent Legislatures can be obtained, of which there is no doubt, it is the intention of the Postmaster General, Lord Canning, to institute a uniform rate of postage to and from all our Colonies, near and distant, at the rate of six pence for every letter under half an ounce. At present the average is fourteen pence. The notion of a penny rate has been pressed by an influential deputation upon the notice of the Government; but Elihu Burrett has not yet succeeded in bringing over the Postoffice authorities to his views: the conclusion come to however is a considerable step in advance. The Book-Post is also to be extended, commencing May 1. The total charge from any part of Great Britain, to any part of our vast Indian Empire, for a book not exceeding a half a pound in weight, will be six pence; not exceeding one pound, one shilling. Three pounds is the maximum. I hope these reductions will be extended to the United States. At present an American Magazine—say Putnam's Monthly—if posted for England, would be charged postage on delivery in this country at the rate of two pence an ounce; and weighing over eight ounces, it would be charged as nine, making eighteen pence to be paid this side, besides what has to be paid your side. Now that there is to be an International Copyright, between England and America, is not this the fitting time for demanding an immense reduction in these postage charges on the literature of the two countries? And let every American and British editor gird on his armor—ply his pen—indoctrinate the public mind on this subject; and the result will be that the issues of the press will be free, indeed; and, instead of being hindered, will be helped in their wanderings through the world.

The struggle with Rome with us still continues. The Scottish Reformation Society is doing good service in this war; it is a most vigorous organization, and is rousing itself up to a new campaign, with a new plan of operations. The Society has engaged, in the capacity of its Acting Secretary, a gentleman highly qualified for the fore-front of the battle—the Rev. Doctor Dill. He has lived in Ireland, and knows the denationalizing effects of the Popish system, as exemplified in the unhappy condition of his native land; and he is more widely known as the author of a book for which there has been a great demand, entitled "Ireland's Miseries, their Cause and Cure." Doctor Dill has practical wisdom, a capacity for continuous labor, and an aptitude for public addresses, as shown in an analagous sphere in Ireland, all of which encourage the friends of Protestantism to expect incalculable good from his labors. The Doctor's first work will be to rouse, concentrate, and direct the energies of Scotland against the common enemy; and in order to this Protestant defence, Associations are to be formed all over the country.

Popery, viewed politically or religiously, is the deadly foe of every man in the land; and the heart of every man, therefore, should be enlisted in this quarrel. The good soldier has but one duty on the day of battle, and that is to repair to his place in the ranks, and to fight side by side with his companions; but to secure this, light must be shed upon the Papacy, so as to convince every man that, as a religion, it is a system of gross and foul idolatry, and as a scheme of government, a system of most intolerable serfdom and vassalage. This Society will ceaselessly agitate for the speedy and total withdrawal of the grant to the Popish College of Maynooth. I regard the recent vote on that question, in our Parliament, as being on the whole a hopeful one. It shows us that Maynooth begins to be seen as it really is—a nest of treason and of abominations so foul and shocking, that they cannot even be unveiled; and the folly, if not crime, of subsidizing such a scandal begins to be felt. These British subjects are taught immorality and treason. Open its text-books—they smell rankly of the worst impurities. Enter its class-rooms—you hear the highest ultramontane notions—notions which no man can receive and be a true subject of Queen Victoria; and shall we continue to give £30,000 annually to support a morality which ignores the decalogue, and a spiritual supremacy which lays prostrate the Queen's authority! Surely, this enormous legislative folly is tolerated only because the country does not know what it is doing! On Thursday last an enthusiastic public meeting was held in Edinburgh for the purpose of repelling Popish aggression, and promoting the Protestant cause—when Doctor Dill was welcomed to Scotland, and when he, by his powerful speech, fairly broke ground in this momentous enterprise. The leading Ministers of the Scottish Churches were present, and among the speakers were Doctor Stevenson, (Established,) Dr. Begg, (Free Church,) Dr. Aiton, author of a recent work on Palestine, Rev. R. M. M'Bruir, (Wesleyan,) with Dr. Dill, and Dr. W. Anderson, who has been lecturing to thousands in Glasgow, Edinburgh and London, on the Mass, Penance, etc. Dr. Anderson denounces with the most powerful sarcasm the mummeries and abominations of Popery. At this meeting he said:

"That Popery was a compound of mechanics, pharmacy, hydrodynamics, mesmerism, wisardism, etc. What was baptismal regeneration, but salvation by hydrodynamics? What was confirmation, but a balsam of oil, and the imposition of the Bishop hands—the latter being mesmerism? When the priest at Mass prayed that that body of Christ which he had received should cleave to his bowels, and that there should be no remains of sin left within him, what was that but salvation by pills?" He went on to illustrate salvation by rags, by a humorous reference to the pretended efficacy of the Romish Scapulars. Dr. Begg's speech was a deadly thrust at Popery, and did tremendous execution. He formally introduced Dr. Dill, declaring he had no doubt that Dr. Dill would meet such a welcome in Scotland as no man coming into it had met with.

A Romish priest, James Forbes, has recently made a precious fool of himself in announcing publicly, last September, his conversion to Protestantism; and last month he publishes a letter announcing his re-conversion to Popery. Some will have it to be a Jesuit dodge, but we shall probably hear more hereafter. Meantime it may not be amiss to compare in parallel columns a brief extract from the respective documents:

FORBES, THE PROTESTANT.	FORBES, THE PAPIST.
"For a considerable time I have had doubts of the correctness of the system of Popery. I discovered the Church of Rome not to be the Church of Christ, and that in her bosom no ordinary possibility of salvation existed. The true doctrine clearly laid down in Scripture, I find professed by Protestants. FORBES." September, 1852.	"It is with the deepest sorrow that I look back on the grievous scandal I have given to the Church of God by the sad event of my unfortunate apostacy. But glory be to God. I am no longer a Protestant. I am sick of Protestantism. My soul loathes heresy. FORBES." February, 1853.

I saw in a friend's house last week the Wesleyan Times, of March 4, and glancing over the vile print, I perceived an editorial article directed against the New Orleans Christian Advocate, which I was curious enough to read. The editor bitterly complains of statements made by some English writer in your paper, derogatory to himself and his predecessor; but he takes care not to inform his readers wherein the slander consists. After reading the article my conviction was that you had pierced his thick skin, troubled his seared conscience, and filled his bad heart with some relentings. Your correspondent has truth on his side; for it cannot be questioned by any unbiased mind that under the garb of religion the Wesleyan Times has done more to injure, and retard Christianity among us, than the whole tribe of infidel prints combined. MAZZINI.—Mazzini, according to the late advices from Europe, was not to be found. It was denied that he had escaped in an English frigate. The London correspondent of the New York Commercial Advertiser, in a letter of the 15th instant, says:

"The most extraordinary efforts are being made to discover the retreat of Mazzini. Since the insurrection at Milan, nothing has been known of his movements. He is believed to have boldly ventured on the Austrian frontier, if not actually into Austria or Lombardy, and the greatest anxiety is felt by his friends for his escape. It was reported that he had taken refuge on board an English ship of war at Genoa, but this seems to have been a mistake. A few days ago, the Austrians believed they had tracked him to Nuremburg, in Bavaria, but although every engine was set to work to accomplish his seizure, they appear thus far to have been foiled.

POSITION OF NEW GRANADA.

Much ado is made by Archbishop Hughes and his party, in New York, and by the Romanists in the United States, about one Archbishop Masquera, of Santa Fe de Bogota, in the Republic of New Granada. He having brought himself into collission with the "powers that be," has been obliged to quit, and is sympathised with as a persecuted saint. The following, from a correspondent of the Independent, gives a pretty fair and condensed view of the history of the matter:

I doubt if ever in the history of the Papal Church, it has found itself in the same position in relation to any other country, which it now sustains in this republic.

It is the State religion, and yet has little influence with the government of the State—its authority acknowledged, and yet not submitted to—the form of its power unimpaired, but its substance not felt. It is like one of the ant-eaten houses of this country—a mere shell; it waits only for a little stronger wind than usual, to ornish it down like a pasteboard house. And even that wind is not wanting; for the Pope's late allocution respecting his affairs in this country will probably prove a breeze of a different kind from what he intended when he emitted it. On his part it was a kind of last effort of hope; and probably he will not be very much surprised, however grieved he may be, to learn that here its effect is only to weaken his before almost nominal power. Did the people here care sufficiently about him, it would exasperate them against him, but as it is they pay very little attention to it. Said one of the principal men in this city, when asked his opinion respecting the allocution, "What do we care for the Pope! He is an old fool, any how," and probably he expressed the sentiment of the great number of influential men in the country.

The Pope speaks as if there were a conspiracy of long standing among the rulers of this State to thwart his plans, and break down his authority, but I am sure this charge is not true. There does not seem to have been any hostility to him in the Government; but they have rather been driven into the measures they have adopted by the instinct or necessity of self-preservation. The people were resolved to have a republican constitution, and in framing it they very wisely adopted as a model that of the best constructed Republic the world has ever known, the United States of America. And when they did this they probably thought very little about any probability of bringing themselves into collision with Rome; they had merely fixed their hearts on having such a Government as they now have. But when their experiment was once started, they very soon found the principles they had adopted were irreconcilable with obedience to the Pope; they found that Popery and freedom could not live harmoniously together. First, in order to be free the people must be instructed, and in the way of this were two prominent obstacles. The Jesuits, in whose hands the education of the people was placed, did not wish the masses to be instructed; and then, by reason of the horse-leech disposition of the Church, exercised for many years, the Government were pecuniarily unable to provide the means of education for the people. But they were resolved to succeed, and soon found ways and means. They first provided the means of education for all males, and then decreed that after a certain date no man should be allowed to vote who could not read and write, and here they made a decided improvement on our own laws.

But how did they provide the means? In a way that all the States of South America and Mexico would do wisely to imitate. The country abounded with those rotten sores upon the body politic—monastic institutions, most of which by the usual process had become very wealthy, at the same time that the numbers of their occupants had become very much reduced. It was a general question, "Why should vast revenues be absorbed by this handful of vicious idlers?" So the law was passed that when the number of monks in any one establishment should not exceed a certain number, they should be transferred to another, and their property pass into the educational fund. By this means a fund was provided amply sufficient for educating all the children of the State. But of course the Jesuits were opposed to all this; in other ways also they showed themselves opposed to the plans of the Government. Their expulsion from the State became necessary, and they were expelled. They then instigated a rebellion against the Government, and were finally defeated. Again, the religious establishment was so constituted, or rather unconstituted, as to be a ruinous burden to the people; and as the Republic must succeed, this obstacle must be removed. So the number of priests, i. e. curates, was very much reduced, and then all were provided with fixed salaries from the public treasury. The object of this movement was to rid the people of the burden of the priesthood; but it went further than this; it relieved them in a great degree from their influence also. Again, so long as the bishops and priests were completely subject to the Pope, they were a body capable of making a great deal of trouble. So measures, of which the last named was an important one, were taken to subject them completely to the home power; and in carrying these out the Government has come into collision with the Pope more than in any other way. Marriage was made a civil contract; and thus the priesthood, and through them the Pope, were deprived of one of their strongest engines of tyranny over the people; one of the strongest points in the Pope's protest is respecting this law. The Government also fastened its strongest grip on a privilege granted by an ungrateful hour to the old Spanish kings of this country, the right of appointing bishops and priests. This they have retained, persisted in exercising; and in consequence every bishop, but one I think, has been expelled the country, and that one is in a critical position. Of course the Pope sustains them in their opposition to the Government, but in so doing he is destroying himself.

Again, the Government very wisely thought it would be a blessed thing for the people, if intelligent men from other lands, and especially from the United States, could be induced to settle here, and introduce the arts of living. So they passed very liberal acts respecting grants of land, etc. They did what was a much greater thing—what I think no other Papal State has ever done; they removed every religious disability, and guaranteed to all the unmolested enjoyment of their own modes of worship.

These are the principal offences committed by this Government against the Pope, and they prove conclusively two things—one, that this people is determined to be free, and the other, that the Pope cannot prevent it. The case is past recovery. He cannot recover this lost power by force; he holds not the sword as he once held it; and as to his frightening the nation into submission, the idea is absurd. Shocked ghosts cannot frighten those who are awake and sober.

FATHER GAVAZZI.

The Italian monk Gavazzi, who was so conspicuous as a friend of liberty in the late revolutions in Italy, has arrived in New York, and was publicly received at a large meeting held in the Broadway Tabernacle, on the 23d ult. He is descended from an old and honored family; and is a man of genius, and an orator. His liberal principles brought upon him displeasure and imprisonment from Pope Gregory XVI. He was again received into favor by Pope Pius IX. When the epoch of the late revolutions dawned, he was the first man to parade the streets of Rome with the emblematic colors pinned to his breast, and he struggled afterwards nobly for the principles of freedom. When the French entered Rome he was a proscribed man, and escaped through the good offices of the American Consul. The Commercial Advertiser, speaking of his personal appearance, says he is tall, with strongly marked Italian features, and wears the habit of a monk. In his address, which is fully reported in the Commercial, we find a decided renunciation of Popery, but no distinct avowal of the principles of evangelical religion. As to his religious notions we will let him speak for himself:

"To correct a mistake into which some have fallen, I beg to be called, not a converted priest, but a seceder priest, because I am no Protestant. Now, in England, I did not lose the sympathy of the public because I did not call myself a Protestant; but in America, perhaps, some severe Protestants may say, 'We have no confidence in a man who will not avow himself as a Protestant.' I am no 'Protestant,' because I respect all Christian evangelical churches. If I say I am a Presbyterian, an Episcopalian may say, Why are you not an Episcopalian? If I be an Episcopalian the Methodist may inquire why I do not belong to his persuasion; and so with other denominations. Therefore, I say I am no Protestant; I am a Christian. But it will be immediately said that all infidels call themselves 'Christians.' Very well, but I am not only a Christian, but I am a Romish Catholic. Then, it is said, 'all Papists call themselves that.' Yes, rightly or wrongly?

"In the Scriptures the devil calls himself the angel of light, though in truth what is he but the angel of darkness? We declare that the Romish is the Popish Catholicism; that Romish is the Catholic Church established by the Apostle Paul. The Romish Church is the most ancient Church in Europe. When Rome had no Pope or Popery, it had that Church, and to that Church I belong. I am proud to be an Italian, and as an Italian I disclaim all Protestant denominational appellations. I, as an Italian crusader, shall preach, and have preached, civil liberty in Italy; but as a preacher of civil liberty, I also shall preach religious liberty in my native land. In Germany they are Lutherans, because they are Germans; in France the Frenchmen are Huguenots, because they are Frenchmen; in America and England the people are Protestants, because England and America is Protestant; and in Italy we are Roman Catholics because we are Italians.

"The Germans call themselves Lutherans by Luther; in France they are Calvinists by Calvin; you call yourselves Protestants by Cromwell and Knox, and we call ourselves Romish Catholics by Rome. But the time will come, when all peculiar denominational distinctions will disappear; believe me, the time will come when all mankind [illegible] itself no more Lutheran or Calvinistic or Protestant, but all Christian, and [illegible]. The time will come when Christianity [illegible] on earth once more, to establish [illegible] kingdom of universal justice [illegible]. In the meantime, I cannot accept [illegible] any Protestant denomination. I cannot [illegible] for my native country a copy of [illegible] which it possesses.

"But recollect, I am no Popish [illegible] of Gregory VIIth, or Alexander VIth, or Gregory XVIth, or the Pio Nono school. I am a Romish Catholic. I have no doubt I will respect my brethren, and love of my poor native land, it [illegible]

"And again—

"I am no Protestant, because my mission requires me to be independent. My mission is to destroy Popery—to annihilate the Pope."

"No man who professes his [illegible] conscientiously can be unhappy. He may be in distress of mind, as well as [illegible] under [illegible] inevitable sufferings on [illegible]

The New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Christian Advocate.

Terms: $1 50 per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

Saturday Morning, April 16.

"MONEY IN HAND."—Our cotemporary of the Texas Banner says it very well. It just suits our case. Our cash-receipts are not covering our expenses! What more need be said to our FRIENDS? Are they prepared to let the New Orleans Christian Advocate go down? "Several of our brethren write us sometimes they have money in hand; we are very glad of it, but it would be better if we had it here to pay our 'haade.' Please, brethren, send it by mail; and don't forget that we are always willing to accept money and new subscribers."

THE MAILS.—The complaints of irregularity in the transmission of papers by the mails, are more frequent than probably at any previous time. Subscribers and editors, with whom we exchange, must bear this in mind when our paper fails to reach them. Our issue is punctually and carefully put up for the mails every week, and the cause of irregularity or failure in its receipt must be attributed to the inefficiency of Postoffice arrangements.

We cut the above remarks from the Southern Churchman, and reprint them, because they exactly express our own defeace when we are complained of for non-reception of papers. [ED.

REV. JOHN BOSWELL.—This aged and faithful minister died in Christian triumph on 27th February last, in Pike county, Ala. He died of a cancer, in his sixty-fifth year.

PROFESSOR AGASSIS.

A very large, intelligent and most attentive audience was assembled, last evening, at the Lyceum Hall, to hear the interesting lecture of Professor Agassis. His illustration of the structure of certain portions of the animated creation, was so simple, clear and beautiful, that the plainest understanding could fully comprehend it. The internal structure of the finny tribe was laid to view with the master-hand of a skillful anatomist; and the lecturer, in conveying his ideas, used only those technical terms which were familiar to every ear.

His next lectnre will be given on Tuesday, the 19th instant, upon that very interesting subject, the Coral Reefs of Florida.

QUARTERLY.—The Methodist Quarterly, (Dr. M'Lintock) for April, is an excellent number. Whatever his contributors do, or fail to do, the editor is always excellent.

MONTHLIES.—We omitted at the time, but it is not now too late to acknowledge the receipt of those capital Monthlies, Harper and Putnam, for April, from McGinnis, 56 Gravier street. He supplies them promptly, always.

BRITISH PERIODICALS.—We should be very loath to do without these re-publications by L. Scott & Co., 79 Fulton street, New York; almost do without the new hat first, when the old falls in at the sides, and on the top. The London Quarterly, and Westminster, of January; the North British, of February; and Blackwood, of March; have reached our table—thanks to the delinquent mails. Here we have all political shades set forth—the Whig, the Conservative, the Free Church, the Liberal, (!) and not omitting the Tory. But, though politics distinguish, they occupy but a small portion of them. It is their literary character which gives them their chief interest, and in this they stand at the head of all their class. The postage under the new law is trifling, and the rates are uniform to all parts of the Union. See advertisement.

PERVERTS.—A Baltimore letter writer, of April 8, says:

Religious circles here are agitated by another convert from the Episcopal clergy to the Roman Catholic church. The Rev. Mr. Baker, rector of St. Luke's church, in this city, yesterday, without previous notice, suddenly resigned his charge, and announced his intention of joining the Catholic communion. His friends pronounce him insane. He was an ultra High-Churchman. Many Episcopalians here confidently believe that Bishop Whittingham, now in Europe, will, before his return, follow in the footsteps of Dr. Ives, and surrender the "signs of his rebellion to the Pope."

A PULPIT DILEMMA.—It was the remark of Rector Jenkyn, "That in the pulpit splendid sermons are splendid sins. They dazzle, amuse, and astonish, like brilliant fireworks, but throw daylight on no subject. They draw attention to the speaker, instead of the theme. The splendid preacher, like the pyrotechnist, calculates on a dark night among his attendants, and amid the corruscations of the pulpit his skill and his art are admired, but Christ is not glorified, nor souls saved."

What could any sensible man mean by such a remark? What kind of preaching could he refer to? Whom does he mean? "Splendid!" Why, is not that the very kind of preaching the world is calling for, and we are trying to give them? A sin! Well, what will be said next about popular preaching and the world's taste? It is really difficult to please every body. If a man aims to meet the popular demand, then the Bible and the old-fashioned are down upon him; and if he adheres to Scripture precedents, the fashionable and rich will leave him, and go to Mr. Smooth-way's Church, and his will be considered unfashionable. What is a man to do?

THE GODLESS COMMON SCHOOLS.

Such is the designation of our excellent Free School System among rabid Romanists and their organs. They do not pretend to find fault with the thoroughness of their instruction. This would lead to a conclusive appeal to facts. A visit to those Schools which are the just pride of the city, on any day, or an attendance upon an examination occasion, would show them superior in their scholarship to the "School of the Christian Brothers of St. Patrick's Congregation," and kindred Schools. But the Common Schools have this insuperable objection lying against them—they are godless. No complaint is made of their mental culture, but their moral is neglected;—there is no recognition of the religious principle, and therefore conscientious Catholics cannot send their children to them!

There is not as much moral culture in our Public Schools as Protestants could wish, or have endeavored to secure. Once the Bible was read every day at their opening, and an appropriate prayer offered up. The duties of the day began by a solemn and simple recogaition of God, our Heavenly Father. By the influence, the clamor, the agitation of the Romanists, led on by their priests, the Bible and the prayer were thrown out of the Schools. This stumbling block of Papists was removed in tenderness to their consciences. They said peace, harmony and union, would be established if that were done. Are they satisfied? Not at all. Now, the hue and cry is raised at the godlessness of the Schools. The important concession has not brought peace and harmony. Their exactions are increased.

We thought, and wrote it at the time, that concession would avail nothing; that the friends of general education, of religious and civil liberty, would have to make a stand somewhere, and they might as well make it on the Bible as later. But much was at stake, and a spirit of large compromise yielded the point. Two years hardly have passed away, and now the dilemma is offered us either of Catholic Endowment, or annihilation of the Public Schools.

If the Public Schools are godless, who is to blame for it? Those who tried hard to hold the Bible in its place, on the School-desk, did at last let it go with pain. But they thought it better for the State and society to concede much, rather than the rising generations should grow up to the responsibilities of citizenship in ignorance. They reasoned, and rightly in this case, that the great instruments of religious instruction were the parent and pastor; and that while the children were learning to read and write, and the various branches of useful knowledge in the school-room, the home circle, and the Church, were left to them for doctrinal teachings. This was all that was asked by the Romanists, two years ago, when the Public Schools were adjusted to their demands and their scruples. Let the reader turn to the daily papers of that time, and refresh his mind, and see how promises have been kept, and what is to be made by giving way to their encroachments. In the True Delta, of 3d November, 1850, "Father Mullon, of St. Patrick's," laid the whole Catholic grievance before the public, and the remedy sought for. Hear him:

"Frequent interrogatories have recently been put to us in relation to the reading of the Bible, and the practice of opening the exercises by prayer in our Public Schools. For the information of all Catholics, as well as our dissenting brethren, we answer that our faith teaches us to reject the practice in toto. We have frequently admonished our parishioners, in the discharge of our pastoral duties, of this anti-Catholic system, deferring the public expression of our disapprobation, under the hope that a spirit of liberality, commensurate with the inviolability of conscience guarantied by the Federal Constitution, would ere long remove all cause of complaint. So long as the practice is continued it must be a prolific source of dissention, and the evidence of a spirit of intoleranes on the part of the School Directors. Peace, harmony and union, would at once be established by the exclusion of these quasi religious exercises, and our Public Schools would become the seminaries to science and learning to the rising generation, and a source of blessings to the community."

We underscore the last sentence. Will it not bear this emphasis in view of the present agitation? In a subsequent paragraph he says:—

"What we ask for ourselves, the rights of conscisnce, we cheerfully concede to the entire human family. We contribute to the the maintenance and support of our Public Schools by a proportionate quota of the taxes for that purpose; let our children, then, go into the Schools unrebuked by a show of religion, antagonistic to their faith, and let the pastors of religion, according to the choice or wish of the parents and guardians of the children, impart such instruction as will meet their approbation."

It was all granted. Protestant votes were given in favor of removing what seemed to be the only and lamented difficulty in the way of a large portion of the population partaking of the instruction provided at the public cost for the public good. Now, on the 24th March, 1853, a memorial is presented, signed by 2500 Romanists of New Orleans, and their priests, representing:

"That although the Catholics of Louisiana are very large contributers to the Public School Fund, yet under the system which has been adopted for its dispensation, they have not been, nor can they ever be, conscientiously participants therein."

What is the difficulty? It is useless to ask. For if one were presented and met by the most ample accommodation, others would be presented. The history of this system of opposition and agitation is the same North and South, East and West. The same spirit actuates, and the same hand directs. The New York Journal of Commerce, in an article headed POPERY VS. COMMON SCHOOLS, makes the following well-timed and vigorous remarks:

"Twenty years ago the Common Schools of this city were under the charge of an association of benevolent men denominated, 'The Public School Society.' The Bible was read in all the Schools, and in other respects a moral and religious influence was exerted upon the pupils. Care, however, was taken that no sectarian influence should be exerted, and the vigilance of different denominations of Christians insured the faithful observance of this rule. In process of time immigration increased, more especially from Ireland, and the Catholic (viz: Romish) population became numerous. Then the cry was raised by the priests that the Schools were sectarian,—not because any sectarian doctrine was taught in them, but because the Bible was read to or by the pupils. As it would not sound well to say that the Bible is inconsistent with the Catholic (viz: Romish) religion, the plea was that a Protestant version of it was used. Well, to remove this objection the Protestants consented, though with great reluctance, that the Bible, and all direct religious teaching, should be withdrawn from the Schools. They further consented that the text-books used in the Schools should be submitted to the inspection of leading Catholics, (viz: Romanists,) and that any offensive phrases which might be discovered, should be thrown out. And as if all this were not enough, a system of Ward Schools was established entirely exempt from the control of the Public School Society, and placed under the direction of persons chosen by the people of the Ward, subject to such general regulations adopted by the Board of Education, as might be necessary to exclude sectarianism. Within the last year or two all the Common Schools in the city have become Ward Schools, and the Public School Society has been disbanded. These successive modifications of one of the best systems of Common School Education that ever existed were deemed a less evil, on the whole, than the growing up of a large body of children in ignorance and degradation.

"Did it have the desired effect? Did it bring in the Catholic (viz: Romish) children? To some extent it did. But now a new cry is raised, by the same parties who raised the first, viz: that the Schools are 'Atheistical.' The meaning is, we suppose, that religion is not taught there; the Bible is not read there; prayer is not offered there. And why not? Because the Catholics (viz: Romanists) demanded these things should be excluded. The very changes made in compliance with their demands, form the subject of a new complaint more grievous than the first."

Now, the question is: Are our Public Schools still to be tampered with at the instigation of Romish Priests? And how far is this pusillanimous compliance with their demands to be carried? Either of two things would do them: Setting off to them the portion of the School Fund they claim for maintaining their Free Schools—this is equivalent to an Endowment: or destroying the Public Schools. They would prefer the former. But a Legislature of Louisiana can hardly ever be so packed that a Catholic Endowment Bill will pass. War to the death will be waged against the Public Schools. That will be the policy. Let the friends of Public Education, the party of order, of freedom, look to it. This is to be the watchword: Down with the Public Schools. Our enemies will not weary. They can wait long. Firmness, and endurance, and vigilance, which is the price of liberty, will be requisite. Already opposition to Public Schools has been inaugurated formally. The Roman Catholic Council that met in Baltimore, about a year ago, was an important affair to this country. Its results will be felt and seen in many ways. It was "determined by that Council," says the Cincinnati Atlas, "to break up the Common Schools and arranged to bring the matter before the Catholic people." The doings of that Council were carried to Rome by a special messenger, and laid at the feet of the Pope for approbation. We judge he approved of none of them more heartily than this about the Public Schools. And so the matter is accordingly before the public, and with a simultaneousness and skill that argues pre-concert and deep design. The press, not only the religious but secular, with a quick American instinct, has taken ground and spoken out becomingly on this subject. There is need for it. And it is to be exceedingly regretted, a topic of much remark, that the press of Louisiana has not been equally prompt. That it is equally American we cannot doubt; or that when it does speak out it will hold no uncertain language.

With deference we suggest that it is high time to awake from this indifference and take position. Affairs may not be as secure as they are supposed to be. The intelligence of the people—their ready perception, and vigorous resistance to any imposition, may be calculated on for much. But sleepless Jesuitical intrigue may be counted on for more.

A favorite way of breaking down Public Schools will be to bring them into contempt and odium. The Catholic organs rake up and publish, with marked relish, every instance of disorder that occurs. Steadily pursuing this policy of detraction they will, by and by, get unguarded Protestants to join in with them. A fight between two boys, belonging to the Public Schools, or any juvenile delinquency, is a rich item for them. It is all due to the "godless Common Schools," and goes to prove them, in their favorite phrase, "nurseries of vice." Whatever of this sort takes place there is known. But we have no reliable means of getting at similar occurrences behind their high-fenced enclosures—therefore they never occur!

But the friends of the Free Schools may not only prepare themselves for agitation, for misrepresentation, and exaggerated abuse—they may prepare to be worked against. Every effort will be made to cripple their operation. Incompetent officers, insufficient appropriations, official neglect, misrule and extravagance—these will be attempted as the means of destruction. An unscrupulous opposition is not shut up to any forms. Let those who prefer light to darkness, public intelligence to that ignorance which is the mother of devotion, the people's rule to the Pope's rule, do their duty and it shall be well with us. Pray to God, and keep a strict watch on false friends, double-faced men, and truckling politicians.

THE BATTLE GROUND.

In company with a few friends we enjoyed a trip to the plains of Chalmette, one pleasant day last week. The Battle Ground lies about six miles below the city. It was difficult to realize that the sanguined field of the 8th January, 1815, was the field before us, covered with a rich carpet of white clover, and reposing in the balmy quiet of a Spring day. The busy actors have passed away. The horse and his rider have fallen into a deep sleep. On the spot where one of the severest shocks of the battle took place a flock of sheep were sunning themselves, and the lambs gamboling about!

Ourself excepted, the company were all Tennesseans, either by birth or adoption, and like Tennesseans, were half-way of opinion that had Packenham only known Jackson was from Tennessee, he would have given it up before he did! Each was musing on the scene, and searching for relics. We overheard one, in a soliloquising way, humming:

"Next they came to New Orleans,
They thought our folks would vanish;
But Jackson kil-led half their men,
And made the rest walk Spanish."

But this ditty of boyhood memory was interrupted by "Eureka," and a bullet was picked up looking as though the neck of it might have been trimmed off with the jack-knife of a "hunter of Kentucky."

No mound, nor monument, marks the notable points of Chalmette. They are only designated by the veterans, now alive, who will soon be gone.

The ditches of the main lines of defence are not yet filled up. Waterloo has its hills and vallies, but Chalmette is a level plain, with no geographical features; and unless artificially designated, will soon be a dead blank.

REV. BENJAMIN JENKINS.

CHARLESTON, April, 1853.

Our excellent brother, the Rev. Benjamin Jenkins, is now with us in Charleston. He returned to the United States for the restoration of his wife's health; but it pleased an inscrutable Providence to take her to himself during the voyage. Brother Jenkins and his six children, with a Chinese woman for a nurse, and also a Chinese man, arrived safe in the United States, where they will remain during the remainder of the present year.

Accompanied by Nee-kway, his Chinese-man, Brother Jenkins proposes to travel as extensively as possible, visiting the Churches, exhibiting his goddery, as we are tempted to call his extensive collection of poosah, or idol-gods, and other curiosities, of which he has perhaps a larger variety than was ever before seen in this country.

His accounts of China are exceedingly interesting; and we doubt not his lectures will very materially promote the interests of his mission. We commend him to the kind regards of all our brethren whose fields of labor he may enter. Having consulted with Bishop Andrew, he has concluded to occupy the first month as follows:

THOMAS O. SUMMERS.

Antiquarian Researches and the Bible.

The New York Commercial Advertiser, speaking of Layard's new work, entitled "Discoveries among the Ruins of Nineveh and Babylon," just re-published by Putnam, says:

"Mr. Layard's volume abounds with corroborations of the historical portions of the Old Testament. Mound after mound, palace after palace, and even tombs and hidden vaults testify to the minute truthfulness of that inspired volume. Hosts of witnesses are disentombed from the hoary and almost forgotten past, and by the grandeur and majesty of their testimony, expose the shallowness and ignorance of scoffers of the present. It would be an interesting task to gather into one volume all these corroborations."

Famous John Seldon.

Famous John Selden, the great lay Theologian, had a rare collection of good books which he intended to bequeath to Oxford; but having been denied the use of certain manuscripts in the Bodleain, he left his library to one of the London Inns of Court, or Law Schools, on condition they would furnish a convenient place to hold it, in default of which his executors (among whom was Sir Matthew Hale) had power to dispose of it. The failure of the lawyers to comply with the condition, gave the library to Oxford after all, and it may still be seen, or might be forty years ago, in a wing or recess of the Bodleian, called "Selden's End." It is a curious fact, related by a well-known writer, who assisted in arranging these books on their new shelves, that in several of the volumes, pairs of spectacles were found, left there from time to time, to keep the place, by Selden, who in each case, no doubt, gave them up for lost, and bought himself a new pair.

PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

PARIS, March 17, 1853.

The following account of the troubles of a Paris editor will probably be found very amusing to American readers. I can, however, assure them that here we are not at all disposed to laugh with them:

On the morrow of the day on which was posted the first number of the Archives du Methodisme, the editor was sent for in great haste by the publisher, and informed that there was something wrong about the paper, for it had been seized at the Postoffice. He hastened at once to the Postmaster, and was there told that the paper could not be posted, because it was not stamped. "Not stamped? It is not a political paper, but a scientific and religious one, and the law does not require such papers to be stamped!" "True, Sir, but you have mentioned politics in your periodical!" "I was not aware of having done so; could you show me where?" "The Postmaster then took up the Archives that lay on the table before him, and after a little search, he showed to the astonished editor the following expressions (for they were not even whole sentences,) which did not contain, he said, any scientific or religous statement, but were an opinion passed upon Government agents: "The threatening supervision of the police." "The poor man was condemned by the tribunal of police. Of course, he appealed against this decision." "The intolerant spirit of Popery has persecuted the various Evangelical Churches." "But," exclaimed the editor, "there is surely nothing about the Government in the last sentence." "Yes, there is, indirectly at least, for you well know that if Popery persecutes, it is by means of the Government agents; it is not the Priests who shut up the Protestant Churches, but the gendarmes, whether the Priests are the cause of it or not." For not stamping a periodical having so much of a political tendency as to contain the three preceding sentences, the editor was at last informed that he was liable to a fine of $12 for every copy sent to post, which in this case amounted to $2000. "However," said the Postmaster, "as we see evidently that you did it through ignorance, and without any intention of defrauding the revenue, if you will petition the Minister of Finance about it, he will certainly let you off this time." Henceforth, of course, the Archives will be stamped, and the editor means to make good use of the privilege he thus pays for, of speaking out his mind about the Papists and the authorities.

Whilst Popery is certainly gaining in outward power and show, it is evidently losing its moral influence and all self-respect. The newspaper writers do not agree; the Bishops and Archbishops anathematize each other with such a volubility of language that one would almost think they had spent a considerable time in learning the choicest epithets made use of in the market of the Halles. One of the apples of discord has been the Madiai affair, about which the Romish organs cannot agree. First, the Universe declared, according to the judgment itself, that the Madiai had been condemned simply for reading the Bible and endeavoring to convert Roman Catholics to their faith, and this condemnation was of course highly approved of by the ultramontane paper, as being the surest and quickest way of putting down heresy. Then the Voice of Truth (what a name!) has just published a long article, entitled—"The Truth (!!) about the Martyrdom of the Madiai." In this article it asserts, on the declaration of Dr. Cahill, an English Jesuit, that the Madiai were condemned, not for reading the Bible, but for having refused to open the place of their illegal meetings, after having been warned ten times (!); for having distributed at least 11,000 copies of the Bible, each of which contained more than 1600 falsifications of the original; for having bribed young Florentines to their meetings; for having entertained colporteurs, who distributed the Bible in the country; for having employed two street organ players* in distributing obscene images of the Virgin; for having caused priests to be made ridiculizing the souls in purgatory, transubstantiation, the Pope, etc.

These calumnies, to which an able answer will soon be put to press, written by M. Colomb, the Swiss pastor in Florence, might, it seems, have satisfied the most hateful Romish writer, the most inveterate enemy of heresy. But no! there has been found another paper to go one step further. The Katholijke Nederlandsche Stemmen, a Dutch Catholic voice, has come forward to declare that all this affair is simply a Protestant romance, which nobody believes, not even Protestants! "But such an invention," says that paper, "is likely, they think, to do good to their cause. . . . However, all the gold of England, all the cries of Germany, all the laments of Holland, cannot raise the Madini to the rank of heroes of the faith; they are and remain a couple of ridiculous persons."

I could not wonder at any thing now. May be a fourth paper will come and tell us that there never was such a man as the Grand Duke, nor such a people as the Tuscans, nor even perhaps such a country in existence as Europe.

But a far more serious cause of discord is the renewed quarrel between the ultramontane and the gallican parties. The violence of the Univers has caused a kind of reaction in favor of Gallican principles. The Bishop of Verviers began the opposition by accusing this periodical, in one of its charges, of "being the organ of a party which has, by its exaggerations and excesses, done much harm to the Church. They have sown the spirit of dispute. . . . Nothing equals the impropriety, the passion of their language. Nearly every where in their columns we find anger, irony, sarcasm, what provokes, wounds and irritates, with the evident intention of humiliating their adversaries, but seldom have we perceived in them the desire of bringing them back to the truth." Then the the Archbishop of Paris has also published a charge, in which he accuses the Univers of "calumny," of "revolt against the Bishops," of "ignoring the laws of simple politeness," of "doing an abominable and satanic work." He concludes by forbidding the clergy in his diocese to be contributors to the paper, or even to read it.

On the other hand, the Bishops of Chalons and Avignon have taken, publicly, the part of this "abominable and satanic work," and the Bishop of Moulins has published a circular so favorable to it, that the incensed Archbishop of Paris has referred this circular to the Pope, asking for justice.

In the meanwhile, Louis Veuillot, the principal editor of the Univers, is gone to Rome, and the latest news is, that he has appealed to the Pope against the sentence of the Archbishop. Poor Pope! Leaving the Bible aside, as he does, I suppose he must feel rather embarrassed about giving a decision. Notwithstanding his infallibility, he no doubt is ready to exclaim—

"Who shall decide, when doctors disagree?"

The Wesleyan Missionary Notices, for February, have given the painful account of a civil war, which broke out last year in the Friendly Islands, and interrupted for some time the peaceful labors of our Missionaries. King George, it appears, displayed a nobility of conduct which convinced even his enemies of the truth and superiority of Christian principles. He especially acted with great leniency towards two Romish Priests, who furnished arms to the rebels, and encouraged them to the last to resist the proposals of their lawful sovereign. The Commandant of the "Henri," a French vessel from Tahiti, having come over to enquire into the cause of the war, and the treatment of the Priests, declared himself fully satisfied with the explanations he received, and announced that he should leave the place in two days. At last, the war was terminated, on the arrival of an English man of war, which cut off the hopes of the rebels, for they were only sustained in their rebellion by the expectation of a French man of war coming to assist them, according to the promises of the Priests. Such are the plain facts of the case. Well, the Gazette de Lyon, a paper devoted to the Jesuits, has had the impudence to mention this rebellion as a religious war, caused by the hatred of the English Missionaries to the Romish Papists—as a war in which "Protestant butchers have fallen on poor Catholic sheep, pillaging and burning every thing, under the eyes of an English man of war." The article is ended as follows: "Traitors, cowards, intolerant, hypocrites, spoilers and persecutors; such are the English as a nation, under every pole, at all times, upon all seas!"

A most mysterious affair took place this winter in Paris, but as I did not possess all the necessary details, I refrained from mentioning it. As it is now published and going the rounds of the papers, I may as well state the following facts: In consequence of a conversation which the Superior of a convent of nuns, of the order of St. Vincent de Paul, had with a converted woman, formerly a Papist, she was led to read the Bible, and found in it free salvation through faith in Christ. Circumstances which it would be too long to relate, caused first one, and then six of the nuns to follow her example. They were brought also to the knowledge of the truth, and when evil was spoken of the Protestants by the Inspectress they took their part, and confessed their faith with much firmness. They were at once thrown into damp, unhealthy dungeons. Since that time (about six months ago) one of the eight Sisters has died, four have been sent to more than 300 miles distance, and have been unheard of for the last four months; two still remain in the convent. As to the Superior, who expected to be free after the 29th of October, as her vows expired on that day, she was thrown into prison, after a violent scene, in which her Bible and tracts were burnt. Since then nothing has been heard of her, and all the enquiries that have been made are fruitless. The police and the Imperial Attorney General have been requested to call the convent to account for this disappearance, but they reply that judicial proceedings cannot be commenced but in the name of a relative declaring himself prosecutor. We are therefore endeavoring to discover, if possible, some relative to the Superior, and I learnt last week that a clue has just been found to one, so that we have hopes of clearing up this strange affair.

No political news of any importance in France. Some papers are in great haste to announce that the Emperor is likely to have soon an heir to the throne. New cases of Popish intolerance have just come to light. As yet, the Methodists are, thank God, quite free, and revivals have visited three of our circuits.

*In order to show what degree of reliance may be placed on all these assertions, it will be sufficient to say, that no organ players are allowed to perambulate the streets of Florence.

CALIFORNIA CORRESPONDENCE.

Preaching to Gold Diggers.

JACKSON, Calaveras Co., February 22, 1853.

Brother McTyeire: Having spent a few weeks on the Bodago Circuit, right on the shore of the Pacific, just at the jumping off place, from which I have written my last letter, and since then appointed to this part of the mines, permit me a few items and reflections:

I arrived on this work "prospecting," as the miners say, at the commencement of the rainy season, which has been the most severe known to white men in the annals of California. In consequence of the general failure of the mines—they having been well nigh worked out—the enormous cost of the common necessaries of life, on account of the cutting off of supplies by the rains—very few miners are making more than their board—perhaps not one in fifty. Not one in a hundred can save any thing worth naming as far as my observation can discern. There are many distressed families now in this State—principally among last year's immigration. There are more men begging their way among us at present, during the rainy season, than I have seen during eleven years in the State of Alabama. These things I have seen; and tavern-keepers complain daily of men running off indebted for board to the utmost amount that their credit would bear. The morals of the miners, though bad, are much better than those of the merchants, speculators and gamblers, but they are all alike (with little exception) ungodly, and sitting in the seat of the scornful, having no god but Mammon, and desiring no grace but gold dust.

Sunday is the day for general trade and frolic. Hence the impossibility of getting good congregations, and the distressing improbability of doing much good among them. It has been written, "How can they hear without a preacher?" It may be properly inquired, what is the use in preaching if they come not to hear? A certain Judge Carter truthfully remarked to me the other day, "If John Wesley, with all his piety and eloquence, were to come and preach to these people, he could not arrest the attention of the people so as to get a congregation." I almost ready to conclude that in casting pearls before swine to continue preaching to the generality of the people in this mining country—especially at so much expense to the Church and privation to missionaries. The migratory habits of the miners, running after every rumor of gold discovery, is one great cause of this. There is no reason to think it will ever be different, inasmuch as people came here to seek money at any sacrifice of soul and principle. It is quite different in the agricultural communities: society has taken a form, and morals (with little exception) will compare well with older countries—there religion will "take root downward and grow upward" in our county, (Calaverns) however, there is no security for life or property. The Spaniards are slaying and robbing, and are being shot and hung as fast as the suspicions are made with. The celebrated Joakin, a guerilla leader and outlaw, having on Sunday week in open day-light, murdered and robbed two Celestials, with an American, about two miles from where I write, has so aroused the people to a sense of danger, that numbers mounted and foot volunteers are industriously scouring the county in quest of him. Several of his party have been dealt with in a summary manner, as is the custom of the officers of Judge Lynch, who are acting under these circumstances. Tuesday night last Rev. A. Graham, and myself, went to Jackson, he being minded to preach the Gospel to these people also. Much excitement prevailed in town owing to the trial and execution of one of these wretches whom they put hanging on a tree, opposite the preaching place, during the space of about three hours. What think you were my thoughts and feelings while standing in the door, ringing the bell to invite a congregation, and looking at one suspended by the neck, with averted head, seemingly frowned upon by the pale moon, in the stillness of the night, because of his transgression of the law of the land, which hundreds of millions of our race are spared, though they have transgressed the righteous laws of the eternal God. Scores were gathered round and exulting over his end, while few were induced to come and hear the Word. Oh! how they forget that a general execution of criminals will take place at the command of the "Judge of all the earth." How little, alas! do impenitent men consider that each of them will be a criminal, and executed "in that day," and that the pangs of that execution will be felt with keen distress to all eternity! But enough of this.

The robbers, though hunted unweariedly, commit fresh depredations every day, even on the roads traveled over and again by the scouting parties. Women have been murdered among the robbers committing these crimes, but these may be "wolves in sheep's clothing." The Chinese have made up a fund to defray the expenses of this expedition against the Spaniards, and rumor states they have ten thousand dollars to expend on it. The State has offered $1500 reward for the leader. Under the present circumstances the missionary must literally take his life in his hand in order to proclaim his message.

A few nights since, while inviting a congregation, which we must always do if we have any, I stood over the gambling hells where cards were changing quickly, looking into the face of a fine looking gambler, and said: "Boys you must put by the game and come to meeting," upon which all hands laughed, and one managed to bring forth an oath, declaring, "That was bold." I think they were the first at meeting.

Yours, D. B. LEE

A Poor "Crater."

"Long time ago," in New England, dwelt a lady equally renowned for piety and [illegible] age. As she was in the habit of returning from meeting unattended some wild fellow formed a project for frightening her, and furnishing themselves with a little pleasing amusement. One of them arrayed, [illegible] with a pair of horns, and armed with a pitch-fork, placed himself behind a tree, and awaited her coming. His companions were concealed near by to watch the mischief and participate in the fun. At last came the unsuspecting victim leisurely along, meditating no doubt, on the discourse to which she had been listening. Out sprang his majesty pro tempore, and confronted her.

"Why! who be you?" she exclaimed.

"I'm the Devil!" exclaimed the rogue in a hollow voice.

"Well," said she, in a pitying tone, "you are a poor crater!" and quietly went her way.

We call that true courage, or perhaps more properly, true faith. With a conscience void of offence, she knew that she had nothing to fear.

"Truth, virtue, and happiness, may be distinguished from each other, but cannot be divided." [Colsridge.

A STRIKING FIGURE.—Dr. Holmes, of Boston, lately delivered a lecture wherein the genius and characteristics of Byron and Moore were discussed. Holmes is himself a poet of no ordinary genius. The following figure of Byron strikes us as new, and eminently appropriate:

Fiery and voluptuous, and of a tropical nature, he was born out of place in foggy England. The northern world let thought she was incubating a common egg; but when her haunting eclipsed the shell, how much her fancies have risen with astonishment and horror, to behold under it the scarlet plumage of the wild flamingo!

THE POOR IN CHINA.—The Earl of Shaftsbury states an instructive fact of those thirty-three thousand women earning hardly nine cents a day, by fourteen hours labor in London. His lordship offered two hundred and fifty odd of them, a dollar and a half a week, besides lodging, in the north of England—but his formal offer was not accepted. London, with all its privations, was more agreeable than two or three times the wages in a manufacturing country place. A similar thing is true of much of the suffering nearer home.

THE BRITISH BRIBERY CASES.—The last accounts from London inform us that so far eight liberal and seven conservative members of the House of Commons have been unseated for bribery at the elections.

OBITUARY:

DIED—in this city on Sunday morning, April 10, 1853, aged forty-one years, Mrs. MARGARETTA E. HILL, wife of H. R. W. Hill. She died in peace. Death had no sting, the grave no victory, in this case. The purity of character, the heart-kindness, and the benevolence of the deceased, have left an enduring impress on all who knew her.

Twenty-five years ago she was converted, and joined the Methodist Church, in Nashville, Tennessee, under the ministry of Rev. James Gwinn. Long and painful sickness severely tested the meekness and patience of the sufferer; but she bore all as a Christian, and finally escaped by the door that opens upon the realms of eternal life.

DIED—On the 20th December, 1852, Mr. WILLIAM CADE, at the residence of his son, Adolphus S. Cade, in Dayton, Alabama. It may be truly said that he died of old age, having reached his ninetieth year. While his grey hairs and withered form evinced the marks which the flight of many years had left upon him, his spirit and conversation exhibited a ripeness in Christian experience, which gave evidence of his preparedness for a home in that land where grey hairs and old age are unknown. Full of faith, and of the Holy Ghost, he was waiting the summons to his better home in Heaven. He complained of no pain,—but gradually grew more and more feeble, until he sweetly fell asleep in Jesus. Father Cade had been a member of the M. E. Church for fifty years. His discipline is one of those published by Thomas Coke and Francis Asbury, in 1798, and has his name written in it in 1807. His Testament is marked and thumbed from beginning to end, and many passages particularly noted. He said that he had read it through three hundred times.

Of his early history I know but little. In the latter part of his life he seemed almost wholly given up to Bible reading and religious conversation. While he showed an aversion to conversation on ordinary topics, he would spend hours in speaking of spiritual things. During the last days of his life he was often heard to say, "Come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly." His last words were, "Jesus is the same bright star to me now that He has ever been."

JOSHUA T. HEANN.

DIED—In Columbus, Mississippi, February 21, 1853, Mrs. CATHERINE McMICHAEL, consort of Doctor McMichael, aged twenty-four years.

Mrs. McMichael had been a member of the M. E. Church about seven years. Some months previous to her death she was attacked with the disease of which she finally died. She suffered great bodily pain, and endured a severe spiritual conflict. Visiting her I found her in great spiritual darkness—suffering much from doubt and discouragement—well nigh to despair. I frequently offered the promises of the gospel, with prayer, for her deliverance, but the darkness appeared to increase. After great perplexity as to the course to pursue, it occurred to me that the LXXVIIth Psalm was appropriate to her condition, and that God might speak to her troubled soul through His own Word. I read it carefully and deliberately, without comment: never did I see so forcible an exemplification of the quickening power of the Word of God. Her anxiety and distress gave way to tears and smiles of comfort, and she was enabled to say:

"Tears of joy mine eyes o'erflow
That I have a hope of heaven."

CHARITY HOSPITAL.—The weekly report of this institution is as follows: Admissions, 200; Discharges, 91; Deaths, 29; Remaining, 783.

FUNERAL OF MRS. FILLMORE.—The last sad duties to the remains of the lamented Mrs. Fillmore were suitably performed on Saturday afternoon. There was a very large attendance of citizens, all of whom manifested the deepest sympathy with the late President in his great bereavement. An exchange feelingly and beautifully remarks that the brilliant and successful public career of Mr. Fillmore in the offices of Chief Magistrate of the Republic, has been overshadowed at his close by the most touching of domestic calamities. His civic honors have been severely tested by a visitation that has desolated his fireside, and rent away the crown and ornament of his home. Offers of sympathy, and words of condolence, though appropriate on such occasions, may be in vain expected to heal the wounds of the bosom which have been caused by this domestic bereavement. The sufferer will undoubtedly take his misfortune like a man, but we are sure he feels it as a man. Can we fail to remark, though we do so in superstitious frame of mind, that the arrows of death have been aimed at the White House with a persistency almost indicative of a fatality connected with those who dwell there. General Jackson's wife, General Harrison, Mr Tyler's wife, and General Taylor, were all summoned to the tomb while inmates of the Presidential mansion. President Polk survived his residence there but a short time. Mrs. Fillmore still shorter. The present incumbent even while the great voice of the nation, calling him to the exalted post, had hardly died away upon his ear was struck with the heart-rending domestic tragedy, which prostrated his dearest hopes, and carried mourning to every heart in the nation. These occurrences, surely, are not our views of what are esteemed the brilliant and alluring objects of human ambition, and touch no real rest and honors, and exalted position among men, cause pain as a dispensation from that inexorable law of the universe which balances the good and evil of this life with a stern and rigid impartiality. SWITZERLAND'S TRIBUTE TO THE WASHINGTON NATIONAL MONUMENT.—Washington, April 5.—The beautiful block of stone contributed by Switzerland, inscribed "To the memory of Washington—the Free Swiss Confederation—Monument Association, with appropriate ceremonies, by J. Hume, Esq., Swiss Consul at Alexandria, accompanied by a neat and appropriate address. It was received by Mayor Lenox, for the Monument Association, who responded in an eloquent manner.

It was then conveyed to Monument Place, drawn by four horses, and escorted by the German Yeagers, accompanied by a Marine band, making quite an imposing display—a large number of citizens joining in the procession to the Executive Mansion, General Henderson having the President of its approach, when he repaired to the window to view it. As it passed, the President removed his hat, and bowed to the multitude. The Washington Monument would not be complete without a stone from Switzerland."

The Mobile firemen celebrated their fifteenth anniversary on Saturday last. The turnout was large and imposing. Mobile can boast of a well organized and faithful fire department.

MAYOR'S MESSAGE.

MAYORALTY OF NEW ORLEANS, April 11, 1853.

To the Honorable Presidents and Members of the Board of Aldermen and Board of Assistant Aldermen of the City of New Orleans:

GENTLEMEN—By virtue of the 6th section of the Act "To consolidate the city of New Orleans and provide for the government and administration of its affairs," approved February 23, 1852, the newly elected members of the Common Council enter this day upon the discharge of their duties, and I deem, therefore, the occasion an appropriate one to communicate briefly with your honorable body in reference to the various topics connected with the administration and welfare of the city.

One year has now elapsed since the several Municipalities and the late city of Lafayette were incorporated, by legislative enactment and at the instance of the openly expressed wishes of a large portion of the community, into one city. Whatever may have been the partial differences of opinion that prevailed in connection with the adoption of this important measure, and however severely it may have jarred for the moment on the sectional prejudices of many good and well meaning citizens, the fact will hardly be disputed, now that consolidation as a whole has proved eminently beneficial, not only in uniting the inhabitants of this great metropolis in a common bond, but in developing our resources, restoring our credit, and enabling us to move with undivided energy in the prosecution of those great works of public improvement so intimately associated with our future greatness and prosperity.

In this latter respect consolidation has indeed proved a great blessing. Under the former division of the city, it was impossible almost to bring about that concert of action so essential to the undertaking of a great and costly enterprise. But with the unity of interests in which all of us became embarked on the completion of that measure, these difficulties at once disappeared, and in less than two months after the new charter had gone into practical operation, the Common Council, in compliance with the well understood wishes of the people, submitted to the vote of the tax-payers an ordinance providing for the subscription by the city to the stock of the New Orleans, Jackson and great Northern Railroad Company, and the Opelousas, Opelousas and great Western Railroad Companies. The ordinance, after a spirited canvass, was carried by a majority of 1,500 votes, and the first section to the State line will shortly be in a condition for the laying of track, so that by next spring it may be anticipated that the road will be completed to that point. Penetrating, as it does in part, a dense and difficult swamp, the progress of the work is thus far comparatively slow, but when the highlands beyond Pass Manchac shall have been reached, the grading and bridging will of course be accomplished with much greater speed and facility.

So far as the Opelousas Railroad is concerned, I am happy to state that the prospect for the early completion of this important chain of communication is most excellent. From the fact of its being essentially a State road, transversing, as it is contemplated to do, some of the richest portions of Louisiana, this important enterprise has taken a strong hold on the pride and affections of the community. The company are now proceeding rapidly with their labors and already fifty-four miles of the road, from here to the Lafourche, are ready for receiving the rails, so that by the month of September or October next, it is quite probable that a communication will have been effected with that point. And when the next anniversary of our National Independence shall dawn on us, I have reason to hope that a ride of some twenty to twenty-five miles on the Opelousas road will form one of the incidents of that glorious day. It is expected, moreover, that in the course of next winter, the road will be completed to the important station of Berwick's Bay; and in a few weeks the grading of the remaining portion of the road to Washington will have been put out under contract.

It should not be overlooked in connection with this road, that its development would ultimately secure to be to link us with our far-off possessions on the Pacific; and the prospect of its early completion suggests the inquiry whether any other point of departure could be selected that would offer greater natural advantages for the construction of this gigantic undertaking. At the last session of Congress an appropriation was made for the preliminary survey of a route to the Pacific, and as at the next meeting of the National Assembly the question will come up in all its magnitude, I trust that no opportunity will be lost on the part of every citizen, as well as of the Common Council to press upon Congress the superior claim of New Orleans as the starting point for the great iron causeway to the Pacific.

The adoption of a large and comprehensive system of internal improvements, although as yet only in its infancy, has been followed by a material advance in the value of landed property in this city. I am not in possession of any tangible evidence, unless in partial instances, to show the percentage of this increase as a whole, inasmuch as the assessment rolls, which form the only legitimate comparison, will not be made up until a later period of the year. But I have no hesitation in saying that if the assessment be faithfully and correctly made, of which I am not permitted to entertain a doubt, it will show an augmentation in the value of real estate of from five to seven millions of dollars at least, over the declared value of last year. The remark has been made, that this rise has been confined to certain localities, and it is quite true that the increase is decidedly more apparent in some portions than in others; but the evidence is not wanting to prove that the advance is now becoming general, and that with the completion of our railroads, every part of the city will be greatly benefitted.

If I have dwelt at some length on the prospects of these two prominent undertakings, it has been owing as much to what I conceived to be a duty on my part towards the city as the principal stockholder in both roads, as also to a desire to enlist in behalf of these great enterprises the continued good will and support of my fellow-citizens. I will not impose either on the time or on the patience of the Common Council by attempting to enlarge on the brilliant results that are destined to flow from the completion of these roads as in more than one instance I have taken occasion to refer to the subject at length, by endeavoring to arouse the citizens to the necessity of engaging in the great struggle for the maintenance and supremacy of our commerce; and in retiring as I shortly contemplate, from the proud position to which, by the partiality of the people, I have been so repeatedly elevated, I shall carry with me the conviction that I have sought, to the best of my humble abilities, to promote that system of improvements which I consider to be so intimately interwoven with the future prosperity of New Orleans.

Not long since, I had the honor to submit to your predecessors a plan for the draining of all that portion of the city comprised between the river, the New Canal, the Pontchartrain Railroad and the Lake, and I now recur to the subject in the hope that your honorable body may find it compatible with the public interest to cause this great work of improvement to be undertaken. It can not have escaped your attention, and I have frequently referred to it in former communications, that the opening of streets to the Metairie Ridge has been productive of the most happy results, not only in creating a cheap and proximate home for our rapidly increasing and industrious population, but what is more important still, in contributing to the improved sanitary condition of the city. The scourge which formerly afflicted us at biennial intervals, has ceased to exist for the last six years, and I devoutly trust that we may be forever spared from the visitation of that disease, which was incontestably one of the greatest drawbacks to our advancement and prosperity. And it behooves us, in the discharge of our duties to the people, to endeavor to place the city beyond the reach of those unpalatable influences which can be avoided by the proper exercise of the means within our control.

If, therefore, as I contend, that the opening of streets to the Ridge has resulted in such beneficial consequences, what may we not expect from the draining of the entire swamp in the rear of the city, in connection with the cutting down of the woods and the erection of a substantial embankment on the shores of Lake Pontchartrain as a protection from inundation, the whole of which I had the honor to recommend recently to the consideration of your predecessors? I do not wish to repeat the argument I have so often advanced, that the city extending as it does in a narrow belt over a length of seven miles out upwards, should have some body and stamina to rest upon. It can not always trail along in one direction, without continually disturbing the centre of business, and thus inflicting an irreparable injury on remoter sections of the city. The fact, indeed, would seem to be so conclusive as to require no demonstration, and I trust that it may be reserved for the present Common Council to carry out a project which I consider secondary only in importance to the railroad system, and of which I profess to be equally as warm an advocate.

The present is moreover a propitious time for the execution of the work. It is confidently anticipated—and the experience of other cities affords conclusive evidence that we shall not be disappointed in our expectations—that the completion of the railroads now in progress will be followed by a large increase in our population. The necessity therefore is imposed on us of providing for this welcome inroad, and above all of affording manufacturers, mechanics and laborers, whose thrifty industry contributes so essentially to the welfare of a community, an incentive to settle amongst us, by holding out to them the inducement of securing for their families a cheap and comfortable home.

I would recommend to the Common Council to have this important matter referred to a special committee, with the view of eliciting all the requisite information bearing on the subject, as connected with the cost, and the eventual saving which I believe will result from the adoption of the system.

In former communications, which I have had the honor to address to the Common Council, and to the general and Municipal Councils under the previous division of the city, I have felt it my duty to animadvert in strong terms on the inadequate supply of water furnished by the Commercial Water Works Department. The complaints were made in no captious spirit, but from the conviction of the absolute necessity of a never failing supply of this precious element both as a means of comfort and health, as also for the protection of our property from fire. It now affords me much pleasure to state that the Department, responding to the wants of the community, has made provision for a largely increased supply of water during the coming year. They have commenced taking up the eight inch pipe in Bourbon street, from Canal to Esplanade street, and are replacing the same by a sixteen inch main, which I am inclined to believe will afford a good supply to the inhabitants of the Second and Third Districts. In addition to this a connection has been made on Richard street, from the main feeder with the large distributing pipe, by means of which the water can be pumped directly on the city, which is a great improvement, inasmuch as in case of any accident to the Reservoirs a sufficient supply can be kept up by the engine alone. It is estimated that the additional supply to the Second and Third Districts, furnished by these changes, is about half a million of gallons per day—a very large augmentation—and which speaks favorably for the disposition of the Company to afford every relief to the citizens.

Complaint has been made by the Department of the extravagant uses of water made by the contractors for cleaning the streets of the First District during the summer months, thus depriving the other Districts of their fair proportion. It has been suggested that instead of allowing the hydrants to run at full head, the use of hose would be quite as effectual, whilst at the same time it would prevent any unnecessary waste of water. Without being prepared to state how far this complaint may be well founded, I would advise that the Common Council institute an inquiry into the matter.

Whilst on this subject, I will mention that the ownership of 5000 shares of Commercial Bank Stock belonging to the City of New Orleans, is vested in the Coliseum Council, and that agreeably to the charter of that institution it will become necessary for you in joint session to elect two Directors from your honorable body to represent the interests of the City in that Corporation.

It is a source of infinite satisfaction to announce to your honorable body, the rapid progress made in the cause of public education during the past year. There are now in the city established at the public charge forty school houses with 10 855 pupils in attendance. Of these the First District possesses thirteen school houses, with 3 708 pupils in attendance. The Second District nine school houses, with 2 871 pupils. The Third District ten school houses, with 1 814 pupils; and the Fourth District eight school houses, with 2 462 pupils. Compared with last year, the First District exhibits an increase of 202 pupils or 5 9-10 per cent.; the Second District an increase of 1 305 pupils, or 15 15-16 per cent.; the Third District an increase of 575 pupils, or 46 7-10 per cent. and the Fourth District an increase of 922 pupils, or 61 1-4 per cent. The total number of pupils in the Public Schools on the 1st April last year, was 8,701, showing an increase now of no less than 2,084, equal to 23 9-10 per cent.

Of the thirteen school houses in the First District, seven are owned by the Corporation, and six are rented; in the Second District three are the property of the City, and six are rented; in the Third, the City owns four, and six are rented; in the Fourth, the Corporation is the owner of three, whilst five are rented, showing a total of seventeen school houses belonging to the City, and twenty-three rented.

The total number of teachers now employed in the Public Schools, is 211; of which 10 male and 47 female teachers in the First District; 18 male and 35 female teachers in the Second; 11 male and 40 female teachers in the Third; and 10 male and 31 female teachers in the Fourth District. The apparent disproportion of teachers employed in the Second and Third districts, as compared with the larger population in the schools of the First and Fourth, arises from the fact that the French and English languages are equally taught in every department of the schools of the two former Districts, and hence the necessity for an increased number of instructors.

The amount appropriated during the past year for the support of the Public Schools, was $188,020, and the estimate of expenditure on this account for the coming year is put down in the Budget at $200,000, a very moderate excess when compared with the increased number of scholars who are now receiving the benefits of a liberal and enlightened education. Large as the outlay unquestionably is for the maintenance of the Public Schools, yet there is no charge so cheerfully borne as that which has for its aim the intellectual cultivation and moral training of the rising generation, and in commending the cause of Public Education to your especial care, I feel satisfied that I am but echoing the sentiments of every member of this community.

The citizens of New Orleans have had no cause to regret the liberality so bestowed on the Fire Department during the past year. Owing to the dilapidated condition of several engine houses, rendering repairs and rebuilding in many instances absolutely necessary, and it being regularly also to substitute new machinery for that which had become old and worn out, the expenses of maintaining the Department has been large. But I am not aware that any unnecessary expenditure has been countenanced, and when the meritorious services of this disinterested and well behaved body of citizens are taken into consideration, the Common Council will, I am sure, not hesitate to extend to the Department all the succor and support commensurate with a proper and judicious administration of the public money. On several occasions recently the Firemen have been signally instrumental in saving large amounts of property from destruction, and in some instances, in particular their valuable services have been of a character to elicit the highest encomiums.

While on this subject, I deem it proper to call the attention of the Common Council to the dangerous and reprehensible manner in which the streets of the upper portion of the First District have been encumbered with cotton during the last three or four months. The large increase in the receipts of cotton at this port, coupled with the difficulty of clearing the same, in consequence of the scarcity of tonnage, led to the offer of a swelling the stock to an unprecedented extent, and in the absence of adequate warehouse room, the streets, and even public squares, were resorted to to supply the exigency. This setting at defiance all the city ordinances in regard to the obstruction of our thoroughfares. Apart from the manifest inconvenience of such a practice, when carried to the extent we have recently witnessed, the great danger in case of fire is too obvious to be overlooked, and indeed during the late almost general conflagration at the Alabama Press the imminent risk of allowing cotton to be piled up in the streets was a common topic of remark. A paramount necessity has forced us for the time being to acquiesce in this violation of law. There is no reason why steps should not be taken to obviate this anomalous practice in future. The wants of our annually growing commerce require enlarged warehouse accommodations; and it is to be hoped that some of our public spirited citizens will commence to make provision for the increased amount of produce that is now pouring in on Old Northerns. At all events, I believe it to be incumbent on the Common Council to direct their attention to this matter, and to frame such an ordinance as will prohibit after a certain date, the storage of cotton in the streets, under the penalty of a fine, due provision being made for the enforcement of the penalty.

Under the supervision of the present excellent Warden, the Work-house, during the past year, has been well and judiciously managed. There were 1116 prisoners in the establishment on the 12th April, 1852, and the number of persons committed during the year has been 3528. The institution now contains within its walls 253 prisoners of all denominations. So far as its financial operations are concerned they have proved satisfactory. The estimated value of articles manufactured and labor done for the different departments of the city during the past year is.....$22,250

$27,650

Estimated value of the stock on hand of materials, clothing, bedding, etc., purchased within the year..... 2,500

Fees due on slaves remaining in prison..... 800

Total..... $30,800

Per contra, the expenditure has been as follows:

Total amount of appropriations for materials	3,800
Total amount of appropriations for provisions	10,550
Clothing, blankets, bedding, etc	2,400
Pay roll of officers and employees, $748 33 per month	8,950

Thus showing a net revenue from the establishment of $5134; in addition to which it must be borne in mind that the value of labor is estimated at a lower figure than it could be procured elsewhere. The number of deaths during the year was 15, and there have been sent to the temporary Insane Asylum 31 whites and 2 blacks. I would remark that the buildings are in a dilapidated condition and will require considerable repairs during the coming summer.

I feel it my duty to repeat to your honorable body the recommendation which I addressed to your predecessors relative to the establishment of an Alms-house. In other large cities these institutions have been found to be the most efficient check against habits of lasiness and mendicity, which, if allowed to be indulged in without restraint, are too apt to degenerate into a course of vice and crime. The expense of establishing an Asylum of this description is the only objection, but as in other cities similar institutions, where they are well managed, not only support themselves but leave a profit, it is to be presumed that the erection of an Alms-house here would be followed by similar results. At all events, I trust that the Common Council will in due time take this subject under consideration.

In consequence of the inadequate provision at the State Insane Asylum at Jackson for the reception and accommodation of lunatic patients, the Common Council established a temporary Asylum for the destitute insane, which has been in operation since the month of September last. During that time the number of persons admitted was 134, of whom 75 have been discharged, 6 died, and 14 were sent to the Asylum at Jackson, leaving 39 persons now in the institution. For 25 of the number the requisite papers have been taken out in Court, entitling them to admission in the State Asylum as soon as room can be made for their accommodation. The expense to the city of this institution is about $250 per month, but I deem it proper to call your attention to the fact that the place is by no means adapted to the purpose for which it is used, and that the lunatics are deprived to a great extent of those comforts, the existence of which would contribute in a powerful degree to ensure a recovery from their dreadful malady, more especially in its incipient stages.

The operations of the House of Refuge during the past year show a very material increase. On the 1st April, 1852, there were only 41 inmates, consisting altogether of boys, whereas the institution numbers now 122 boys and 29 girls, making a total of 151, in addition to which 3 have been sent to the Charity Hospital for want of accommodation for the sick, and 6 boys are now out on trial for the purpose of being indentured to a trade. I am much pleased to state that the Commissioners of the House of Refuge have, during the past year, discharged their duties faithfully and zealously; and with the limited means at their disposal they have, with a due regard to the interests confided to them, accomplished a vast deal of good.

The attention of your predecessors having been directed to the miserable and insufficient accommodations for the inmates cooped up as they were in a narrow space, and deprived of the benefit of exercise and fresh air, a resolution was passed providing for the purchase from P. C. Wright of a fine tract of ground, with buildings, on the Bayou road. The transfer of the property has been completed, and I would now recommend to your honorable body to take the necessary steps for the speedy removal of the inmates to this eligible and salubrious spot. The expenses for the maintenance of this institution during the coming year is estimated at $500 per month.

I would respectfully suggest to your honorable body, the propriety and advantage of causing the so-called neutral ground, in Canal street, to be improved. For several years past I have taken the liberty of recommending some action in the premises, and I'll recur to the subject again, it is because a large number of the inhabitants in the street have petitioned for the improvement. In the present state of our finances, when the expenditure of every dollar should be closely scrutinized, I am far from desiring to urge any costly improvement on the Common Council, and am hence not prepared to acquiesce in the expensive alterations that have been suggested, and which would involve an outlay of $40,000 per annum over a period of four years. My ideas are far from that mark, and have reference simply to a handsome enclosure of the neutral ground, and its preservation from improper intrusion. Canal street is, by common consent, considered to be the centre of the city, whilst it is unquestionably, also, the broadest and most thoroughfare leading from the river. Hence I am of the opinion that it should be laid off and beautified at a moderate cost, in conformity with the frequently expressed wishes of a majority of the residents; and I hope the Common Council may so far agree with me in my suggestions as to take the subject under early advisement.

I am reluctant to cast unnecessary blame on the management of any department of the city government, but I should be wanting in candor were I not to state that the cleansing of the streets and gutters, for several months past, has been badly performed. Complaints on this subject are loud and well founded, and it has not been owing to any want of intimation on my part that this important duty has been neglected. Cleanliness, especially in a climate like ours, is a pre-requisite of health; and in due regard to the comfort and well-being of the people demands that the contracts for this service should be faithfully executed, and that a rigorous supervision should be constantly exercised by the officers to whom this branch of the city administration is particularly confident.

The money collected for Wharfage constitutes one of the most important items of the city revenue, and hence it will become the duty of the Common Council to make timely provision for such repairs as may be needed in the wharves. Generally speaking, I am glad to say that the wharves are in a good condition, and will require less outlay than in former years. The repairs of those in the Second District are under contract, which will not expire for upwards of two years, whereas in the other Districts the usual course has been to let out the work annually to the lowest bidder.

I feel it my duty to call the attention of the Common Council to the present mode of collecting the taxes on coffee-houses, merchants, peddlers, and other professions. Under the old Municipal system, officers were employed to collect these taxes at a stated commission, the double effect of which was to bring within the reach of the tax gatherer every person engaged in business, and to swell the revenue of the corporations from this source. The 35th section of the new charter provides that "all city taxes, except license dues, shall be payable only in the office of the City Treasurer," &c., and since consolidation was effected, this course has been pursued. The results, however, of this modern system has been far from satisfactory. On the one hand a large number of individuals have escaped taxation altogether, thus inflicting a great injustice on those who pay their taxes regularly whilst, on the other, the receipts from these sources show a very marked falling off, as compared with the revenue derived under the old system. The appointment of Collectors at a fixed commission was a direct incentive to these officers to discharge their duty, and hence they employed deputies to assist them, by which means every person transacting business was brought under assessment, and each Municipality became largely the gainer in consequence. It is highly desirable that recourse should be had to the same expedient, as otherwise the receipts anticipated from these various sources will continue to show a great shrinkage. The language, however, of the charter is specific, though I am inclined to believe that its framers intended that this clause should apply only to taxes on real estate and slaves. But be this as it may, the subject is deserving of your serious attention, and rather than let matters continue in this way, I would suggest to the Common Council to seek for legislative interposition in the premises.

Under the 37th section of the city charter, creating the Commissioners of the Consolidated Debt of New Orleans, the Board, since their organization, have issued bonds, having forty years to run, to the amount of $5,554,000 of this amount, two millions were negotiated in New York on the 10th July, 1852, at a premium of $6 80 each; $1,500,000 were disposed of in the city on the 13th December last, at an average premium of $2 89; and $2,254,000 have been exchanged for obligations of the old city corporations, the three Municipalities and late city of Lafayette. The amount of debt extinguished in the meantime, exclusive of interest, has been $4,173,131 43. The Commissioners are now preparing a statement of the entire operations of their department, and will be enabled shortly to submit the same to your honorable body.

But taxes and expenses for the present year are very heavy, and are out of proportion to the growth and resources of the city. The consolidated Loan Tax amounts to an average of one per cent. on the assessed property of the city, whilst on the Third District it falls with more marked severity. The Railroad Tax is 3-4ths of one per cent., but this will be cheerfully paid, for I do not look upon it in the light of a tax, but rather as a loan for which the contributors receive stock, and for which they will be eventually repaid ten fold in the advanced value of their property. According to the Comptroller's report, the estimated expenditure for the coming year is $1 961 474 03, and the estimated revenue from all sources $1,028,740, leaving the amount of $932 733 03, to be provided for by taxation, involving therefore an additional impost of ½ per cent. Unquestionably there have been expenses connected with the organization of a new city government, which could not well be avoided, besides which the late Municipalities bequeathed to the city a large number of pending and costly contracts, suches for paving, repairing of Streets, wharves and other improvements, essential doubtless to the wants of a mercantile, and to the convenience and comfort of the inhabitants. But the complaints of the subject of this heavy expenditure from all classes of our community are too loud to be disregarded, and it is to be hoped that the Common Council may be enabled so to shape the administration of affairs as to eventually relieve the citizens in part from this heavy burden of taxation. I cannot hesitate, therefore, to recommend to you the most rigid economy in the management of the means confided to our trust, and to sanction no improvement nor expense which is not absolutely necessary for the interest and honor of the city.

The Police Department reorganized under the 23th section of the Act of Consolidation went into operation the 1st of June last, and I am therefore unable as yet to present you with the annual result of the transactions of this important service. I may state, however, that I have had great reason to be satisfied with the conduct of the superior officers, and that the majority of the Police men have performed their duties faithfully and zealously. If exceptions occasionally occurred the rule of suspension or discharge was invariably applied, and I have now the satisfaction of knowing that as a body, the Police will compare favorably with that of any other city in the Union. I have caused to be transmitted to each member of your honorable body a copy of the Police Ordinance and of the rules and regulations framed by me for the government and discipline of the department.

Amongst the unfinished business that will engage your early attention, will be the consideration of the Budget and the Report of the late Finance Committee, printed copies of which will be submitted to each member of your honorable body. The detailed statement of the fiscal operations of the two years which the charter makes it incumbent on the Comptroller to lay annually before the Council, is now in the hands of the printer, and will be furnished in the course of a few days.

I also have to direct the attention of the Common Council to the fact that the grant of a square of ground made by the late Municipality No. two to Messrs. Duval & Dupar, for the purpose of establishing a depot for the dead animals within the limits of that District, has expired, and that under the provisions of said grant, the ground together with the improvements have now reverted back to the city of New Orleans. It will be for you to say what to determine what disposition is to be made of the property, or in the event of permitting the use of the same to the present lessees, what remuneration the city shall receive for the privilege.

The late Common Council yielding to the solicitation of a large number of residents in the neighborhood of the New Canal, ordered the construction of a bridge across the same at the intersection of St. Paul street. It is necessary to apprise you that the Canal Bridging Company have recently taken out an injunction against the city to stop the erection of the bridge, and thus pending the issue of the case before the Court, the progress of the work less been suspended.

For the information of the Common Council, I will state that Commissioners of estimate and assessment have been appointed by the Court, for the expropriation of the property required for the laying out of the public Park on the Metairie Ridge, according to your predecessors.

Under the 28th section of the Act of Consolidation, it will become the duty of the Common Council to elect from their own number, four members, one from each District, who shall alone act as Recorders pro tem in the case of sickness or absence of any one or more of the Recorders.

I have received a communication from the Chairman of the Committee of Correspondence at Memphis, calling my attention to a Convention to be held in that city on the first Monday of June next, for the purpose of considering various objects of interest to the South and West, and inviting me to nominate a numerous delegation of our leading and influential citizens to attend the Convention, tendering to them every courtesy and attention on the occasion. In compliance with this request, I have appointed a commission, the names of which are herewith submitted, and I am sure, no hesitation will be felt by the Common Council will make the selection, inasmuch as I consider it desirable that the city of New Orleans should be represented on the occasion.

In conclusion, permit me to tender to your honorable body my hearty co-operation in all measures tending to the public good and welfare.

I have the honor to be, with much respect, your obedient servant,

A. D. CROSSMAN, Mayor.

Destructive Fire.

SHREVEPORT, Friday Morning, April 8, 1853.—A fire broke out about one o'clock, A. M., in a store on the Levee, near the corner of Texas street, which, at one time threatened the destruction of the entire business portion of the town. How it originated is unknown. The flames were not got under until all the buildings from the corner of Milam and Commerce streets to Mr. Baer's store on Texas street, were consumed.

The following buildings were destroyed: On Commerce street (the Levee)—T. M. Turner, building and stock burnt; no insurance. Berg & Beck, building and stock; partly insured. H. M. Nicholls, building consumed; part of the stock saved—$10 000 insurance. J. J. Gallagher, building and stock burnt. Kneeland, building burnt; part of the stock saved. Robert Donnell & Co., buildings and stock burnt; partially insured. J. S. Thrasher, building and stock burnt. Norman's Exchange, building burnt. Fox & Hamlet, building burnt; part of the stock saved. On Texas street—Winter & Weinstock, building burnt; part of the stock saved. H. M. Johnson, building burnt; books, etc., saved. L. Newburger, building burnt; stock mostly saved. Of the goods saved the greater portion is badly damaged. The buildings on Texas street, belonging to Judge Jones and L. F. Crain, Esq., were uninsured. Those on Commerce street belonged to Messrs. Donnell, Nicholls, Norman Cain and Roach, of this place, and Pelne and Harrison, Newtbleans. A large amount of merchandise was damaged by our merchants hastily removing their stock, while fearful of a destructive conflagration.

It is impossible to ascertain the precise extent of the losses sustained. The following will approximate and perhaps reach them:

Buildings—Messrs Crain & Jones, four store houses, $8000; Mr. George M. Nichols, four stores, $5000; Messrs Payne & Harrison, $8000; H. Donnell & Co., $5000; estate of Wm. H. Waddy, $3000; Mr. T. Norman, $4000; Messrs Roach & Cain, $600. Messrs Crain & Jones and H. M. Nichols were partly insured, but to what extent they do not precisely know themselves. The above figures show the value of the buildings, according to our estimate.

Merchandise—Mr Newburger not ascertained; H M Johnson, loss trifling; J. S. Cunliff, artist, loss trifling; A. Winter, not ascertained; T. M Turner, stock $12 000, no insurance, nothing saved; Berg & Beck, stock $22 000. Insured for $10 000—some papers in an iron safe saved, and some merchandise of trifling value; G. M. Nichols, stock $18 000, partially insured; J. J. Gallagher, stock $7000—on storage, belonging to other persons, $23,000; R. Donnell and Co., stock $12,000, partly insured, John Thatcher, stock $11,000, insured for $5000—books and papers saved; Durham & McDonald, drinking house, stock $1500, a portion saved, no insurance; Fox & Hamlett, loss $1500, produce and groceries. In addition to the loss by fire, of goods which had been put upon the levee, we understand that thieving was carried on with a pretty high hand.

Some of our merchants are nearly ruined, but they are honest and have credit, and, with their usual energy, may recuperate.

THE GREAT FIRE IN CHARLESTON.—Charleston papers of the 8th bring us full accounts of the great fire which occurred on the 4th in that city—a brief account of which has previously appeared.

The fire broke out on Monday morning at 3 o'clock, in a stable on the west side of King street, in the upper part of the city, and raged for some hours with great violence. A stiff gale blowing at the time greatly impeded the exertions of the firemen. A large amount of property was entirely destroyed on both sides of King street. The fire extended also to Reid street, laying waste several valuable buildings on either side of it. The following are the names of the principal sufferers: John Wilson, Mrs. M. E. Moses, Wm. Butler, J. P. Read, W. Plessman, E. Harden, Mrs. Blum, Henry Williams, J. J. Lapenne, Mrs. Jane Anthony, Mrs. Davis, estate of A. Benolet, D. Apeter, and several indigent families, whose all was swept away in an hour. But a small portion of the loss appears to have been covered by insurance.

The Courier estimates the entire loss at $35,000. A number of the houses burned, however, were small and comparatively of little value. It has not been ascertained how the fire originated.

There is one feature, says the Courier, attending this sad calamity that deserves particular attention, and appeals loudly to the feelings of the humane and benevolent, and that is the fact that a large number of poor families have not only been rendered houseless, but have lost their little all, and are now utterly dependent upon the charity of those who have the power to assist them.

OFF FOR OREGON.—The Evansville (Indiana) Journal, of the 20th ult., says that Gov. Saul has left with his entire family for Oregon. A couple of the Governor's sons-in-law accompany him, to settle, as he says, in the Eden of the world.

THE CANAL BOAT.

Of all ways of traveling which obtain among our locomotive nation, this said vehicle, the canal boat, is the most absolutely prosaic and inglorious. There is something picturesque, nay, almost sublime, in the lordly march of your well-built, high-bred steamboat. Go take your stand on some over-hanging bluff, where the blue Ohio winds its thread of silver, or the sturdy Mississippi tears its path through unbroken forests, and it will do your heart good to see the gallant boat walking the waters with unbroken and powerful tread, and like some fabled monster of the wave, breathing fire and making the shores resound with its deep respirations. Then there is something mysterious, even awful, in the power of steam. See it, curling up against a blue sky some rosy morning, graceful, fleeting, intangible, and to all appearance the softest and gentlest of all spiritual things, and then think that it is this fairy spirit that keeps all the world alive and hot with motion, think how excellent a servant it is, doing all sorts of gigantic works, like the Genii of old, and yet if you let slip the talisman only for a moment, what terrible advantage it will take of you, and you will confess that steam has some claims both to the beautiful and the terrible. For our own part, when we are down among the machinery of a steamboat in full play, we conduct ourself very reverently, for we consider it as a very serious neighborhood, and every time the steam whizzes, with such red hot determination from the escape valve, we start as if some of the spirits were after us. But in a canal boat there is no power, no mystery, no danger; one can't blow up, one can't be drowned unless by some special effort; one sees clearly all there is to the case—a horse, a rope, and a muddy strip of water, and that is all.

Did you ever try it, reader? If not, take an imaginary trip with us just for experiment.

"There's the boat!" exclaims a passenger in the omnibus as we are rolling down from the Pittsburg Mansion House to the canal.

"Where?" exclaim a dozen of voices, and forthwith a dozen heads go out of the window.

"Why, down there under that bridge, don't you see those lights!"

"What, that little thing?" exclaims an inexperienced traveler, "dear me! we can't half of us get into it!"

"We, indeed!" says some old hand in the business—"I think you'll find it will hold us and a dozen more loads like us."

"Impossible!" say some.

"You'll see," say the initiated; and as soon as you get out, you do see, and hear too, what seems like a general breaking loose from the Tower of Babel, amid a perfect hail storm of trunks, boxes, valises, carpet bags, and every describable and indescribable form of what a westerner calls "plunder."

"That's my trunk!" barks out a big round man. "That's my band-box!" screams a heart-stricken old lady, in terror for her immaculate Sunday caps. "Where's my little red box? I had two carpet bags and a ——." My trunk had a scarlet——Hallo! where you going with that portmanteau? Husband,! husband! do see after the large basket and the little hair trunk; oh! and the baby's little chair!"

"Go below, go below for mercy's sake, my dear, I'll see to the baggage."

At last the feminine part of creation perceiving that in this particular instance they gain nothing by public speaking, are content to be led quietly under hatches, and amusing is the look of dismay which each new comer gives to the confined quarters that present themselves. Those who were so ignorant of the power of compression as to suppose the boat scarce large enough to contain them and theirs, find with dismay a respectable colony of old ladies, babies, mothers, big baskets, and carpet bags already established.

"Mercy on us!" says one, after surveying the little room about ten feet long and six high, "where are we all to sleep to-night."

"Oh, me! what a sight of children!" says a young lady in a despairing tone.

"Poh!" says an initiated traveler, children! scarce any here; let's see: one, the woman in the corner, two, that child with the bread and butter three, and then there's that other woman with two; really, its quite moderate for a canal boat, however, we can't tell till they have all come."

"All! for mercy's sake! You don't say there are any more coming!" exclaim two or three in a breath, "they can't come, there is not room."

Notwithstanding the impressive utterance of this sentence, the contrary is immediately demonstrated by the appearance of a very corpulent elderly lady, with three well grown daughters, who come down looking about them most complacently, entirely regardless of the unchristian look of the company. What a mercy it is that fat people are always good natured!

After this follows an indiscriminate raining down of all shapes, sizes, sexes, and ages; men, women, children, babies, and nurses. The state of feeling becomes perfectly desperate. Darkness gathers on all faces. "We shall be smothered! We shall be crowded to death! We can't stay here," are heard faintly from one and another, and yet, though the boat grows no wider, the walls no higher, they do live, and do bear it in spite of repeated protestations to the contrary. Truly, as Sam Slick says, "there's a sight of wear in human natur."

But meanwhile the children grow sleepy, and divers interesting little duets and trios arise from one part or another of the cabin.

"Hush, Johnny, be a good boy," says a pale nursing mamma to a great, bristling, white headed phenomenon, who is kicking very much at large in her lap.

"I wont be a good boy, neither," responds Johnny, with interesting explicitness; "I want to go to bed, and so-o-o-o," and Johnny makes up a mouth as big as a tea-cup, and roars with good courage, and his mamma asks him, "if he ever saw pa do so," and tells him that "he is mamma's dear, good little boy, and must not make a noise," with various observations of the kind, which are so strikingly efficacious in such cases. Meanwhile the domestic concert in other quarters proceeds with vigor. "Mamma, I'm tired!" bawls a child. "Where's the baby's night-gown!" calls a nurse. "Do take Peter up in your lap, and keep him still." "Pray get out some biscuits to stop their mouths." Meanwhile sundry babies strike in "con spirito," as the music books have it, and execute various flourishes—the disconsolate mothers sigh and look as if all was over with them, and the young ladies appear extremely disgusted, and wonder "what business women have to be traveling round with babies!"

To these troubles succeeds the turning out scene, when the whole caravan's ejected into the gentlemen's cabin that the beds may be made. The red curtains are put down, and in solemn silence all the last mysterious preparations begin. At length it is announced that all is ready. Forthwith the whole company rush back, and find the walls embellished by a series of little shelves, about a foot wide, each furnished with a mattrass and bedding, and hooked to the ceiling by a suspiciously slender cord. Direful are the ruminations and exclamations of inexperienced travelers, particularly young ones, as they eye these very equivocal accommodations. "What, sleep up there! I won't sleep on one of those top shelves, I know! The cords will certainly break." The chambermaid here takes up the conversation, and solemnly assures them that such an accident is not to be thought of at all, that it is a natural impossibility—a thing that could not happen without an actual miracle; and since it becomes increasingly evident that thirty ladies cannot all sleep on the lowest shelf, there is some effort made to exercise faith in this doctrine, nevertheless all look on their neighbors with fear and trembling, and when the stout lady talks of taking a shelf, she is most urgently pressed to change places with her alarmed neighbor below. Points of location being after a while adjusted, then comes the last struggle. Every body wants to take off their bonnet, to look for their shawl, to find their cloak, to get their carpet bag, and all set about it with such zeal that nothing can be done. "Ma'am you're on my foot," says one. "Will you please to move, ma'am," says somebody, who is gasping and struggling behind you.

"Move," you echo.

"Indeed, I should be very glad to, but I don't see much prospect of it."

"Chambermaid," calls a lady, who is struggling among a heap of carpet bags and children at one end of the cabin. "Ma'am," echoes the poor chambermaid, who is wedged fast in a similar situation at the other.

"Where's my cloak, chambermaid?"

"I'd find it ma'am, if I could move."

"Chambermaid, my basket!"

"Chambermaid, my parasol!"

"Chambermaid, a glass of water!"

"Mamma, they push me so!"

"Hush, child; crawl under there and lie still till I can undress you."

At last, however, the various distresses are over—the babies sink to sleep, and even that much enduring being, the chambermaid, seeks out some corner for repose. Tired and drowsy, you are just sinking into a doze, when bang! goes the boat against the sides of a lock—ropes scrape, men run and shout, and up fly the heads of all the top-shelf-ites, who are generally the mere juvenile and fairy part of the company.

"What's that! what's that!" flies from mouth to mouth, and forthwith they proceed to awaken their respective relations.

"Mother! Aunt Hannah! Do wake up! What is this awful noise?"

"Oh, only a lock!"

"Pray, be still," groan out the sleepy members from below.

"A lock!" exclaim the vivacious creatures, ever on the alert for information, "And what is a lock, pray?"

"Don't you know what a lock is, you silly creature? Do lie down, and go to sleep."

"But, say, there an't any danger in a lock, is there?" respond the querists.

"Danger!" exclaims a deaf old lady, poking up her head, "what's the matter? There hn't't nothin hurst, has there?"

"No, no, no!" exclaim the prevexed and despairing opposition party, who find that there is no such thing as going to sleep, till they have made the old lady below, and the young ladies above, understand exactly the philosophy of a lock.

After a while the conversation again subsides. Again all is still—you hear only the trampling of horses, and the rippling of the rope in the water, and sleep again is stealing over you. You doze, you dream, and all of a sudden you are started by a cry, "Chambermaid, wake up the lady that wants to be set ashore!"

Up jumps the Chambermaid, and up jumps the lady and two children, and forthwith form a committee of inquiry as to the ways and means.

"Where's my bonnet?" says the lady, half awake, and fumbling among the various articles of the name. "I thought I hung it up behind the door."

"Can't you find it?" says the poor chambermaid, yawning and rubbing her eyes.

"Oh, yes, here it is!" says the lady, and then the cloak, the shawl, the gloves, the shoes, receive each a separate discussion; at last all seems ready, and they begin to move off, when lo! Peter's cap is missing!

"Now, where can it be?" soliloquizes the lady, "I put it right here by the table leg; may be it got into some of the berths."

At this bright suggestion the chambermaid takes the candle, and goes round deliberately to every berth, poking the light directly in the face of every sleeper.

"Here it is, perhaps," she exclaims, pulling at something black under one pillow.

"No, indeed, those are my shoes," says the vexed sleeper.

"May be it's here," she resumes, darting upon something dark in another berth.

"No, that's my habit," responds the occupant. The chambermaid then proceeds to turn over all the children on the floor, to see if it isn't under them, in the course of which process they are most agreeably waked up and enlivened, and when every one is broad awake, and most uncharitably wishing the cap and Peter, too, at the bottom of the canal, the good lady exclaims, "Well, if this isn't lucky, here I had it safe in my basket all the time," and she departs amid the—what shall I say?—execrations of the whole company—ladies though they be.

Well, after this follows a hushing up, and wiping up, among the juvenile population, and a series of remarks commences from the various shelves of a very edifying and instructive tendency. One says that the woman did not seem to know where any thing was—another says that she has waked them all up—a third adds that she has waked up all the children, too; and the elderly ladies make moral reflections on the importance of putting your things where you can find them—being always ready, etc., which observations being delivered in an exceedingly doleful and drowsy tone, form a sort of sub-bass to the lively chatterings of the upper shelf-tiers, who declare that they feel quite wide awake; that they don't think they shall go to sleep again to-night, and discourse over every thing in creation, until you heartily wish you were enough related to them to give them a scolding.

At last, however, voice after voice drops off—you fall into a most refreshing slumber—it seems to you that you sleep about a quarter of an hour, when the chambermaid pulls you by the sleeve, "Will you please to get up, ma'am, we want to make the beds." You start and stare. Sure, enough, the night is gone! So much for sleeping on board canal boats.

Let us not enumerate the manifold perplexities of the morning toilet, in a place where every lady realizes most forcibly the condition of the old woman who lived under a broom—"All she wanted was elbow room."

Let us not tell how one glass is made to answer for thirty faces—one ewer and vase for thirty lavations; and, tell it not in Gath! one towel for a company! Let us not intimate how ladies' shoes have, in the night, clandestinely slid into the gentlemen's cabin, and gentlemen's boots elbowed, or rather toed their way among ladie's gear, nor recite the exclamations after runaway property that are heard.

"I can't find nothing of Johnny's shoe!"

"My side-combs are gone," exclaims a nymph with dishevelled curls.

"Massy, do look at my bonnet!" exclaims an old lady, elevating an article crushed into as many angles as there are pieces in a minced pie.

"I never did sleep so much together in my life," echoes a poor little French lady, whom despair has driven into talking English.

But our shortening paper warns us not to prolong our catalogue of distresses beyond reasonable bounds, and therefore we will close with advising all our friends who intend to try this way of traveling for pleasure, to take a good stock both of patience and clean towels with them, for we think that they will find abundant need for both.

From Lossing's Field Book of the Revolution.

CAPTURE OF PRESCOTT.

The writer may well designate this as one of the "boldest enterprises of the war." We doubt that there is any thing in history to compare with it. The capture of the Duc d'Enghien was accomplished by force. It required no courage for a troop of soldiers to cross the Rhine, into the neutral territory of Baden, and lead off captive an unarmed Prince: But to cross Narraganset Bay, through the midst of hostile fleets, and take prisoner the commandant of an army, surrounded by his guards, was a feat of heroism commensurate only with the darlag of our Revolutionary sires. But to the story:

"Incensed by the conduct of Prescott, the inhabitants devised several schemes to rid themselves of the oppressor. None promised success, and it was reserved for Lieutenant Colonel Barton, of Providence, to conceive and execute one of the boldest and most hazardous enterprises undertaken during the war. It was accomplished on the night of the 10th of July, 1777. At that time General Prescott was quartered at the house of a Quaker named Overing, above five miles above Newport, on the west road leading to the ferry, at the north part of the island. Barton's plan was to cross Narraganset Bay from the main, seize Prescott, and carry him to the American camp. It was a very hazardous undertaking, for at that time there were three British frigates, with their guard-boats, lying east of Prudence Island, and almost in front of Prescott's quarters. With a few chosen men, Colonel Barton embarked in four whale-boats, with muffled oars, at Warwick Point, at nine o'clock in the evening, and passed, unobserved, over to Rhode Island, between the islands of Prudence and Patience. They heard the cry, 'All's well!' from the guard-boats of the enemy, as they passed silently and unobserved, and landing in Coddington's Cove, at the mouth of a small stream which passed by the quarters of Prescott. Barton divided his men into several squads, assigning to each its duty and station, and then, with the strictest order and profound silence, they advanced toward the house. The main portion of the expedition passed about midway between a British guard-house and the encampment of a company of light horse, while the remainder was to make a circuitous route to approach Prescott's quarters from the rear, and secure the doors. As Barton and his men approached the gate, a sentinel hailed them twice, and then demanded the countersign. "We have no countersign to give," Barton said, and quickly added, "Have you seen any deserters here to-night?" The sentinel was misled by this question, supposing them to be friends, and was not undeceived until his musket was seized, and himself bound and menaced with instant death if he made any noise. The doors had been secured by the division from the rear, and Barton entered the front passage boldly. Mr. Overton sat alone, reading, the rest of the family being in bed. Barton inquired for General Prescott's room. Overton pointed upward, signifying that it was directly over the room in which they were standing. With four strong men, and Sisson, a powerful negro who accompanied them, Barton ascended the stairs and gently tried the door. It was locked; no time was to be lost in parleying; the negro drew back a couple of paces, and using his head for a battering-ram, burst open the door at the first effort. The General, supposing the intruders to be robbers, sprang from his bed, and seized his gold watch that was hanging upon the wall. Barton placed his hand gently upon the General's shoulder, told him he was his prisoner, and that perfect silence was now his only safety. Prescott begged time to dress, but it being a hot July night, and time precious, Barton refused acquiescence, feeling that it would not be cruel to take him across the bay, where he could make his toilet with more care, at his leisure. So, throwing his cloak around him, and placing him between two armed men, the prisoner was barried to the shore. In the mean time, Major Barrington, Prescott's Aid, hearing the noise in the General's room, leaned from a window to escape but was captured. He and the sentinel were stationed in the centre of the party. At about midnight, captors and prisoners landed at Warwick Point, where General Prescott first broke the silence by saying to Colonel Barton, 'Sir, you have made a bold push to-night.' 'We have been fortunate,' coolly replied Barton. Captain Elliott was there with a coach to convey the prisoners to Providence, where they arrived at sunrise. Prescott was kindly treated by General Spencer and other officers, and in the course of a few days was sent to the head-quarters of Washington at NewWindsor, on the Hudson."

Execution of Major Audre.

We think our readers will be interested by the perusal of the most minute account of this event, which it has ever been our chance to meet with. It purports to be from the journal of an eye-witness of the melancholy scene:

Major Andre is no more among the living. I have just witnessed his exit. It was a tragical scene of the deepest interest. The principal guard officer, who was constantly in the room with the prisoner, relates, that when the hour of execution was announced to him in the morning, he received it without emotion, and, while all present were afflicted with silent gloom, he retained a firm countenance, with calmness and composure of mind. Observing his servant enter the room in tears, he exclaimed, "Leave me until you can show yourself more manly." His breakfast being sent to him from the table of Washington, which had been done every day of his confinement, he partook of it as usual, and, having shaved and dressed himself, he placed his hat on the table, and cheerfully said to the guard-officers, "I am ready at any moment, gentlemen, to wait on you." The fatal hour having arrived, a large detachment of troops was paraded, and an immense concourse of people assembled. Almost all our general and field officers, excepting his Excellency and his staff, were present on horseback. Melancholy and gloom pervaded all ranks, and the scene was awfully affecting. I was so near, during the solemn march to the fatal spot, as to observe every movement, and to participate in every emotion the melancholy scene was calculated to produce. Major Andre walked from the stone house in which he had been confined, between two of our subaltern officers, arm-in-arm. The eyes of the immense multitude were fixed upon him, who, rising superior to the fears of death, appeared as if conscious of the dignified deportment he displayed. He betrayed no want of fortitude, but retained a complaisant smile on his countenance, and politely bowed to several gentlemen whom he knew, which was respectfully returned. It was his earnest desire to be shot, as being the mode of death most conformable to the feelings of a military man, and he had indulged the hope that his request would be granted. At the moment, therefore, when suddenly he came in view of the gallows, he involuntarily started backward, and made a pause. "Why this emotion, sir?" said an officer by his side. Instantly recovering his composure, he said, "I am reconciled to my death, but I detest the mode." While waiting and standing near the gallows, I observed some degree of trepidation—placing his foot on a stone and rolling it over, and choking in his throat, as if attempting to swallow. So soon, however, as he perceived that things were in readiness, he stepped quickly into the wagon, and at this moment he appeared to shriuk; but, instantly elevating his head with firmness, he said, "It will be but a momentary pang;" and, taking from his pocket two white handkerchiefs, the provost marshal, with one, loosely pinioned his arms, and with the other, the victim, after taking off his hat and stock, bandaged his own eyes with perfect firmness, which melted the hearts and moistened the cheeks, not only of his servant, but of the throng of spectators. The rope being appended to the gallows, he slipped the noose over his head, and adjusted it to his neck, without the assistance of the awkward executioner. Col. Scammel now informed him that he had an opportunity of speaking. If he desired it. He raised the handkerchief from his eyes, and said. "I pray you to bear me witness that I meet my fate like a brave man." The wagon being now removed from under him, he was suspended, and instantly expired. It proved, indeed, "but a momentary pang." He was dressed in his regimentals and boots. His remains, in the same dress, were placed in an ordinary coffin and interred at the foot of the gallows; and the spot was consecrated by the tears of thousands. Thus died, in the bloom of youth, the accomplished Major Andre, the pride of the Royal Army, and the valued friend of Sir Henry Clinton.

*It is said that Washington never saw Major Andre, having avoided a personal interview with him from the beginning.

Threatening Aspect of the Turkish Question.

The full accounts by the steamer Arctic at New York from Liverpool to the 23d March have come to hand. Among the 91 passengers are Joseph Dembinski and Henry and Myer Rothschild.

The complicated state of affairs between Turkey and her neighbors begins to assume an alarming aspect. Part of this agitation is doubtless got up by speculators, but enough remains to show that there is more than probability of a storm breaking out in that quarter. The matter is referred to at length under to caption "Turkey."

Twenty sample bags of cotton, grown on the estates of the Pacha of Egypt, have just been received by the Manchester Chamber of Commerce. The samples were grown under the superintendence of a young man sent from Manchester by the Chamber, and exhibit great improvement in cleaning and packing.

The reduction in the value of money in England begins to tell upon most classes of the community. During the past few days strikes for increase of wages have been made by workmen of nearly every description in Liverpool. Increased remuneration has been obtained by the carpenters, shipwrights, coopers, boot and shoe makers, warehousemen and seamen on the channel steamers, and steps have been taken for increased pay by the railway employees, watch-makers, paper-hangers, plasterers, cotters and some other trades.

FIRE AT WINDSOR CASTLE.—About 10 o'clock on Saturday night of the 23d ult., a fire broke out at Windsor Castle, which was not subdued until 6 o'clock on Sunday morning. It appears that the Queen and Prince Albert returned to the Castle from Buckingham Palace in the afternoon, and dined in the Gothic dining room, and soon after Mr. Baker, the head cellar-man, discovered smoke issuing from the south angle of the apartment, in consequence of fire having communicated from a flue. The tower in which this misfortune commenced, was a splendid piece of architecture, and nearly faced Eaton College, whilst the beautiful terrace and promenade stands immediately in front, and under the battlements is the tastefully laid out flower gardens and slopes, where her Majesty and royal children frequently enjoy walking exercise. On the ground floor was an apartment of great extent, and most beautifully appointed, which was used by the Queen as the dining room. The roof, or more correctly speaking, the ceiling, was inlaid with carved oak, delicately heightened with gold. Over this magnificent apartment there were a number of rooms, principally devoted for sleeping apartments for the royal children and attendants, various other rooms adjoined, those just mentioned, and the whole touched, or nearly so, the apartments in the Brunswick Tower.

With as little delay as possible, the news was communicated to the officers of the Royal Household, and in less than seven minutes a battalion of 700 of the Fusilier Guards were on the spot, and formed a barricade, and were quickly followed by the whole regiment of the 2d Life Guards, with three barrack engines, who battled nobly with the flames, but the intense cold froze the water in the hose. Meanwhile, the flames extended from the ground floor up the staircase, and having entered numerous apartments in the Prince of Wales's Tower, the whole became ignited. The parties in command of the engines did all they could to confine the fire within that part of the structure, but without the least success; and in a space of time comparatively brief, the destructive element forced its way into the centre of the Brunswick Tower, when the sight that presented itself was such as to terrify all who beheld the spectacle—for the flames, in huge bodies, were rushing out of the various windows in each tower, threatening to take a complete circuit round the castle.

The reflection of the fire could be seen for miles distant. At Reading, nineteen miles away, it was stated that the inhabitants could see the fire issuing from the battlements of the tower, and many looked upon the work of destruction in the distance with fear and astonishment.

During this trying scene her Majesty and his Royal Highness, Prince Albert, betrayed not the least signs of fear, but appeared rejoiced at the willingness displayed by her loyal subjects in mounting the ladders, scattering the water over the fire, and doing all that was possible to subdue the conflagration. Prince Albert remained at the fire during the whole time, but the Queen and her household retired to their private apartments.

At about 11 o'clock the fire was at its height, when several engines were playing on the tower from various directions. An express was also dispatched from the castle to the London fire brigade, which arrived with two powerful engines, under the superintendence of Mr. Braidwood, at two o'clock in the morning. About this time the fire was partially got under, but it was not totally extinguished before six o'clock.

The fire was chiefly confined to the tower, and the rooms destroyed are the Gothic dining-room and upwards of a dozen bed-rooms, with nearly all the splendid furniture. The Prince of Wale's Tower may be said to be completely gutted, and even a great portion of the roof is destroyed.

The plate rooms, which contained gold plate valued at between two to three millions of money, are situated immediately under the Gothic dining-room, where the fire was raging; but it was not considered necessary to remove any portion of it, as the rooms were made fire proof. As no portion of the property is insured, the loss will fall chiefly on the Lord Chamberlain's department. The kitchen and confectionery were inundated with water to the depth of several feet. The loss was at first estimated at £100 000, but it has since been ascertained that £20,000 will repair all damage.

FRANCE.

It was stated in the diplomatic circles, that at the interview which took place between the Emperor and Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, the Emperor repeated, in the strongest possible terms, his desire to act cordially with the English Government on the Eastern question, as the only means of preventing a conflict, which would only lead to the dismemberment of the Turkish Empire or a war in Europe.

It is currently reported that the Emperor of Austria has represented to the Pope, in strong terms, that as the representative of an ancient monarchy, he desires to assert his right to precedence before Napoleon III, and that he would feel himself slighted if the Pope were to crown the French Emperor until several months after his own coronation by the head of the church at Vienna.

The Legislative body met on Friday, when the President announced that he had received from the Minister of State the budget of 1853. The amount of revenue is 1,528,000,600f., that of the expenditure, 1,519,000,000f., which gives a surplus of revenue of 9,000,000f.

TURKEY.

The threatening aspect of Russia towards Turkey has caused the highest degree of excitement not only at Constantinople, but in France, and in a lesser degree in England. In the late demands of Austria upon the Porte, public feeling was tranquillized by the thought that Russia took no part in the matter. No sooner, however, had the Sultan succumbed to the Austrian demands, than Russia, under the pretext of a mission to treat respecting the disagreements arising from the guardianship of the Holy Places, and other matters which diplomatic custom would have confided to an Envoy of no special prestige, dispatched Prince Mentschikoff, Minister of Marine, with the accompaniment of a staff of military and naval officers that gives his embassy more the appearance of a challenge to an enemy than of a mission to strengthen the footing between friendly powers.

Previous to his setting out for Constantinople, this envoy, Mentschikoff, passed in review the army on the Turkish frontier, and the Russian fleet in the Euxine gave as thorough a drilling to both as could have been done in view of a campaign, and even practised the troops of all arms in embarcation and disembarcation from the ships. These facts, although kept quiet at the time, have been elicited by the haughty tone assumed by Mentschikoff towards the Porte, and as may be supposed, have act leaded to assuage the alarm which conduct so unlooked for naturally induced. Turkey, after all, being the weak spot in the relations between Russia, France and England, the public funds of the two latter countries have shown a depression, although much more in France than in England.

A curious and highly important feature in the present aspect of this "very pretty quarrel" is the evident disinclination of England to interfere in the business. This disinclination is so evident, as to have provoked the sarcasms of the Continental press, and especially of the French papers. The London Times has, indeed, stepped foward as the advocate of letting Turkey drop to pieces if she will, and argues that the integrity of the Ottoman Empire in Europe is no longer necessary to preserve the balance of power. Although the Times has doubtless weighty reasons for its opinions, it is not considered that the present feeling of the British Government is much different. In the meantime, the Admiralty, so far as is known, has contented itself with ordering a few ships to reinforce the Mediterranean squadron—the French fleet having, on the first intelligence of the difficulties, received orders to proceed to the Archipelago.

While this want of sincerity is displayed in England, Mr. Rose, acting for Britain at Constantinople, had despatched the steamship Wasp with dispatches, dated 8th, to the English fleet at Malta to hasten with all speed to the Dardanelles. Notwithstanding these threatening appearances, it is reported in England to be the opinion both of the French and Austrian Courts that the matter in dispute will be peaceably arranged. Up to the latest accounts, we are without authentic information as to what the demands of Russia really are. A mental consideration of all the information we can come at leads to the inference that the Russian has in fact, to the present time, demanded nothing in particular, but has exhibited such an amount of what is vulgarly called "brag," as has thrown the whole diplomatic world into a state of the liveliest indigestion, a not unlikely circumstance.

PATAGONIA.

ATTACK ON AN EMIGRANT SHIP.—Intelligence has been received at Lloyd's, under date, Stanley, Falkland Islands, January 5, of a most daring attack on the ship Porcupine, of Liverpool, Milliger, master, by the Patagonians. It seems that, on passing through the Straits of Magellan, on her way to California, the Porcupine grounded. Early the next morning, the ship was surrounded by numerous canoes, full of natives. The Captain, thinking they might be useful in getting the ship off, let some of the principal chiefs come on deck, when they offered to exchange a copy of Johnson's Comprehensive Dictionary, signed on the fly-leaf "John Badham, January, 1851," a prayer book and other articles, evidently belonging to an English ship. The Captain now observing a fleet of canoes approaching nearer, many bearing lighted pine branches, gave orders for the crew and passengers, most of whom had revolvers, to arm themselves, and a terrible conflict ensued; the savages fought desperately, and tried to burn the ship. After a severe struggle and great slaughter, they were beaten off, and three hundred bags of oats being thrown overboard, the ship floated.

Testimony from Tennessee

IN FAVOR OF

B. A. FAHNESTOCK'S VERMIFUGE.

"The Nashville Republican Banner," says Mr. John Herriford, a well known citizen of this State, "speaks highly of the value of B. A. FAHNESTOCK'S VERMIFUGE in another column. This Vermifuge, when pure, is an invaluable specific for Worms—those torments of Children."

Messrs. B. A. FAHNESTOCK & Co.,

Gentlemen: For the benefit of others, I take pleasure in testifying to the valuable qualities of your Vermifuge. About ten years ago my attention was first called to it by a friend, an officer in one of the Banks in Nashville, in whose estimation it was then a standard article, having used it in his family with very satisfactory results. By his advice I took a vial home for one of my children, who had until then been very feeble, and subject to frequent sickness. The Vermifuge expelled a great number of Worms, and the child afterwards gradually recovered good health. I have since used it regularly in my own family for most of the ailments of children, and generally with good effect.

One remarkable case, in the family of a near relation, I will mention in particular. The child was about four years of age, had always been puny; often attacked with severe pains, and at the age mentioned, nearly lost the use of the lower extremities. I recommended the use of your Vermifuge in the case, and left the half of a vial, which I was taking home, with directions for its use. I learned afterwards that the child passed an enormous bulk of large Worms—the number not remembered—and in a short time, by the use of the Vermifuge, the fits ceased, and its health began to improve. When I next saw the child she was walking, and enjoying perfect health. This recovery from the very jaws of death, the friends attribute to the use of your Vermifuge.

A commodious and splendid brick edifice has just been completed—ninety-seven by forty-seven feet, three stories—which for stability, convenience of arrangement, and for hamber, size and comfort of private and school rooms is not surpassed by any similar one in the country. The Principal resides in the building, and with his lady and competent female assistance, superintends the boarding department. A lady will reside in the Seminary, who faithfully discharges the duties of Matron, Nurse and Governess, so that at all times, pupils will find the comforts, kindness and attentions of home. The Principal, with the aid of female teachers, who also live in the Seminary, diligently guard and form their morals, manners and habits of the pupils. Being under his charge at all times, they are constantly exercised under a wholesome system of regulations, respecting neatness, order, punctuality, economy and regularity, calculated to give a safe and vigorous development to character. The appliances of home and family are not removed by this arrangement, but perpetuated and strengthened.

The next scholastic year will commence on Thursday the 23d of September, 1852. Pupils can enter at any time during the year, chargeable from the time of entrance. No deduction will be made but by special arrangement with the Principal.

Boarders study at night under a teacher. They are required to retire 9 o'clock at night, and rise early in the morning at a given signal, and to take frequent and wholesome exercise.

Private rooms are large, conveniently and comfortably furished. Pupils are required to keep their wardrobes and private apartments in neatness and order. A proper officer weekly takes charge of their clothing, inspects its condition, and every Saturday morning instructs them in plain sewing and necessary repairs of clothing. Every article of clothing must be marked with the owner's name.

Bi-monthly reports are sent to patrons, which are a faithful showing of the scholarship and deportment of pupils.

Pupils are not allowed to attend parties, balls, dancing classes, or any amusement calculated to interfere with their studies.

Visitors are not received by pupils, except with suitable introduction to the Principal from patrons.

Pupils must have certain information respecting every correspondent. Pupils are required to attend Church and Sunday School on Sabbath.

No accounts will be opened in Marion but with the expressed permission of patrons. When articles are to be purchased, the lady of the Principal must approve the purchase (who superintends their trading), and thus expenditure will be controlled. Patrons should anticipate and supply the wants of pupils as far as is practicable.

Dental operations will not be performed but by special permission from patrons.

Patrons are earnestly requested to encourage economy in all the expenditures of pupils—clothing, pocket money and jewelry.

The institution has graduated forty-four young ladies since its organization, and arrangements are being made for furnishing, improving and increasing its Library, Apparatus, Cabinet and Herbarium.

The Professors of Music, Drawing, Painting and Modern Languages have been engaged in this Institution for the last five years, with decided acceptability—are superior Musicians and splendid performers on Piano, Harp, Guitar, Organ, Melodeon, Violin, etc., and highly accomplished in other departments.

As to rates of Board and Tuition, I will pay the Board, Tuition and incidental fees of a Young Lady for the whole year in the collegiate course; $177 will embrace French and Latin; $227 the above, with Musicon Guitar; $257 Music on the Piano, French, Latin and Board, regular course, etc. Books, Stationery, Music, etc., are furnished by the Principal at reduced rates.

Lights and towels for private rooms, to be furnished by pupils. The Principal can furnish lights very low.

WORDSWORTH.

Written on a Blank Leaf of his Memoirs.
BY JOHN G. WHITTIER.

Dear friends, who read the world aright,
And in its common forms discern
A beauty and a harmony
The many never learn!

Kindred in soul of him who found
In simple flower and leaf and stone
The impulses of the sweetest lays
Our tuneful tongue has known.

Accept this record of a life,
As sweet and pure, as calm and good,
As long day of blended dune,
In green field and in wood.

How welcome to our ears, long pained
By strife of sect and party noise,
The brook-like murmur of his song
Of nature's simple joys.

The violet by its mossy stone,
The primrose by the river's brim,
The cheerful daffodil have found
Immortal life through him.

The sunrise on his misty lake,
The rosy flame his sunset brought,
World-seen are gladdening all the vales
And mountain peaks of thought.

Art builds on sand; the works of pride,
And human passion change and fall;
But that which shares the life of God
With him surviveth all.

EDUCATIONAL SOCIETY OF ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

There has recently appeared an article, setting forth the merits of a late organization connected with the Alabama Conference, called the "Ministerial Education Society." It is intended for the benefit of young men who give evidence of being called to the ministry, but are unable from the lack of means to qualify themselves for the sacred office. They are objects, indeed, worthy of the efforts made in their behalf; and it is devoutly desired that many will contribute to the aid of those so deserving and full of promise to the Church. It speaks loudly for the benevolent spirit of the times to see new channels constantly opening through which the wealth of the Church may run out upon the world to confer many and lasting benefits on individuals and nations. Every year seems to add another society to the catalogue. And those who feel a proper interest on the score of our fellow men, and sincerely pray for God's blessings upon them, will never complain that there are too many associations for doing good, but according to their means assist in furthering every enterprise that aims to bless the human race. Such persons are the benefactors of the world, and Providence will no doubt increase their number and ability in the same ratio that He calls into existence these several agencies.

Therefore, it would not be improper to mention, in this connection, a certain Society organized during the Conference of 1851. It is called the Education Society of the Alabama Conference. As the name might signify, it was not intended to operate in the cause of education generally, or devise ways and means for the endowment of Professorships in the different Institutions of the Church, but simply to gather up its benefits in smaller or larger sums from all the congregations under the charge of the Conference, and in equitable proportion distribute them among a particular few—the children of the traveling preachers.

As is more fully expressed in the language of the Constitution, the object is "to provide means for the education of the children of the members of the Alabama Conference, and the orphans of such members who have died in the itinerant work." And in order to a proper direction of its financial affairs, it has a Board of eight managers, one half laymen, and the other half members of the Conference.

It does not require a great effort to see the adaptation of the plan proposed to the necessities of those concerned. And the brethren who projected it, acted under the belief that the Church would not only appreciate their motives, but give evidence of approval by aiding a movement so important. In this they have partially realized their expectations. If, as in the economy of other Church governments our preachers were furnished with more abundant resources, and required to do more work, then it might seem presumptuous to ask if their children have not a right to expect assistance at the hands of the Church. But who is the itinerant? Not the man of large salary and easy life, or one who week after week, and years together, lives upon his farm, or serves as principal in a village school, at the same time sustaining a pastoral relation to one or more congregations. He has been called a man of one work—a work that sends him to every class of men, and according to necessity bids him come and go at any time, and to any place. He is always in service. At night in bivouac, in the morning upon his horse, with armor belted on, and at the first call of duty bounds with readiness upon the field. Deployed along the lines as the picket-guard of the great army of Christ, his conflicts are numerous, hardships grievous, and duties laborious. His rations are meted out, sometimes to the measure of a meal, and the pound of flesh. The pay is small, with a family often large and increasing, and sometimes very dependent. He has left his trade—the tools lay idle in the shop—the plow is standing in the field—the professional books are closed and laid upon the shelf—the sign is taken down—in a word, his cares are upon the sea-shore—his "occupation's gone." The Holy Spirit calls him into a new employment, and placing him in the hands of the Church, says to her, "the laborer is worthy of his hire." Not as any other laborer who toils with physical means only, and looks for nothing but a physical reward. His is mainly an intellectual work—mind in contact with mind. It his business to clear up, turn over, and sow down in Gospel seed, a vast intellectual forest before him, that he may raise a harvest of precious fruit for his Lord. And he has reason to believe that the Great Head of the Church will compensate him, not in physical enjoyments, hereafter, but such as are adapted to that loftier, thinking ever active principle within him. Combining various powers, he operates with hands, heart and head. For the work of his hands he deserves food, raiment and shelter—for that of his heart, brotherly love and Christian sympathy; and for the labor of his head, he is worthy of intellectual hire—a compensation corresponding with his necessities. And as the lack of food for his children becomes his necessity, as the father and head appointed by Providence to provide for them, so the absence of educational advantages becomes a like necessity. And as he is worthy of and receives means to supply the former upon the ground of services rendered, so is he worthy of the means to supply the latter, being divinely appointed to raise them up to a life of usefulness here, and glory hereafter. Expected by his Church to sacrifice time, employment, strength and all, from whom shall his children in their turn expect bodily and mental sustenance, but those for whose good he labors? It is a frequent remark, that "the preacher should work on, pay or no pay, and look for his reward hereafter." What a blessed thing he has something to hope for! But this expectation does not defray all expenses in passing through this to the next world. And because he has the assurance that after death he will heir largely of an inheritance in Heaven, it is no reason that while on earth he should be kept without the comforts of life, and his children after him left in mental darkness. It is a painful truth that some act seemingly under the impression that God intends to pay all their accounts in the end, and literally grant them a free gospel. The Judge of all men will certainly fulfil his promises, and in the meantime hold us responsible for our obligations. There are others who turn away from such claims with the coolness of a stoic and say, "let the preacher trust in Providence." This is indeed his comfort. And who will say that the Head of the Church did not move upon a few men to propose this plan for the good of his ministering servants? Doubtless he did, and intends making it a very special providence in directly appealing to every member of the congregation to do something in aid of objects so worthy.

As no item for schooling appears in the annual allowance made out by the Stewards, many children are doomed to ignorance, unless timely erected through the individual kindness of some Principal of an academy, who offers their tuition free of charge. And there are some connected with the Alabama Conference, who are already indebted to the benevolence of some school-master, or the beneficence of the State, as provided in her Sixteenth Section Law.

But where are our Conference Schools? They are few and scattered. It is true they propose to educate the children of itinerant preachers gratis, and the number of beneficiaries is quite enough for the interest of the Schools, but small in proportion to the many who need to be educated. And those whose appointments are upon the Northern or Southern boundaries of the Conference, in the mountains and swamps, upon poor Circuits, receive no benefit from them, whatever. They are the men who need assistance above all others; but aside from help through this Society, must live without it. A letter addressed to an P. Elder, from one of the preachers on his District, has lately been read, who writes that he had lost his horse, and was too poor to buy another, but expected to travel to his appointment on foot so long as his strength would last. He concludes the short letter by saying: "My brother pray for me and mine." Who could refuse to pray or give! That brother has children, and one old enough to be at school, but too young to send from home. What benefit are our institutions to him? As it would be impossible for every citizen of Alabama to move into a Sixteenth Section, so would it be equally impossible for every member of Conference to move into the neighborhood of our Schools. The remaining alternative is to send the children there at any age, when they should not be entrusted beyond the limits of parental guardianship. And from a desire to use the proffered benefit some have erred in sending their children from home too early. Even if no objection of this kind existed, there are very few able to pay board and traveling expenses. Ministerial influence has been crippled by borrowing means for this good purpose, when there was not a sufficient probability of refunding. Some have moved into a proximity with the different Schools, bought or rented property, and incurred additional expense, expecting by the assistance of boarders to raise the means with which to educate their children. What a speculation! Here the preacher becomes a landlord—paid to provide food and bedding for the children of other men. The question raised is retrenchment, or boarders' rights. Interest sides with the former, and conscience the latter. Should dissatisfaction be the result, there are complaints and bitter prejudices against him for years thereafter, not as the keeper of a boarding house, but as a minister of Jesus Christ. And united with all this he winds up the concern in debt—distressingly so. But should another be more successful in his pecuniary matters, he is not yet prepared to leave, for having educated one child he must needs do the same for the remaining half dozen or more. Hence the District and Circuits contiguous must be traveled and retraveled, not always on the score of greater usefulness and acceptability, but because he has located his family to secure the tuition of his children gratis. As to the Institution, itself, every one knows that a large outlay of money is necessary to keep it in successful operation, and though called a Conference School, the Conference is not responsible for its liabilities, but the risk is taken by the Principal or Board of Trustees. Here, then, are our preachers' children educated at the risk, if not in the end, at the expense of a few men.

What better plan is proposed by the Education Society? Let every member of Conference, who has children to educate, present to the Board of Managers, at each Annual Session, the tuition bills properly certified to by the Principal or Faculty of the Institution he has patronized, whether High or Low School, a Conference Institution, or State University, and they will be paid by the Treasurer of this Society. In this arrangement there are many advantages. The preachers can School their children under their immediate supervision, until arriving at a proper age to be sent abroad, and then if able to bear the expense without embarrassment, can patronize our Conference Institutions. They can live on their work and not wear themselves down by long and fatiguing rides. There is no need to undergo all the perplexity and annoyance of keeping boarding houses. Our itinerancy will not be impaired, but every man appointed to such work, as in the judgment of the appointing power he is best suited. All will be on an equality, whether they labor on the mountains, or in the swamps, or villages or cities. The institutions will not be taxed with beneficiaries, and any risk incurred will be for the benefit of such as are immediately concerned. And instead of the children being educated by a few men, the Church as a whole would do it at a very trifling expense individually. With a white membership of thirty-five thousand, five cents per member at this time would more than pay all claims against the Society. How small the necessary sum compared to the ability of the Church to give it!

This organization does not propose to educate in the ornamental branches of the day, but to bring the mind under proper discipline, and store it with knowledge necessary for a practical and useful life. Intellectual attainment is a passport any where. And, as the minister is introduced into the best circles of society, it is painful to see the marked distinction made between himself and his untutored children. He may be possessed of a mind strong and brilliant, from constant service, and in the mean time look down upon those of his own household—parts of himself—sitting at ease in the deep shades of ignorance, and all from the want of means to habituate them to the labor of thought.

If this Society, with its entire plan of operation be properly presented, it will secure favor at the hands of the people. The cause of children, and in many instances fatherless children, destitute and dependent, will not fail to arrest the attention of any congregation, and set in motion many liberal hearts and hands in their behalf. And would it not be advisable for all the preachers to discharge this duty at once, and not wait until other matters have accumulated upon their hands? Give it the attention its importance demands. If proper efforts be made, instead of paying forty per cent., all claims against the Society, at the next session of Conference will doubtless be paid in full. Allow the above suggestions from one who is not a claimant.

PATROBAS.

April 4, 1853.

I AM NEVER ALONE.

In the stillness of the twilight hour, an old man sat in his quiet room. His eyes were dim, so that he could no longer hold, as he had often done, delighted converse with the past by the printed page. He had long ceased to hear any common tone, and a disease of the voice rendered it impossible, except in broken whispers, to hold any communion with those around. Often, hours passed by in which the silence of his thoughts was broken by no outward voice. He had outlived his generation. The wife of his bosom, and the companion of his childhood and youth had one by one been laid in the silent grave. For long years he had been almost constant victim to suffering and pain. To those who see in the future only one bright path of happiness and hope, whose present is only cheerful when spent in the pleasures of the world, or in social converse with loving and beloved, how unenviable must seem his situation, how cheerless his days!

I said he was alone, but now a thoughtful child stole into his silent room and twined her arms lovingly around his neck. "I feared you would be lonely," she said, "and so I came to sit a while with you. Tell me are you not often very lonely, dear grandfather?"

The old man paused for a moment, then laid his hand upon the head of the gentle girl. "I am never alone, my child," he said. "How can I be lonely, for God is with me? The Comforter comes from the Father to dwell in my soul, and my Savior is ever near to cheer and instruct me. I sit at his feet and learn of him, and though pain and sickness often come to warn me, that this earthly house of my tabernacle is soon to be dissolved, yet I know that there is prepared for me a mansion, whose glories no earthly tongue can tell, or heart conceive. The love of God is ever a living fountain to my soul, and though to your young heart my situation may seem desolate and sad, I would not exchange it for the brightest lot earth has the power to give. Seek in your youth this fountain, my child. Drink deep of its living waters, and then when your hair shall be whitened for the grave, and when all sources of earthly enjoyment are taken away, you too can say, I am never alone."

May this testimony of a devoted servant of Christ, who for more than sixty years had made it the business of every day to glorify God, and knew whereof he affirmed, sink deep into the heart of every child who reads these lines! Seek while in youth the fountains of that consolation which shall be your joy in sickness, and trial, and solitude—your stay when all earthly helps have failed. Then it will be your blessed privilege to say, "I, too, am never alone."

A LITTLE TOO MUCH CHARITY.

A little too much charity! How can that be? Has not Paul said: "Now abideth faith, hope, charity,—these three; but the greatest of these is charity." Surely, we cannot have too much charity, when it is so highly commended by the Apostle? No, not of that pure charity which is so eloquently described in the Epistle to the Corinthians; there is no danger of any one having too large a measure of that. But there is a spurious article, which is sometimes too abundant; nay, it abounds so much that it becomes fatal to the prosperity of true religion. I will give a case, and leave the reader to decide whether this spurious article is not a little too plenty—at least, in our Church.

There is a certain Circuit, in the State of ——, which I will call Prairie Circuit. This Circuit has been served for one or two years past by only one preacher, though they much needed, and as much desired, two. At the last session of our Conference two preachers were sent to that Circuit—both of them acceptable men. But during the previous year a certain "successor of the Apostles," finding that the "Methodist meeting-house," in the village of Charity was vacant quite often, asked and obtained leave to preach there regularly, on a certain Sabbath in each month. Well, when the two preachers came on the Circuit, it was soon found, arranging the appointments for the year, that it was necessary for them either to use their house of worship on that particular Sabbath, which has been appropriated to the use of the aforesaid, "successor of the Apostles," or dispense with the services of one of their own ministers at that village. This was a painful dilemma to the good Methodists of the town of Charity. Finally they "compromised" the matter, by telling one of their ministers that they were sorry, very sorry, that it was so; but they were compelled to inform him that they were unable to make arrangements for him to preach to them in daylight. That Mr. —— had been in the habit of preaching in their Church on the Sabbath in each month, and they were afraid it would hurt his feelings if they made any change. So they very kindly requested their preacher to preach to them on Sabbath night, as Mr. —— did not preach at night any how! Was not this very charitable? Good souls! they never once thought it possible that their own preacher had feelings to be hurt. No, no!

But the Methodists in the town of Charity have given other proofs of the greatness of their charity to others. Formerly they had, I believe, a pretty good Sabbath School; but they have discontinued that, because their school was in a community which was divided in its denominational preferences, and they were afraid some would think they were selfish. So, they gave up their Sabbath School, and now their children are left to grow up without religious training.

Now, reader, don't you think those Methodists in the town of Charity have a little too much charity? Surely, they never heard of the maxim, "charity begins at home." For it seems they have none for their children, none for their own ministers, and I may add no respect for them, as their pastors, nor can they have much self-respect.

Does the reader still hesitate to decide? then let him remember these additional facts: It is well known to all what airs of superiority are affected by those who style themselves "the only true successors of the Apostles." They not only sneer at our Church and her ministry, but they take special pains, even in their official reports, to speak of those Churches which the Christian courtesy of other denominations has opened to them as "meeting-houses." Again, it is a notorious fact that systematic proselyting from other churches forms quite a prominent part of their work. Nay, that man whose feelings were so tenderly regarded has been true to the general character of the ministry of his Church, and he has endeavored to reward the charitable Methodists, of the town of Charity, by trying to bring some of them, at least, into "the Church."

Once more. What would be thought of a Methodist Church for asking such favors as those granted by our people in the town of Charity. Ah! if such a request was presented to "the Church," how would it be received? Yes, reader, how?

In conclusion, have I not made out my case? Have I not shown that there are some people in the world who have "a little too much charity?"

—One word more more. If we would have the respect of others, we must have self-respect.

A METHODIST.

Life-like in Death.

The plate in the Queen Victoria's cabin has been saved by a diver; but the man protests that nothing in the world would induce him to go down a second time, as the scene in the cabin was the most horrible he had ever witnessed. He thought that he had entered a wax-work exhibition, the corpses never having moved from their positions since the vessel went down. There were some eighteen or twenty persons in the cabin one and all of whom seemed to be holding conversation with each other; and the general appearance of the whole scene was so life-like that he was almost inclined to believe that some were yet living. For once that secrecy is formally imposed upon you, it is implied a hundred times by the concurrent circumstances. All that your friend says to you, as to his friend, is entrusted to you only. Much of what a man tells you in the hour of affliction, in sudden anger, or in any outpouring of his heart, should be sacred. In his craving for sympathy, he has spoken to you as to his own soul. MINISTERIAL QUALIFICATIONS.

MR. EDITOR: Twenty-one years experience in the itinerant ministry of the Methodist Episcopal Church has taught me that Methodist preachers should be thorough business men. That all ministers should be well qualified in head and heart to preach the gospel intelligibly, none will deny; and especially in this progressive day of reading and thinking.

Our ministers must be educated to qualify them to minister successfully. I would not be understood that they must be a graduate of some renowned college before entering the work; but the time has certainly come in our history when a minister, even at the entrance upon the great work, should not only have good practical sense, but a knowledge of books; and with this preparation, it will require all his industry and talents to keep pace with his duties.

Many of the modern books now coming out upon us, clad professedly in religious garments, are deeply tinged with irreligion and infidelity; and as our people will read those books, and are often led off by them, ministers must keep themselves constantly posted up, so as to expose error and vindicate truth. I fear many of our ministers, for want of zeal and industry, are sadly behind the times, and in the wake of many of their people in these things.

But, furthermore, the time has come when ministers to fulfil all their obligations must be practical business men. They should be able to write and calculate correctly, and keep accounts as business men.

Connected with the regular ministerial work in this age of the Church stands our educational interests, Sunday Schools, missionary operations, Bible Societies, Conference collections, the sale of books, the spread of our religious periodicals, the keeping of a fair Church record for all the societies, etc., etc. For all these important interests collections are to be made, accounts to be kept, money to be received and paid out. Now, can all this be done in its time and place, correctly, unless the preacher have his book, and be able to make a fair record, and keep correct accounts? Certainly not. These interests all have a direct and powerful influence upon the prosperity of the Church, and unless attended to properly the Church must suffer great loss.

I have been not a little pained, and often deeply mortified, at the meager and miserable manner in which our Church records are kept in my circuits and stations. Sometimes a half sheet of foolscap paper for a respectable society is the only Church book to be found. Members have died, been expelled, or removed, and no record of the fact made; but the preacher, perhaps, did strike a long black mark through the name. This I suppose is the origin of "scratching" off names. Now, it seems to me all this is either the result of ignorance or of indifference as to a proper and fair record.

Every Church should have a book in which the names of all of its members in full connection should be written in a fair hand, leaving a blank opposite each name, so that when one is removed by death, expulsion, or otherwise, the record, with date, should be properly entered. Names should not be transferred annually from one page to another; but as members are received their names added to the list. Then the record would show at all times the true condition of the Church. To accomplish this the preacher must be a business man; and with the multiplying interests of the Church in this growing age, I apprehend the itinerant preacher will find out that to get up and preach a sermon is but a very small part of the work assigned him. The carelessness with which many of our preachers manage these things, now-a-days, I think is wholly without excuse. And I am sure in many instances has resulted in no small amount of injury to the Church.

I have occupied the ordinary work in our Church—have never been entitled to prominent positions, and yet in the discharge of my ministerial work not less than $30,000 of the funds of the Church have passed through my hands, as well as directing in some degree the minds, the morals, and manners, of thousands of souls committed to my especial care for the time being. To be faithful and trustworthy to all these important interests a minister must be a business man. Now, Mr. Editor, I have thrown these thoughts crudely together, and submit them for publication. If they shall direct the mind of any younger brother to the importance of his duties as a minister, I shall be amply rewarded.

Pride the Sting of Affliction.

I have a notion that the sting of all affliction is pride; it is this gives a pungency to every grievance, and makes it pierce our heart. Others bruise, but do not wound us; they sit heavy on us without, but do not gnaw and fret us within. I am not, perhaps, afraid of losing my estate; but I am afraid of losing my value and reputation in the world. I am not afraid of a low condition; but I am afraid of contempt. I am not afraid of sickness and death; but I afraid of scornful pity. I am not afraid of a plague, of a war, or a famine; but I am afraid of an insulting enemy, and the tyranny of one that hates me. Upon this reason, also, it is true what David says: "It is better to fall into the hands of God than of men." For we have no dispute whether we should humble ourselves before God or not; but the difficulty of doing this to men creates us all our uneasiness. If persons are impoverished, or sick, or suffer from Heaven, they seem to have no religion if they are not capable of consolation; but if they groan under the yoke of an imperious man, and are chained to him as his slaves, they must have the highest top and perfection of religion to admit of comfort; since the last vice which religion has to dispossess and conquer is pride, but felt all the blows of Heaven with an unwounded soul; and the reason is because the strokes of Heaven drive us to humble ourselves before God, dethrone pride, and calm the soul. But the perpetual gratings of an ill-natured, insulting man, whom you must every day see, and yet with dread and boiling of heart, this stirs up our natural choler, foments and awakens pride, and renders our misery insupportable. It is the boiling of choleric humors in our body, with which our soul is so tenderly touched, and so nearly sympathizes, that is the sting of all affliction, and this is pride. This is the fatal ferment that no consideration can allay. [James Bonnell.

PHEBE—A Servant of the Church.

A catalogue of names has been recorded and immortalized by the Apostle Paul, or rather by the Holy Spirit, at whose inspiration the Apostle gave their names to the Church universal in his salutations at the close of his Epistles. The first of the blessed groups affectionately remembered in the Epistle to the Romans, is Phebe. Journeying from Cenchrea to Rome, she is kindly commended to the love and aid of the Disciples in the Imperial City, as a sister and a saint. Here is a name that should not be forgotten in the Church, and the Holy Spirit in two of those brief, lucid sentences, which so gloriously distinguish the word of God, has portrayed the features of her character worthy of our admiration and imitation. She was a "servant of the Church," and "a succorer of many."

A servant of the Church. She did not enter the Church merely to find in it pleasant associates, or personal comfort. She did not seek the fellowship of the saints merely to promote her own spirituality, or to prepare for heaven. Not that the Church might serve her, but that she might serve the Church was she a member of it. This is a distinction that needs to be understood by multitudes of professors of religion in the present day. They seem to think that the Church is merely a school in which they are to learn, or a hospital in which they are to be nursed; that it is an institution the design of which is to administer comfort in trials, and to fit its members for heaven while they passively attend upon its ordinances. Let us learn from Phebe's example, that we are brought into the Church not as guests, but as servants, not merely to enjoy, but to serve; not simply to receive good, but to do good.

A servant of the Church. Humility and labor are implied in the appellation. We are servants hired, nay bought. "Ye are bought with a price." Humbly, then, should we fulfil the duties of our position. Nothing is more unbecoming in a servant than pride. Nothing more essentially unfits him for the proper duties of his calling. But labor, too, expected from a servant member of the Church of Christ! Are you living to serve the interest of that Church? Is its prosperity and efficiency the object of your earnest solicitude, of your ardent prayers, of your persevering endeavors? Are you found among its servants where plans are to be devised, and labor performed for its enlargement and spirituality? Is your voice heard in its counsels and petitions? Is your purse always open to its pecuniary claims? Are you striving to the opening minds of the young to receive and obey the truth by your service in the Sabbath School? Is the knowledge of the beauty and the blessedness of the Church increased by your circulation of tracts and publications and by your own personal instruction and appeals to your kindred and friends? What department of labor is entrusted to you as a servant of the Church? There is service for every one. To what position are you appointed? Have you not yet found out? Oh! on your knees before the Master, implore him, "Lord what wilt thou have me to do?" and obey the indications of his will furnished by his Word, his providence, and his Spirit, that there may be truly inscribed upon your tombstone this epitaph: "A SERVANT OF THE CHURCH."

"OCCUPY TILL I COME."

Ah! not so, my father. The world is bright and beautiful around me! Flowers breathe their perfume, and soft winds fan my brow! Let me live to enjoy this sunshine and beauty! I would rest in the tempting bowers,—linger beside the low murmuring waters,—sleep upon the soft mossy banks. Scenes of enchantment rise about me. Hope's bright fancies shed gleams on my path. Let me tarry for a season—delight myself with their charms, and be borne on "flowery beds of ease." Others may labor, my spirit shrinks from the task. Others have better abilities than I, let me watch their efforts. Others respond to the call, "Go, work in my vineyard." "I pray have me excused."

"Occupy till I come," is the command of my Father, and I see I must not "sleep in enchanted bowers." I have been an "unprofitable servant," and must redeem my time—working with my might before the darkness gathers, let my earnest cry be, "Lord, what wilt thou have me do?"

"Occupy till I come." Again my spirit shrinks; sorrows have fallen upon me; clouds gathered over me; friends have been torn from my closest embrace; earth's bright visions all faded and deceived me; pain and suffering have wasted my frame, "the world is cold, and dark, and dreary." Let me go at once to the land of peace, "hasten my escape from the windy storm and tempest." There tears are wiped away, and mourning is ended. Let me break these earthly fetters and enter upon the blessedness of heaven. And a voice whispers, "Till I come," patiently endure cheerful toil; a long life is before thee, and rough is the way, but repine not, nor murmur—the weary shall rest. "If thine eye cannot pierce the gloom before thee, raise it above. If the tempest beats upon thine head, flee to the "Rock of Ages." Persevere amid sorrow, disappointment, and woe. "Be faithful unto death," and when I come, "I will give thee eternal life."

EGOMET.

Comfort in God's Government.

Christians, here is a matter of joy for you. God reigns over the world, and although wickedness abounds, and sorrows now prevail, yet the world is in good hands, and all its affairs are under the control of a wise and powerful God. Aye, and the time is coming when great voices shall be heard in heaven saying, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ!" Moreover, Christian, your God reigns over the Church. Aye, and "Zion enjoys her Monarch's love." God is in the midst of her. God will help her, and that right early. Look upon Zion! the city of our solemnities. Thine eyes shall see Jerusalem a quiet habitation a tabernacle that shall not be taken down. Not one of the stakes thereof shall be removed, neither shall any of the cherds thereof be broken, but there the glorious Lord will be unto us a place of broad rivers and streams, wherein shall go no galley with oars, neither shall gallant ship pass thereby!" But God reigns not only over the world and the Church—He reigns over all things! Then believer, remember, He reigns over you and yours! All your interests are safely lodged in his hands! Has sorrow entered your dwelling? Has deep affliction come upon you? O! remember! He who notices the falling sparrow, will not forget the children of his love. Fear not, in the sight of your heavenly Father, you are of more value than many sparrows. All your trials are known to him. Your sighs are heard. Your tears are in his bottle and the promise is, "All things shall work together for good to them that love God." Yes, thank God!

"There is a day of sunny rest,
For every dark and stormy night;
And grief may bide an evening guest,
But joy shall come at morning light."

Number of Catholics.

According to the late census the whole number of Catholic Churches in the United States is 1112, capable of accommodating 620,950 persons. Now, the Catholics claim in the United States two millions of members. If this claim be well founded where do 1,279,059 of them worship? Is it true that their houses of worship are capable of holding less than one-third of their entire numbers, or have their numbers been over estimated? If as numerous as reported, what must be the moral condition of the great mass of this people? A million and a quarter of people without churches, without the Sabbath, without the Bible, what are they but a million and a quarter of practical atheists? No wonder that Rome claims the chaplaincy of our poor-houses and our penitentiaries on the ground that their inmates are chiefly Catholics.

THE LICENSE SYSTEM.

This outrage upon humanity cannot long resist such appeals and arguments as are being made from platform, pulpit and press. The "liquor license system," as it generally prevails, and has prevailed, will soon be regarded in its proper light—one of the anomalies, absurdities, barbarisms of our civilization. The mythological tale of Saturn devouring his own children is horrid, and yet how like this is the State which, for the sake of miserable gains, is destroying her sons and sires! A late strong demonstration on this subject, is a speech of Rev. C. K. Marshall, of Vicksburg, delivered in Kosciusko, Miss., and published by request in the Mississippi Presbyterian. We wish we had room for the whole of it. For the present let "all whom it concerns" consider the following paragraphs:

A druggist or physician who may chance to give strychnine instead of quinine is arrested, incarcerated, tried—perchance convicted and sentenced as a felon. Or if a man shall poison a stream or a well, he is dragged before a magistrate as an Infamous offender, and charged with an attempt to destroy life. The tippler is known to kill! Death is in the bottle. Poison is in the glass. It is as deadly as the bullet or the blade. War has slain thousands—wine tens of thousands. Yet, let the officer see a liquor-mixer sell a glass of death to a customer, and let him put forth his hand to arrest him, it is stayed by its shield—the license. In this case might is right, for the law says in effect:

"For so much gold we license thee,
So says our law "a draught to sell,"
That bows the strong, enslaves the free,
And opens wide the gates of hell!
For public good requires that some,
Since many die, should live by rum."

Is this just? Is it humane? Is it becoming a Christian State? Is it consistent? We suppress bank-paper—lotteries, fix powder depots out of town to secure life and property; prevent citizens from building with combustible materials; regulate tanyards, soap factories, tallow-candleries, dye-houses, lime-pits, and the sale of fire-arms to negroes and Indians, by law, to prevent men from injuring the health, life, or property of their fellow-citizens; and when all the rabbits are safely penned or caged, the same hand lets loose the tiger, the lion, the hyena, or what is infinitely worse, the destruction of all that is "lovely, and of good report." Is that tent? Is that wise? Is it humane?

THE SOUTHERN METHODIST QUARTERLY REVIEW.

The April number has been received and read by us with more relish than any Review for this many a day. Dr. Doggett, the editor, leads off upon Taylor on "Wesley and Methodism," and his "Short Reviews and Notices," not only post up the reader in current literature, but present superior specimens of elegant and discriminating criticism.

Dr. Peirce concludes his remarks on the Fundamental Theory of Church Government. Certain positions, either from their character or their definitions, may be liable to objection. The author cannot express himself otherwise than strongly. But he has done service in this article. In these demagogical times when there is such a tendency to conform ecclesiastical constitutions to civil diagrams, and to submit even the moral law to a majority vote, it is well for one such as Dr. P. well takes a Scriptural instead of a Jeffersonian view of the rights and responsibilities of the ministry, to lift up his voice and say, "Thus far and no farther!" The necessity of maintaining a vigorous Episcopacy, in order to perpetuate itinerant Methodism is demonstrated.

Professor Sasnett has made one of his best contributions on the subject of Female Education, and notices the position this subject has lately taken in public mind, and the numerous Female Colleges and Seminaries springing up. As an evidence of a proper appreciation of woman he likes this; but dislikes the methods female education is assuming. The course of studies and discipline that has grown up and become approved for boys is being applied to girls without suitable modifications. If causes now operating are not arrested, their effects will work evils upon society, and a disastrous reaction upon the whole subject of female education.

Professor S. does not enter into the invidious discussion of superiority of the mind in the sexes. He insists only upon a difference, and therefore that a common system of education will not suit both. In boys the dry intellect is cultivated by severe studies, and forced along by generous ambition. In girls the affections abound, and true womanly culture refers to their development. The lecture system suits them better for instruction, and as for discipline, home is the type. This is also a well timed article. It proceeds upon a thorough diagnosis of the male and female constitutions, and we earnestly recommend it to their consideration who have to do with female education.

The other contribution we notice especially is that on "Obsolete Disciplinary Laws," by Rev. N. D. Wilson, of North Carolina. He confines himself to the Book of Discipline, cites laws therein that have ceased to be operative, and proposes that they be omitted from the next edition, and pass into the history of Methodist legislation. Among the laws cited are those on bands, communicants from other churches, and slavery. We do not understand him as entering into the question of the merits of these defunct statutes. He only contends for the decent interment of what all allow to be dead, and nobody is attempting to revive. Mr. Wilson gives able reasons, and puts them well. He is a young man and minister, and writes on such a subject with marked deference. But his argument has grey hairs in it, if his head has not.

The Southern Quarterly, our Quarterly, is worthy. Its merits rise as the able editor infuses himself into it more and more. From Missouri to Florida, from Virginia to California it claims, deserves, and ought to have an appreciating and sustaining patronage.

PATRONAGE'S ARTICLE.—The stock in that well-deserving Association will rise from forty per cent. to par, if a candid reading be given this communication on first page.

CHURCH EXTENSION.—The Methodists of this country have built Churches nearly at the rate of one per week during the eighty-seven years of their existence as a denomination.

CAUGHEY'S REVIVAL MISCELLANIES. — A substantial and neat copy of this widely circulated and useful book has been laid on our table by McGinnis, 56 Gravier street.

There are eleven denominational institutions of learning in Texas.

LATE DECREES.—The decrees of the first Roman Catholic Council in Canada, save the Montreal Witness, which was convened in Quebec, have been approved by the Pope, in consequence of which they were publicly read from the pulpits, and have become virtually the ecclesiastical law of the land. One of these decrees prohibits secret societies. Catholics who have anything to do with them cannot obtain absolution for their sins. Another decree refers to the mixed Schools, which are pronounced altogether dangerous. All the Catholics are bound to raise unceasing opposition against them. A Catholic Normal School is declared to be highly desirable, etc.

CATHOLIC ENDOWMENT.

It is this and nothing less that the Romanists of New Orleans are seeking of the Louisiana Legislature. The second clause of their Free School memorial represents:

That while they acknowledge that it might be repugnant to our institutions to permit any particular form of religious instruction in Schools which, being the offspring of the public bounty, are intended alike for the benefit of all; still they are convinced that some mode might be adopted whereby an equitable distribution of the Public School fund might be made among the different religious denominations, thus rendering Public Schools what they should be—truly free, and conducive to the useful end contemplated in their creation.

How would this "equitable distribution of the Public School fund among the different religious denominations" work? The Catholic Messenger, the Romanist organ, lets us know that the distribution is to "proceed proportionate to the number of children." The Roman Catholics, by their sweeping methods of enumeration, would thus claim in solido, at least, half of the Public School fund, if not two-thirds of it. The balance would be divided out among the "different religious denominations," in sums insufficient for any practical purpose. "Religious denominations!" Where is the test act in Louisiana determining what associations are entitled to a portion of the School fund under this title? We have not got that far yet in the Union of Church and State.

The City Budget for next year puts down $200,000 for Public Schools. One-half of that sum, or more, would be a snug endowment per annum for Romanism in New Orleans! A couple of scores more of foreign priests might be imported.

This local estimate leaves the large School revenues of the State, at which the memorialists aim, out of the question.

It is true this appropriation is sought for under the pretence of educating a large portion of the population. But what is Romish education, as conducted by priests, but Romish propagandism? Let the Archbishop's organ define the education they propose to give in consideration for an appropriation of one or two hundred thousands a year. On the 7th instant it copied with high approbation Bishop's O'Connor's lecture on education, delivered in Baltimore. He says:

What is it then we desire for ourselves, and in which we wish to be free, when we advocate free education? The education we prefer is Catholic education. We wish to give our children an education that will combine proficiency in the sciences with a knowledge of religion; the training that will make them good citizens, with that which will make them good Christians—good Catholics. We wish to be free in this—to do it without hindrance from the State.

The State should not hinder, neither should it help in making "good Catholics." Let the Pope make "good Catholics" at his own expense. This is more liberty than he grants to others. But to bring the treasury of the State into subserviency to a foreign Prince and despot, is asking too much of the tax-paying citizens of Louisiana.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

Is the Roman Catholic Church stronger than American Institutions? This is getting to be a practical question. With singular boldness the issue has been brought on all over the country.

The Baltimore correspondent of the Delta, writing 8th instant, has this item:

"Mr. Kerney, the Catholic member of the House of Delegates, from this city, is again endeavoring to overturn the present system of Public Schools, and substitute his own plan its place. His bill has been made the special order for Thursday next, when it will undoubtedly receive a final quietus, as far as the Legislature at least is concerned. This topic was introduced into the canvas for Mayor last fall, and the supposed friendliness of Mr. France, the whig candidate, to the measure, contributed to swell the immense majority by which Mr. Hollins was elected. This special legislation to get hold of the School Fund for sectarian purposes, is universally condemned, and if the naked question could come before the people, Mr. Kerney's project could not get 2500 votes in the city out of 25,000. A large number of his own religious faith strongly condemn his movement."

A New York correspondent of the same paper, 11th instant, writes:

"The question of the Common Schools vs. Catholicism, or rather versus the Priests, which is now agitating several of the Western States as well as Maryland, has started up in New Jersey with considerable rancor. In Jersey City the question whether there shall be separate Schools provided by law for the Catholics, to be under the charge of their priests, seems to be the main issue in the pending election. The Catholics will vote in a body for the democratic ticket, which has been framed to suit their views; but it is believed the whigs, together with the friends of the Free School system, will be sufficiently strong to sweep down all opposition."

The Presbyterian, of Philadelphia, disclaims being an alarmist, and yet in strong terms warns its readers of the aggressions of Rome, and that a spirit of security and indifference is not be indulged:

"She is not satisfied with her present strength, and some of her recent movements give evidence of her far reaching sagacity and subtlety. What she cannot accomplish by direct aggression, she will aim at by circumvention and strategy. Her recent efforts to grasp and appropriate to her own purposes a portion of the Public School Fund, in various States, and to make the bishops the sole proprietors of the ecclesiastical property within their several sees are of this nature.

Both of these recent movements are evidently a part of a concerted scheme. Whatever isolated efforts may have been previously made, the arrangements were matured at the meeting of Popish dignitaries, held in Baltimore last spring, for more united and extended action. Our readers have already been informed of the signal defeat which their designs have met with in Michigan and Ohio, where the School Fund question was brought to the polls. The people have shown their determination that the moneys from the public treasury should not be placed in the hands of Romanists to enable them to establish sectarian schools. Bitter as has been the hatred of Popery towards general education elsewhere, she has assumed the position of a friend and prime patron here. If she cannot suppress knowledge, she will endeavor, as the best alternative for the present, to control and direct it. If she cannot destroy this motive power, she will, if possible, get into her hands the appointments of the engineers who are to manage it. The establishment of the school-house may serve to refute the troublesome stories which history tells as to the series of generations in which she kept the world in darkness; it may be made a decoy to entice to her embrace the youth of Protestant families, so that she may mould them to her own taste. This will serve for the present, when the school-house shall have done it work in extending her sway, and she shall, if possible, by this and other means, have gained the predominance; then the school-house will be shut up, Romanists will no longer be heard of as the best educators of the young, and Rome will be herself again. It is presuming rather too far at present, however, for her to expect Protestants to place funds from the public treasuries in her hands, in order to help on this work. She has a clear field under this free Government for a fair fight against the truth; but she must not expect to subsidize our legislation, and make it supply the ways and means for her warfare."

The School question in Cincinnati ran high in excitement. Archbishop Purcell tried in vain to whip in all the "faithful". Some of them had become leavened with Republicanism, and preferred enduring harmless anathema to a real tyranny. The Metropolitan, of Cincinnati, is in a rage because some are vacillating, and will not stand by the Church lest it should bring them into trouble, etc. On the proposition to divide the School funds between the several religious denominations, to be by them applied as each of them may choose, a mass meeting has been held at which the following resolutions were passed:

"We, the citizens of Cincinnati, in mass meeting assembled, for the purpose of uniting on such men as will sustain our Common Schools, do hereby Resolve, That we make war on no man's religion. We leave that a matter between him and his God, and will to the best of our ability sustain the Constitution which guarantees to him that right.

Resolved, That we will suffer no man's Church to interfere with our Schools; that we regard such interference as a direct attack on our liberties.

Resolved, That any such division of the School fund, no matter in what way the direct provisions of the Constitution of the State may be avoided, will end in the ruin of our Common School system.

Resolved, That it is the imperative duty of the State to afford a system of education common to all under its own immediate direction.

Resolved, That we act here to-night irrespective of party, whigs and democrats uniting as brother with brother."

A SPECIMEN.

The following extract will give your readers a specimen of the manner in which Arminianism fares in the hands of its opponents, and a specimen of their acquaintance with the subject. It is from Dr. Alexander's "Treatise on Justification," and if Professors in Theological Seminaries are thus ignorant upon the subject, what may we expect of others? Dr. Stuart is the only Calvinistic minister in America who has given evidence that he had investigated the subject, and he concludes that Arminius was not an Arminian!—

"The theory of justification which considers the act of believing the ground of our acceptance with God is, perhaps, the most plausible of any of the schemes of justification, for the single reason of the appearance of scriptural support. This is pure Arminianism, as held and inculcated by Arminius himself."

Now, hear Arminius:

"The meritorious cause of justification is Christ through his obedience and righteousness." [Works, Vol. 2, p. 406.

"Faith, and faith only, is imputed for righteousness. But the conclusion which they draw from this affirmation, viz: 'that Christ and his righteousness are excluded from our justification, and that our justification is thus attributed to the worthiness of our faith,' I by no means concede it to be possible for them to deduce from my sentiments, etc., etc." [Works, Vol. 2, p. 701.

Mr. Editor, let me repeat what I said on a former occasion, that if our brethren in the ministry will go back to the works of Arminius, they will find all the great points in theology discussed with a clearness and ability hardly met with any where else.

AN ITINERANT'S DEATH.—Rev. P. E. Green, on the 16th instant, informs us of the death of Rev. J. M. Winborn, on the Amite Circuit, Mississippi Conference. He died of measles on the 29th March. His little daughter followed him to the grave the next day. The bereaved wife and mother sorrows, but not as others which have no hope. The letter says:

"Brother Winborn was oft times happy during his illness, which enabled him to leave all loved ones willingly. He had made one round on his circuit, and was on the second. He died at his post."

THE CHRISTIAN MINISTRY.

The responsibility of introducing men into the Christian ministry rests somewhere. It cannot be lost by shifting it about. The Classes recommend a member for license to preach, and throw the responsibility on the Quarterly Conference. The Quarterly Conference may not be satisfied of the brother's fitness—indeed they may doubt it capitally; but they are his neighbors and friends, and hate to hurt the brother's feelings, and so they pass him on and throw the responsibility on the Annual Conference. The Annual Conference takes up the case and talks over it. Objections may be raised about voting "the laying on of hands." But the Quarterly Conference, which may be presumed to be well acquainted with the candidate for orders, have recommended him, and so the Annual Conference throws back the responsibility (?) on the Quarterly Conference. Alas, what trifling! How dearly the Church pays for it. How is the ministry blamed for it!

The Western Watchman holds pertinent remarks touching this subject, which with a slight alteration are proposed for prayerful consideration.

Let every one who directly or indirectly has had any part in ordaining those to the Christian ministry who have brought reproach upon the Church, ask himself, Have I, through fear or favor, become a partaker of this sin?

Among the sacred duties committed to the Christian ministry, not the least important is that of perpetuating its purity and efficiency. No man can enter this holy office except by the consent and approval of the ministry. The approval of the ministry, expressed by the laying on of hands, is necessary.

It was in view of this important part of every minister's duties, that the great Apostle wrote to Timothy, "Lay hands suddenly on no man, neither be partaker of any man's sins; keep thyself pure."

The principle on which this solemn injunction is founded is that the minister who participates in the ordaining of an unworthy man in the ministry, becomes a partaker of his sins. As a good man can do more good in the ministry than in any other work, if God has called him to it, so a bad man can do more harm in the ministry than any where else. If, therefore, a minister, by consenting precipitately, or without due examination, to the ordination of one who afterwards proves to be a bad man, he incurs fearful guilt.

If it be dangerous and wrong to ordain hastily, it is much worse to participate in the ordination of a man who is known or believed to be incompetent to the duties of that high office. Delay is commanded in order that the real character may be more fully known. If he prove to be eminently worthy, the cause of Christ will suffer no injury by delay. If he prove to be unworthy, it will escape a sad calamity.

As therefore ministers are under solemn obligations to delay ordaining until reasonable doubts of the propriety of the step are removed, let us inquire what causes will require a continued delay, or a refusal to proceed at all, in obedience of the precept: "be not partakers of other men's sins."

First, Want of a thorough acquaintance with the candidate is a good reason for refusing to participate in ordaining him to the ministry.

Second, Any reasonable doubts of his piety,—of his saving conversion to God, by the agency of the Holy Spirit, is a good reason why a man should not be ordained.

Third, A man who does not give evidence of deep, habitual, fervent piety, should not be admitted to the ministry.

Fourth, A man unsound in doctrine, impure morals, or of bad reputation for honesty or veracity, should not be ordained.

Fifth, A man incompetent to teach, either from deficiency of natural aptness, or of education, should not be ordained.

Sixth, A covetous or sensual man, or a man of violent temper should be rejected.

Seventh, A lazy man, one who has no habits of study and mental improvement, should never be admitted, let his talents in other respects be what they may.

Eighth, A brawler, who allows his tongue or his pen free license, in traducing his brethren, or seeking to undermine their influence by whispering or back-biting, is unfit for the ministry.

Ninth, A jealous, contentious party-maker, a man full of new schemes and projects, is out of place in the ministry.

Tenth, A man who does not possess the power of influence and control over others will never be useful in the ministry.

Eleventh, An odd, eccentric man, whose mind, however vigorous and well stored, is unbalanced, who is deficient of good judgment and good common sense, is unfit for the ministry.

Twelfth, A man of loose, spendthrift habits in money matters, or careless of contracting and paying debts, will very probably disgrace the ministry.

From such apostles, O, ye reverend heads,
Preserve the Church; and lay not careless hands,
On skulls that cannot teach, and will not learn.

"CHOCTAW" ACKNOWLEDGEMENT.

In the Missionary Secretary's Correspondence the aid for buying "Choctow Testament," forwarded through us by Dr. Hicks, Rev. H. H. Montgomery and Rev. Z. Thompson, has been acknowledged:

DOAKSVILLE, Choctaw Nation, Febrnary 22, 1853.

DOCTOR SEHON:

Dear Brother—Up to this time we have received forty-one on trial. No expulsions. Our appointments have been well attended. Choctaw Hymn-book is in great demand. We use Presbyterian Choctaw Hymn-book. We ought to have a Hymn-book of our own. As for Choctaw Testament, good sisters and brethren of Louisiana and Mississippi placed $43,50 in my hand, with which I procure Testaments for our Sunday Schools and poorer classes of our people. We are grateful, Indeed, to those good friends for such material help. May God bless them and all their beneficiaries. We are devoting all our leisure moments to the translation of our Discipline. If no providential hindrance, it will be ready for printing in two months, say in May. Up to date we raised $33,16 missionary money. We are happy in our work! O! how glad was I to meet with you at our Conference. Heathen as I was when first I met you in Mobile, I love to hear you preach Christ; I love to hear brother Capers preach Christ; but, these days, I seldom hear preaching, but I love to preach Christ to my people. Yours, in Christ,

D. W. LEWIS.

DEMONSTRATION IN BALTIMORE.

The Baltimore papers, of the 12th instant, contain reports of one of the largest and most respectable public meetings ever held in that city, for the purpose of an expression in reference to a bill before the Maryland Legislature similar to the one for which the Louisiana Legislature is now memorialized. Eminent citizens occupied the platform as officers, and the speeches were telling. We take a few extracts from the Sun.

Dr. Johns lead in a chaste and forcible address. Dr. Fuller followed. Dr. F. said:

"If this movement proceeded from any Protestant quarter, especially if from the denomination of which he is an humble member, he would resist it with the same emphasis. In Ohio Catholics had united with Protestants in reprobating this nefarious scheme. He hoped it would be so now. We are not all Catholics, nor Protestants, but we are all American citizens.

He then pronounced a eulogium on popular education, its blessings to the individual, its importance and necessity to the State. Ignorance is the mother of tyranny.

No one has dared openly to assail our Public Schools. But a conspiracy is everywhere active insidiously to destroy them. The report of Mr. Kerney was very tremulous and diffident insinuating this measure—the nervousness of one who tries the fastenings of a temple that he may enter and profane and prostrate its altars. * * *

This scheme was a conspiracy against light. Tyranny loves darkness. Spiritual despotism is a monster which can live only in darkness. Bring light upon it and it dies. Liberty exults in light. Put out that light, says the robber. Destroy the Public Schools, says the enemy of religious freedom.

Wherever the Catholic religion prevails libsrty is not known—it cannot even be comprehended. There persecution stifles the mind. Here all are free. But is it to be borne that the arm of Government should be invoked to aid foreign ecclesiastics in their purposes?"

We cannot even quote freely from the condensed report of the Sun. The speeches were marked by true Catholicity. Episcopalians and Methodists, Baptists and Presbyterians, Americans all, stood side by side, as they should do. Dr. Plummer, in his sledge-hammer style, ended the speaking. He commenced by saying:

"Well, fellow-citizens, is Mr. Kearney's bill going to pass? (Cries of no! no!) I think you are mistaken, for it is going to pass into everlasting disgrace. To become a part of the laws of the State of Maryland, it can never be. (Renewed cries of no! no!) Well, then, if it is not going to pass, why all this fuss here to-night? In one of the old Greek plays a man asks a girl for a kiss, and she refuses him saying, 'You shall not even dream that you have kissed me;' and we intend that the Catholic Priests shall not even dream that this bill is passed.

If our laws were against their consciences, why did they come here? Mr. Plummer continued in this strain, interspersed by remarks by many humorous and well-timed anecdotes, that kept the immense audience in the best possible humor. He referred to Sardinia, where the Schools are under the control of the Church, and out of 547,112 souls, there were 512,000 who 'did not know,' he said, 'B, from Bull's foot.' He compared the intelligence of the people with citizens of this country, and gave illustrations of the manner in which sectarian Romish Schools at Georgetown, D. C., are governed.

He asserted that the Jesuits were endeavoring to become teachers in America. Victor Hugo said in the French Chambers that every step forward Europe had taken was in defiance of the Jesuits. It is Jesuitism which imprisoned Copernicus and killed Columbus. It puts fetters on intellect. They denounce Milton and Cowper, and condemn Locke on the Human Understanding. I wonder at that—for I think they would desire above all things to have a lock on the understanding.

The pastoral letter of the Bishops of the Catholic Church in 1840, when in Council in Baltimore, was quoted to show that in his judgment the opposition to the Public Schools was then foreshadowed, etc., and concluded with a challenge to prove in public debate, at any season upon the usual terms of discussion, with any Bishop of the Catholic Church, that the Bible was never intended by God to be bound up and kept from the people."

The following resolutions were adopted by a tremendous "Aye:"

"Resolved, That the bill reported to the Legislature to devote a portion of the public funds to the support of sectarian irresponsible Schools, is a violation of our bill of rights—is based upon the gross absurdity that a citizen is not to be taxed for the public good; and if passed would destroy our system, and every system of free public education.

Resolved, That this conspiracy against the diffusion of knowledge among the people deserves the reprobation of every American citizen.

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives be requested to crush forever this confederacy, and to brand it with their indignant disapprobation.

Resolved, That a committee be forthwith appointed by the Chair to repair to Annapolis to-morrow, and lay these resolutions before the Legislature as the sentiment of the people of Baltimore."

SUNDAY SCHOOL BOOKS.

Rev. S. J. Davies writes from New Iberia Circuit, April 12. Such collections repeated all over the Conferences would soon put our Sunday School Libraries where they ought to be:

"On last Sabbath I took up a collection for stereotyping Sunday School Books; it amounted to seventy-five dollars. It will be over eighty dollars before I am done with it. Taking our membership into consideration I should think this is pretty good. Twenty dollars of it was part of the money which sister F. D. Richardson had appropriated for benevolent purposes before her death. 'She being dead yet speaketh.'"

EXAMINING COMMITTEES.—A member of the Committee of Examination for the Class of the fourth year, in Alabama Conference, suggests that the Chairmen of the various Committees should early in the year divide the work among its members, and notify each on what study he shall conduct the examination of the Class. This would secure greater readiness and thoroughness in the examinations.

The Holy Scriptures.

The Holy Scriptures are so wonderfully contrived, that although every part of them is so deep that the wisest of men can never reach the bottom of it; yet at the same time there is no point in which the most unlearned cannot understand something; indeed, in which he may not by attention gain very much for his good, and for his soul's health. And one thing that tends much to produce this effect, among many others, is this—that they are full of numberless little sayings and proverbs; so that if a person does not understand the meaning of a chapter, and perhaps knows little of all the history that alludes to, yet there will occur every now and then some expression like that of the text, which a good man, although ever so ignorant, cannot fail to understand and recognize as a voice of God to himself. And again such little passages are wonderfully suited to assist the memory; so that although we could not remember a whole chapter, even if we understood it; yet a word of warning like that we are now considering, (and with such Holy Scripture abounds,) may be at all times called to mind. And a good man, who is earnestly bent to know and to do God's will, although he is no scholar, yet in the understanding of such passages will arrive much more at the true meaning of the Spirit, than they who are most learned, and yet have not the fear of God. METHODIST PRESS.

FAIRS.—The Nashville Advocate of the 7th instant greets us in new dress. It was done neatly, and without losing time. Dr. P., on the Louisville side, gives no countenance to those "expedients" resorted to by some Churches to help their finances—yclept "Fairs:"

"The character of these Church shows is pointedly set forth in a line which we borrow from a distinguished poet:

'Fair is foul—and foul is fair.'

Certainly the 'Fair' is 'foul' so far as integrity, morality, and religion are concerned. 'It is doubtful,' says a writer, 'whether the devil ever held more absolute sway, or was more faithfully served at a horse-race, or a dance-house, than he has been at a Church Fair.' What must be said then of Christians, and Christian Churches, who seek for their enjoyment, and the increase of their religious funds through such instrumentalities? Do they not feast with 'Belshazzar,' then; and is not the 'handwriting' already against them on the wall?"

GENTLE REBUKE.—The editor of the St. Louis Advocate thus bows to some who eke out long articles, obituaries, etc., with poetry.

"We beg leave respectfully to say to some who are kind enough to send us matter for publication, that we are not quite prepared to publish a 'new edition' of the Hymn Book in our paper!"

THE CHINESE MISSION.—A friend took the liberty of suggesting a few weeks ago, through our columns, that Brother Jenkins go to the Pacific Conference! He did this without consulting with Bishops, or Missionary Board, or missionary. Perhaps some will take this as a sly wink at the style in which some things are done. Be this as it may, Brother Jenkins we hope will extend his visits in this direction as far as the Crescent City. A hearty welcome awaits him when he is ready to receive it. In these parts, also, a strong interest is felt in the mission of the M. E. Church, South, in China. The Southern Christian Advocate informs us that the collections now being made are to build a Mission Church in Shanghai. The native Chinaman who accompanies Mr. Jenkins will be no small attraction. Our Charleston cotemporary thus introduces him:

"He will exhibit a fair specimen of a live Middle-Kingdom man in the costume of his far distant country. By the way our friend Summers tells, with some unction, a story on Mister Nee Kway. Shortly after his arrival in this city, the Dr. gave him one day a fine dinner. He managed to master the contents of his plate, replenished in time or two, a la fourchette, chop-sticks not being in vogue. Dinner being despatched, Mr. Chinaman approached the hostess with a radiant countenance. 'Hope you have made out a dinner,' said Mrs. S. Chinaman puts into requisition about the whole stock of his English beyond yes and no: 'Ham, fowl, CURRY, RICE, NUFF!!' said he, with a glorious emphasis on the last monosyllable. To enjoy this one must remember that Mr. Chinaman makes out at home, many a day, with an allowance of rice bought with two cents, and nothing else."

We are pleased to see that the S. C. Advocate raises its voice for increasing the number of Bishops—calls for a more liberal policy.

HACKING AWAY.—The Western Advocate, of the 30th ult., on the eve of the election, thus discourses:

"Monday, April 4, is the day set for the great battle on the School question in this city, and before our next paper goes to press the question will be decided—'Shall the Pope rule, or shall the people rule?' Our enemies are hacking away with all their power at the tree of liberty, which was planted and watered by the tears and blood of our fathers. Shall it be cut down and trampled in the dust, or shall it live, and grow, and spread its branches to the sky, proud and unprostrated by the storm?

JUSTICE AND BENEVOLENCE.—The Northwestern Advocate has the following paragraph, rebuking the too prevalent idea that the salary of a minister is a gift of benevolence:—

"Justice is not a donation. To pay the preacher enough to enable him to meet all reasonable and righteous wants, is not to give to him. And yet the notion that it is has obtained a wide currency among us, and worked immense mischief. To pay the preacher has been most fastidiously considered language too mercenary and mercenaries for the sacredness of the subject. It has been supposed to imply that the Gospel was in the market to be knocked down to the highest bidder. It has been practically supposed that free grace, and the privilege of hearing the Gospel—a revelation of this grace—were equivalent: whereas the former, from its very nature, can be no more put in the market than can the sun or the air, while to confer the latter blessing requires the highest efforts of the human mind, and the devotion of the whole life, with quite as much at least of the "wear and tear" of the man physical, as any other of life's callings. And to require such an effort for nothing is unjust, because unnatural. To require it for a grudging pittance—mean.

"RAPPINGS."—The Philadelphia Advocate reports a "Rapper's Convention" proceedings, and editorializes on the subject. The editor thinks it began in deception and ends in infidelity. It seems they are not only impositions, but can be imposed on. The story of an acute Columbia county farmer is well told:—

He requested that his sister might be allowed to occupy the body of a mesmerized medium on the platform for the purpose.

"Is the spirit of Mary Stokes present in the body of the medium?" asked the operator.

"Yes," was the answer.

Mr. Jonathan Stokes was now informed that he might ask any question he pleased, of the benefit of which information he availed himself immediately.

"Is that you, sister Mary?"

"Yes."

"Are you happy?"

"Supremely so."

"What spear are you in?"

"I am in the fifth sphere."

"Ah! gettin' pretty well up," said Jonathan, in an under tone, as if speaking to himself.

"Well, Mary, is it is true that there is a hell of fire and brimstone?"

"Not at all."

"Is sister Sally Ann with you?"

"No, she is in the fourth sphere. I was with you when she died, and I aided her in ascending to her abode. I was present with mother the night after she died, and secretly comforted her."

"Well, Mary, what do they do with the preachers who deceive the people?" (the operator had been a preacher.)

"They are placed in the lowest sphere, and their ascent is slow and interrupted."

"Well, Mary, now you may go; perhaps they won't like it if you stay away so long. When I die I want you to be on hand, and take me up to the sixth spear in a chariot and two hosses, he continued, laughing.

The operator looked amazed.

"You see, old hoss," said Jonathan, "I just dropped in to try your mediums; but friends," he continued, turning to the audience, "it's all a humbug; I have no satisfaction and never had! I was playin' possum all the while!"

Louis Agassiz.

Professor Agassiz is a native of Switzerland, and was born in the Canton of Friburg, in the town of Motier, on the 28th of May, 1807. His ancestors were of French origin, and were among those Protestants [illegible] by the revocation of the Edict of Nantes [illegible].

The father of Agassiz was a P[illegible]ged to learn French was expected that his son [illegible] Protestant Minister, and [illegible] ancestors, would devote [illegible] following the example of his church. But Nature [illegible] himself to the service of the strongly arrested [illegible]ural History, which from an early age his studies [illegible]ed his attention, had on the completion of his academical school gained so great an ascendency, that he abandoned the profession of medicine as offering the best opportunities for prosecuting his favorite pursuits. He commenced the study of his profession at the Academy of Zurich, whence he went to the University of Heidelberg, where he devoted himself especially to the study of anatomy under the direction of the celebrated Professor Tiedemann. At the University he was noted not only for assiduity in study but for the rare talent of manejging with equal dexterity the rapier and the scalpel. From Heidelberg he went to the University of Munich who a he remained four years. Before this, Agassiz had commenced lecturing to his fellow students, and his already extensive knowledge of Natural History soon attracted the notice of scientific men and his instructors. So great was his reputation that he was employed by Martius to prepare the ichthyological department of the Natural History of Brazil, a work which gained him great credit.

At this period his parents, disliking his extensive devotion to science, withheld his allowance, but his enthusiasm procured him advances from Colta, a book-seller. Having, however, gained the degrees of Doctor of Medicine and Philosophy, he went to Vienna, where he applied himself to the study of existing and fossil fishes. A friend having lent him some money he visited Paris, and here gained the friendship of Cuvier and Humboldt, with the former of whom he remained until his death in 1 [illegible].

Having returned to Switzerland he was appointed Professor of Natural History in the University of N[illegible] a place which he filled until his departure for the United States. In 1833 he commenced the publication of his great work, Poissons Fossiles, in five volumes, with an atlas of about four hundred folio plates, and containing descriptions and figures of nearly a thousand species of fossil fishes. The work gained for him the respect of the scientific world, and at the age of thirty-four A. was a member of every scientific academy of Europe. The degree of Doctor of Laws was conferred upon him by the Universities of Edinburgh and Dublin, and he was elected admitted to the freedom of those cities. The order of [illegible] of the Red Eagle of Prussia was conferred upon him by the King of Prussia.

Since 1833 his publications have been very numerous. Among them are works on the Echinoderms and on the fossil Mollusks of the Jura, a German translation of Buckland's Geology, with copious notes, and his Fresh Water Fishes of Europe. The Nomenclator Zoölogicus, published some years since, and the Bibliographie Générale d'Histoire Naturelle, lately published by the Royal Society, are the product of several years observation.

In 1837, Agassiz first promulgated his "Glacial Theory" which has ever since attracted much attention. It having been asserted that it was inconsistent with known facts Agassiz for eight years spent his summer vacations in making observations at the Glacier of the Aar, eight thousand feet above the sea, and twelve miles from any other habitation than his own hut. The result of these examinations are contained in two works, Etudes sur les Glaciers and Système Glacière.

In 1846 Agassiz came to America, and on the establishment of the Lawrence Scientific School he accepted the appointment of Professor of Zoölogy and Geology, which he still holds. Since his arrival in this country Professor Agassiz has presented a large number of communications to the American Academy and other scientific bodies, and has published, in connection with Dr. Gould, of Boston, a Zoölogy for Students. His elaborate work on Lake Superior has just appeared in the Annual of Scientific Discovery for 1851.

OBITUARY:

"In the midst of life we are in death." These words came home to our hearts as we repeated them at the grave of WILLAM PARROT BROWN, on the 13th March, with more than usual solemnity. Only six days prior to death we spent a pleasant afternoon together. We complimented him on his returning health. As the cloud of affliction was passing over, and hope was busy weaving the web of days to come, the pneumonia seized him with a streng hand—the wheels of life stood still!

He was born in Greene county, Georgia, 1792. In 1830 he professed religion and joined the M. E. Church, in which he lived and died a member of the Church triumphant.

He was a kind husband, and one of the best of masters. He died the 11th March, 1853. May his sudden death impress upon us the words of Jesus: "Be ye also ready, for in such an hour, as ye think not, the Son of man cometh!"

DIED—On the 29th March, 1853, at Covington, Louisiana, Mr. JOSEPH D. DAVENPORT.

The deceased was a firm, consistent, and sincere follower of the Lord Jesus Christ. He had been for many years a useful and honored class-leader. The last three years of his life had been marked by an usually rapid growth in the experimental knowledge of divine things. As he had lived at his post, the death found him engaged in his Master's service. Immediately after concluding the seven o'clock Church services, by prayer, he was struck insensibly by a paralytic stroke. From the effects of which death only released him. If the dangers, difficulties, and doubts of a "death-bed repentance" had not been crowded by a wise and timely preparation for death, he would inevitably have been lost forever, having left even that faint and doubtful hope of his salvation.

TOO POOR TO PAY.—Do you take the Advocate? Don't say, "I can't afford it!" Hear how the editor of the Vermont Mercury talks of borrowing individuals:

"Got a paper to spare?"

"Yes, sir, here's one of our last. Would you like to subscaibe, and take it regularly?"

"I would, but I am too poor."

That man had just come from the circus, fifty cents; liquor, judging from the smell, fifty cents; lost from the furm, fifty cents; making a dollar and a half actually thrown away, and beggiog for a newspaper, alleging that he was too poor to pay for it!

CONSOLIDATION IN VIRGINIA.—A bill has passed both branches of the Virginia Legislature, setting apart about $2,000 annually, to be applied in removing free persons of color from the State to Liberia. A portion of the fund to be raised is to be derived from an annual tax of $1 each upon every free male person of color in the State, between the ages of 21 and 55 years; $30,000 are to come from the State Treasury, and the balance from the fees and seals attached to registers of freedom.

SIR. TYLER'S LETTER IN IRELAND.—At the celebration of St. Patrick's Day in Dublin, Rev Dr. Cahill thus enthusiastically expressed himself with regard to Mrs. Julia Gardiner Tyler:

"I long to stand in the presence of the patriot, the accomplished Mrs. Tyler, and the incomparable ladies of America, that I may offer to them the deep homage of my grateful heart—that I may present to them the respect and enthusiasm of the people of Ireland for the unwithering attachment they have inflicted on the sainted cruelty of the Duchess of Sutherland, and for the graceful dignity with which they have exposed the well-meaning hypocrasy of the noble committee."

OUR MINISTER TO THE COURT OF ST. JAMES.—It appears that the Hon. James Buchanan, our new minister to England, will not reflers Mr. Ingersoll, the present minister at the first of July next. The Union, referring to the appointment of Mr. Buchanan, says:

"The country will universally recognise the propriety of this appointment. It is fit that a statesman of such ripe experience, and eminent ability, should be appointed to represent its interests at the court which is usually regarded as of most importance. Mr. Buchanan is not without experience in the diplomatic service. He was minister to Russia under the administration of President Polk, which he conducted the foreign relations of the country in a period of unusual disturbance and difficulty, have established for him throughout the world the reputation of a statesman of the highest order of accomplishments.

CONVOCATION IN CANADA.—The decrees of the first Roman Catholic Council in Canada, which was convened in Quebec, have been approved by the Pope; in consequence of which they were publicly read from the pulpits, and have since been virtually the ecclesiastical law of the land. One of these decrees prohibits secret societies. Catholics who have any thing to do with them cannot obtain absolution at their death. Another decree refers to the tuition of youth, which are pronounced altogether dangerous. All Catholics are bound to raise necessary opposition against them. A Catholic Norman school is declared to be highly desirable, etc. The decree against mixed marriages, etc. The decree against mixed marriages, etc. The decree against mixed marriages

And I thought to myself how pleasant it would be,
If I were that quiet Old Rock Maple Tree

I lay on the grass, with my head on my arm
Gazing up at the glossy green leaves,
And seeing how bright
They shone in the light,
As they fluttered about in the breeze

They swung to and fro from sunlight to shade,
As merry and lithe as the birds
That built in those buds
And there sung their hymns—
God's praises unfettered by words,
And I said to myself how fine 'twere to be Such a stout-strong, friendly Old Rock Maple Tree

I passed it again in the deep winter time,
When the earth was white with snow,
And icicles hung
Where the birds had sung
But a few short months ago

The spring came on, and the farmer's son
Pierced its pile to gather its sap;
And to sweeten his cup,
The Old Maple gave up
The fruits of its long winter nap.
And I thought, as I saw it, how able to be
As faithful and good as that homest Old Tree.

A fierce thundergust seized the sturdy Old Tree,
And hurled it in rage to the ground;
And I saw with concern
What the tempest had done,
For I felt I was losing a friend

The farmer came out, with his axes and chains,
And dragged the Old Maple Tree home;
And long after 'twas dead,
Its blazing logs shed
Cheerful warmth in the family room;
And I wished when I thought on that Old Maple Tree,
That I were as good and as useful as he.

ZERUBBA.

SOLOMON SWALLOW, THE WOMAN TAMER.

"Rule a wife and have a wife."

Solomon Swallow was a bachelor, and a rusty one, too; but, nevertheless, he had made up his mind to one thing, that he was the only man living who had acquired any knowledge of the art of taking care of a wife.

"All the married men are dolts," was Solomon's constant asservation. "There, for instance, is my neighbor, Tom Tangible; his wife makes a sort of three-legged stool of him; she moves in one corner, and then in another, and sits on him and walks on him as if he was nobody in the house, while he, poor man, takes it as easy as though it was the most natural thing in the world. Now that I were only Tom Tangible, I'd first write a series of matrimonial articles, and if Mrs. T. didn't abide by them, I'd submit her to the wholesome discipline of bread and water and a padlock; and might, perhaps, brighten her ideas, touching her conjugal duties, by the application of it good cowhide. And there, again, are Evert Easy, Dick Snooks, and a host more of them in the same condition, but I—I'm the boy that will set them all right if they only follow my example after I have condescended to endow some fortunate female with the legal claim to the title of Mrs. Swallow."

Brave Solomon Swallow!

"Well, Solomon," said a neighbor to him one morning, "as you are always boasting of your skill in managing a wife, how comes it that you are not married?"

"Why, because I have not perfected my system! You poked your head into the noose without making any preparation, and hence, Mrs. Everly makes what she likes of you. But I go to work logically. I begin by studying the erudite works of Zingrubazo, 'On the philosophy of woman's bidding her tongue.' I then read several trentises on 'the effect of bread and water discipline in making good wives.' Shakspeare's 'Taming a Shrew' furnished me a few excellent practical lessons. And I am now generalizing all the systems into one, which shall carry the sway in all future generations, and convert the plague of matrimony into a blessing. In the course of a year or so," added Solomon, "my 'Rules for the Regulation of a Woman' (I intend to publish it) will be completed, and then I shall take me a wife."

And Solomon was as good as his word, for, at the age of thirty-five, feeling himself prepared to give battle to any woman in or out of the land of the Amazons, he got married. At this important period, Solomon was as pully, comfortable-looking a little fellow as you'd meet in a day's walk, for, albeit the crown of his head never stood full five feet from the heels of his boots, be was of proportions that would have done honor to an alderman, or even a Lord Mayor; and his gait, especially when walking with anything in the likeness of a woman, was as pompous as a Sultan's, while, at such times, his countenance always assumed an expression that could not have brooked the approach of female familiarity. The lady whom Solomon had chosen for his "better half," was apparently a lamb-like creature, so that the chances were very fair that she would not only be a tractable wife, but that Solomon would require no help from his system to make her so.

Now Solomon had the forbearance not to interfere with his lady's sayings and doings on the night of the wedding, nor is it recorded that he assumed special authority on the next night either; but about six o'clock the next morning, he softly insinuated to his sleeping partner that it was time to get up.

"And," he added, "when breakfast is ready, you may call me, but be sure and not burn the toast."

"Breakfast and toast!" said Mrs. Swallow, "why, what do you mean?"

"Why, my dear—I mean, madam, that I have begun my system."

"And won't you get up, too?"

"Yes, when breakfast is ready and my stockings aired!"

Mrs. Swallow was about to reply, but she checked herself, as she was ashamed to say much to him at so short an acquaintance; but though in the present instance she did precisely as she was bid, she resolved in her heart that it was the last time she would get up at six in the morning to prepare breakfast.

At eight o'clock, everything being ready, Mrs. Swallow called Mr. Swallow.

"Breakfast is ready, Mr. Swallow."

"Is the toast made?"

"Yes."

"Not burned?"

"No."

"Are my stockings aired?" ....

"Yes."

"I'll do," quoth Mr. Swallow, and to breakfast he went, having received the services of the blushing Mrs. Swallow to assist him in dressing.

The breakfast, however, did not turn out to be the thing it had been cracked up for. The toast was done a little too much, and the tea wasn't done quite enough; the slop-bowl was at the wrong end of the tray, and there were several crumbs on the carpet.

"The servant hasn't been here this morning," observed Mrs. Swallow.

"Servant!" returned Solomon, "I discharged her yesterday. You don't think I can afford to keep a servant and a wife too?"

The lady was again posed, and she said nothing, but the day wore to its close before she could bring herself to the belief that Mr. Swallow had actually made use of the words "servant" and "wife" in the same sentence.

The next morning at six o'clock, Mr. Swallow again informed his wife that it was time to get up, coupling the remarks with the suggestion that in future she must save him the trouble of reminding her of so necessary a duty.

Mr. Swallow, however, benefited nothing by this soft insinuation, for at the moment she either was, or pretended to be, fast locked in the arms of Morpheus.

"Don't you hear, Mrs Swallow?" quoth Solomon.

Now this was a ticklish point with Solomon, but he was prepared for it. "What says my system on his head?" said he to himself, musingly. "It says that a lazy wife who lies abed in the morning may be very properly reminded of her duty by the judicious application of a coercion pin." And this magnificent idea had scarcely crossed the threshold of his brain-pan, than he asserted the point of a huge pin in the right arm of the sleeper. As might be expected, the intended effect instantly followed the cause, for the astonished Mrs. Swallow sprang from the bed as though she had been thrown from it by an electric shock! But alas, her agility was too strikingly manifested, for she not only all but annihilated poor Solomon in tolling over him, but she dashed his patent lever from the nail which suspended it to the wall, and broke the dial into a thousand pieces!

"What a dreadful reality," shouted Mr. Swallow, contemplating the fragile ruins of his demolished timepiece.

Here we pass over the interval between this occurrence and the time when the happy pair in question were seated at breakfast.

"Now, Mrs. Swallow," said Solomon, "seeing that I was awaken to call you up in the morning, or eat burned toast, or drink raw tea, etc., it is time I should begin to instruct you in your duties."

"And what are those, Mr Swallow?"

"Be silent, madam, if you please; not to talk, but listen, is one of the most important of them."

"Proceed, sir."

And Mr Swallow, looking daggers at her for the second interruption, proceeded:

"From six till eight, you are to get up, dress quietly, so as to create no disturbance, light fire, air clothing and stockings, sweep rooms, prepare breakfast, and announce the perfection thereof. Eight till ten, wash tea-things, make beds, rub furniture and clean windows. Ten to twelve, go to market and prepare dinner. Twelve till two to devote to dish-washing, sweeping up and rubbing furniture. Two to six, spinning, mending clothes, and darning stockings. Seven, tea. From that time till nine, a second course of mending and darning, and then go to bed. And this daily course, madam, with a strict observance of the rules of civility, frugality, decorum, and obedience, may, in time, enable you to the honor to the choice of Mr. Solomon Swallow."

Mrs. Swallow listened quietly to the end; and then mildly inquired:

"And do you really expect this of me, Mr. Swallow?"

"To be sure I do," responded her spouse.

"Then you'll be sadly disappointed, for I'll do no such thing."

"No?"

"No."

"I've a way to make you."

"How?"

"Spoon diet, locks chains and cowhide."

"Mr. Swallow!"

"What?"

"You're a brute!" and Mrs. Swallow threw herself back, and looked desperate.

Now this was a climax. Mr. Swallow was called a brute at his own fireside, and by his own wife, which was the worst of all. He, Solomon Swallow, the celebrated founder of a system of matrimonial observation, called a brute, and by no less a person than Mrs. Swallow. At first he was so astonished at such open manifestation of rebellion of his royal will, that he only looked aghast; but when he came to himself, he saw that something must be done at once, or the field was lost forever.

"You called me a brute, Mrs. Swallow."

"I did, Mrs Swallow."

"A brute?"

"A brute!"

"I'll go mad and break things, Mrs. Swallow."

"As you like, sir."

And Mr. Swallow did go mad, but he had a method in his madness, for he seized the cheapest article of delf that was on the table (an old plate with a crack in it) and dashed it into a thousand pieces on the hearth, as if he was in a tremendous passion.

"How do you like that, Mrs. Swallow?"

"Vastly, Mr. Swallow; try it again!"

And again he did try it, (for he had become desperate,) and demolished the cream-jug.

"Now," said the lady, "it is my turn;" and jumping up she sent the slop bowl to keep company with its tea-table companions.

This was, of course, too much for Solomon: it snapped asunder, the last remaining cord of the little reason he had left, and he slapped his helpmate—as use the word in its most positive sense—on her right cheek; but scarcely had the echo of the blow melted into silence, ere the indignant dame seized the tea-pot and shivered it into atoms against the head of the devoted Mr. Swallow. Nor was this all, for as he was rolling heels over head from the effect of the awful collision, she piled the remainder of the tea-trays until there was scarcely a bone in his body which had not ecked to the shock of cups and saucers, and rounds of buttered toast.

Unable to carry on the war any longer for that day, Solomon gathered himself up as well as he could, and, vowing vengeance, he stuck his pipe in his mouth, his hands in his pockets, and then commenced whistling a jig to the tune the old cow died of, looking as if he could bite a piece off the griddle, without setting his teeth on edge. His good lady, too, being determined to follow the example of her lord and master in other matters beside the dell-breaking, placed another chair back to back with Solomon's, and after procuring herself with a novel, sat herself down and began reading away, as if there were no such things as beds to make, or stockings to mend, in all Christendom.

Here this affectionate couple sat for six mortal hours, each beat upon sitting the other down, and ruminating the while upon their relative position. But it must be confessed that Mrs. Swallow had the best of the bargain, for independent of Solomon's mangled head, and parboiled neck and shoulders, he saw as clear as mud, that the washbill and the crockery must be replaced; so that the reducing of the first chapter in his voluminous system to practice must be attended with an outlay of at least twenty dollars. This being the case, I might as well be hung for a sheep as a lamb, thought he, and with that he rose from his chair, side softly from the room, and turned the key upon the gentle Mrs. Swallow.

The turning of the key made her aware of his intention, when she rushed to the door, but it was too late.

"Open the door this instant, Mr. Swallow."

"Not until I have kept you here seven days upon bread and water," returned the victorious Solomon, as he went his way rejoicing.

But, alas! how fleeting is human greatness—in about half an hour he returned to see how matters were going, but scarcely put his eye to the key-hole when he began roaring like a bull, for Mrs. Swallow had torn every one of his fine linen shirts (that on his back excepted) into pieces, to make a rope to let herself down from the window—nor was this all, for upon further examination, he discovered that she had also thrown a variety of chair cushions, bed linen, etc., into the dirty yard, to make her descent safe.

Oh, chop-fallen Solomon Swallow!

The archives of the Swallows are silent as to the remaining occurrences of this eventful day, but on the very next morning, about seven o'clock, Mr. Swallow popped his head from under the blanket, and said, "Mrs. Swallow, dear, isn't it time to get up?"

"Yes," returned the lady, "and you may call me when you have lit the fire, and put on the kettle."

Poor Solomon! There was no alternative. So he sat about his work with an alacrity which showed that he had the terror of a broken head and demolished body linen running strongly in his memory. In short, Solomon was a conquered man. That day he had to prepare breakfast, sweep the room, etc. The next, his assistance was required in the rubbing of the furniture, and the making of beds; and, before the week was out, he was initiated into the mystery of washing coarse towels.

Regenerate Solomon Swallow! Nay, in after times, when the Swallows began to gather about him, it is whispered that his better half used to employ him at yet more deeply conjugal offices.

About five years after the celebration of his nuptials, a friend called to see him.

"You must go with me to the theatre, Mr. Swallow," said a friend.

"He shan't," said Mrs. Swallow.

"He must," said the friend, "and so must you."

"I may, but he can't," replied the dame; "for he must stop at home with the children."

And Mrs. Swallow did go to the play, and Solomon stopped at home.

O, hen-pecked Solomon Swallow!

Had Solomon only treated his better-half nearly in the beginning, things might have gone on smoothly to the end, but as it was, he compelled her to be a Tartar in her own defence; he had to take the consequences.

The following interesting anecdote of the father of President Pierce, and the era of seventy-six, is told by a correspondent of the New-York Times, writing from Lowell, Mass:

"Among the places of interest in this vicinity is the birth-place of Benjamin Pierce, the father of the President. He was born in 1757, in what was then the town of Pichnsford, but is now within the incorporated limits of Lowell.

"Not a vestige of the building in which the family lived, or in which Gov. Pierce was born, is now to be seen, an excavation said to have been the cellar, is still visible. On the memorable 19th of April, 1775, while young Pierce was about eighteen years of age, was plowing in the field, a horseman rode up to the door of his father's house, and delivering a brief message, departed. The family, consisting of the father, mother, and children, were overwhelmed with grief at the intelligence that the war-cloud which had been lowering for years, had burst upon the country, and that the sons of Lexington and Concord had fallen victims to the fury of the British soldiery. Young Pierce, then in the field, heard the sad intelligence, and throwing down the implements of husbandry, he ran to the house, and throwing himself upon the floor, he gave vent to his grief in tears and lamentations. His mother, a woman of strong mind, and patriotic spirit, soon roused him from his grief, and bade him dry his tears, and be a man. Young Pierce, then about eighteen years of age, was plowing in the field, a horseman rode up to the door of his father's house, and delivering a brief message, departed. The family, consisting of the father, mother, and children, were overwhelmed with grief at the intelligence that the war-cloud which had been lowering for years, had burst upon the country,

SABBATH BELLS.

"That Offspring of consuming fire,
And Mind's creative hand,
High from the sum mit of the spire
Shall murmur o'er the land.

All that his changeful fate brings down
On suffering man below,
Shall murmur from its metal crown—
Or be it joy, or woe." [Schiller.

Fleetly fades the daylight fair,
Shadows of the night are falling—
Through the quiet Sabbath air
Many sweet-toned bells are calling.

From the turret lifted high,
With a mellow cadence thrilling
From the little belfry nigh
All the air with music filling.

Clear, and joyous—solemn—slow—
Sound their voices, ever varying—
Grave, to gay, or soft, to low—
Sweetly, without discord, marrying.

Now, a full, sonorous peal,
Suddenly the silence shiv'ring,
With a shock the pine-groves feel,
Through their topmost branches quiv'ring.

Now, with mellow, throbbing, beats,
Echo, beyond echo, flying,
Till the distant cliff repeats
Snatches, of the sweet replying.

Or, with all their liquid chimes
Blending in a chorus golden,
Daisly, as the rarest rhymes,
Linked in numbers quaint and olden.

Something of the Sabbath peace
Dwells forever in their ringing,
Bidding earth-born troubles cease,
Rest unto the weary bringing.

And a thousand moving spells,
Born of hope—of grief—of pleasure—
Life hath wedded to the bells,
Till they strike a charmed measure.

With their changeful, magic chords,
Bringing all the past before us,
As forgotten ballad words,
Hoard the chance awakened chorus.

Distant, dreamlike, memories start,
With a fresh enchantment, borrowed
From the trusting childish heart,
That had never feared, nr sorrowed.

Strengthening to remembrance fast,
As the bells with ceaseless ringing,
Weave the story of the past,
Every voice its record bringing.

Till the homestead, as of yore,
Stands amid its ample meadows,
And the household group ones more
Gather in the evening shadows.

Yet amidst the lightest strain,
Memory through her compass ringing,
Strikes a sudden knell of pain;
Joy, to desolation changing.

For within that Eden bower
Where our life of love was centered,
True to his appointed hour,
The destroyer, Death, has entered.

And the sorrow-stricken soul
Sits in silence, darkly brooding
O'er the heavy waves that roll,
All its peace with anguish flooding.

Till those jubilees, and moans,
(Life's expounders of life's story,)
Change their tender, wailing tones,
For a prophesy nf glory.

Pealing in a city bright,
Of whose radiant, pure perfection,
Good himself its constant lights,)
Mind of man hath no conception.

Where no weary spirit yearns
For the peace its childhood cherished,
Where no memory earthward turns
Mourning for the loved and perished.

But a perfect bliss, alone
To the ransomed spirit given,
Tells the woes to mortals known,
From the inhabitants nf Heaven.

In the crowded city, where
Want and woe have made their dwelling;
Of the quiet country air,
And the sunny hillside telling.

On the dullest human ears
With familiar cadence falling,
From their childhood's guileless years,
Peace and hope, and strength recalling.

Whispering of the lost, who bore
More of Heaven than earth about them,
And who left on time's wide shore,
Hearts so lone, and drear, without them.

By these many potent spells
Made the world's persuasive teachers,
Often have these Sabbath bells
Reached beyond the living preachers.

PROSELYTING.

MR. EDITOR:—I have seen and read [illegible]'s reasons for not being an Episcopalian. He is severe, indeed, perhaps too much so for the cause he advocates—but not for the parties arraigned. I have some knowledge of their movements, and they deserve what they have received, and more too, unless they have entirely misconceived the rules which govern the intercourse of the churches. In proof of this take the following as specimens of their deportment. One of the parties named by Episcopos resided in L..... in this State; while there the other paid many visits to the lady of the Methodist Church three miles for the purpose of persuading her to leave her own and join the Episcopal church, having no other call or occasion, as I think, to visit the house. And all this without the slightest intimation on the young lady's part, that she had any inclination to the Episcopal persuasion.

Another. Not long since the bishop came into the neighborhood where I am residing, and found his way into a Methodist family, and finding a young lady who was not a member of any church, though her mother had been a Methodist for many years, he positively told her that he would confirm her the next time he visited the neighborhood.

A brother informed me a few days since that he had not been in Bishop Cobb's company fifteen minutes before he began to talk him about joining "the Church."

Now, do such men deserve to be treated with much consideration? Why, even the negroes are not left in peace by this class that compasses heaven and earth. I am reliably informed that an intelligent and wealthy mulatto man, a member of our church, has been repeatedly offered an education, and, perhaps, more than once his freedom, and even a gown and cassock, if he would leave the Methodist Church and join the Episcopal. True, he has had too much sense to sell himself, though the bid was high. Yet, there are not a few whose principles are in the market. I would not have it understood that success has crowned the efforts in the cases of which I complain, by any means. And we trust it will not. Still, they have ruined some souls, and will more, unless they are prevented. We know individuals who have been decoyed into that church recently, who have already gone back in worldliness and frivolity, that they would not dare venture upon before! Our people are becoming roused at this conduct, and are determined to treat it as it deserves. I hereby reiterate the warning of Episcopa—let our people beware, for proselyting is the business of most Episcopal ministers in Alabama, on all occasions, and at all times.

Some of our Episcopal friends complain that they are arraigned anonymously. But they know this mode of operation. Three or four years since a pamphlet was circulated in this State containing a most unprovoked attack upon the Methodist Church, signed by a "Presbyter of the Diocese of Maryland." And, if we mistake not, the Bishop of this Diocese is operating with anonymous pamphlets continually, which if they do not attack our Church directly, do so indirectly. During the last year the following incident occurred:

Bishop C. visited a certain town in this State, and left a bundle of tracts with an Episcopal teacher for judicious circulation. One of these was soon after offered to a young man belonging to the Methodist Church, and by him refused. He mentioned the circumstance to his pastor, who felt a desire to see and read it himself, and called upon the teacher and inquired if he had such tracts, and received for an answer, that he had not!

"Why," said the minister, "I was informed that you had, and that you offered one to ——, this morning."

"Oh! ah, yes," said the teacher, "I have some, left with me by Bishop C., to be disposed of under certain restrictions!"

"Well, lean us one," said the minister, "and I will read and return it this evening." But he was informed that he did not belong to the class to whom alone he was instructed to loan them, and could get none.

These are not the people to complain of pamphlets, anonymous or otherwise.

April 12, 1853. SIGMA.

STRANGERS AND PILGRIMS.

1 PETER—II, XI.

From the titles which mark our influence, we may proceed to some which mark our prospects as the people of God. These prospects are present and future—in the life that now is, and the life which is to come. The present title truly describes the whole present course of the Christian. He is a citizen of a better country. His present condition is temporary. Thus have all the servants of God confessed that they were strangers on the earth. Such was our great Master and Leader. For more a stranger than most of his disciples. He had not where to lay his head. His gracious providence allows us the enjoyment of multiplied earthly blessings. But he requires us not to be of the world—to remember that the time is short. The fashion of this world passeth away.

But am I one of Christ's strangers and pilgrims?

First, Then I have a home elsewhere, and I must seek it. No man on earth is without a home. No being in the universe without a place. The stranger in any land must be a citizen of some other. I am a stranger on earth; but I have a home in heaven. Aye, is not my dying body more than my outward garments. It is my lasting nature. It is my imperishable soul. That is I. And where is the home for that, but the place and presence of the Saviour who has redeemed it? This home I must seek. I have never seen it. I was born in a foreign land. But it is described to me. It is secured for me. I am invited to it. Many of my brethren and sisters in Christ have already gone to it. My gracious Saviour urges me to be ready for it. Thus do I desire not to live alway. In every duty, in every trial, in every joy, in every arrangement, remembering my home, and making all my calculations for that.

Second, Then I am journeying homeward, and I must be ready for it. I am not only a stranger, but a pilgrim also. It indicates motion, not rest. An end and object in my journey, not a bargaining and gaining in the foreign land. My daily course is a traveling onward. I am a home-bound pilgrim, traveling to Zion, with my face thitherward. Every day brings me nearer. A pilgrimage is not a rapid journey—not a race. My life is also a race. But, as a pilgrimage, its characteristic is endurance and perseverance. The furs may be hard. Difficulties may be many. Dangers may encompass. But there is a glorious convoy, and a heavenly guide. The circumstances are all arranged without me. What I am to look after is the pilgrim's mind. How happy will be my home! How attractive the distant gleams I get of it! I must be ready. I am almost at the river's edge. To-morrow I may cross. O, let me arise and wash my clothes, and trim my lamp, and bind up my treasures, and be ready to leave behind all that my pilgrimage has required, with gratitude, but without regret. Blessed prospect of my happy rest!

Third, Then I must not delay or be entangled on the road. As a stranger and pilgrim, I have little to do with what I see, except to get instruction from it. There is nothing that I have ever seen for which I would exchange my heavenly home. There is much that is pleasant; much that is worthy of notice; much for which I may well be grateful on my journey. Food for thought, for reflection, for admonition, for improvement. But I must gather up these materials, and hasten on. This is not my rest. I am sometimes very wearied, often strongly solicited—alas! too often strangely indolent and inclined to yield! But it will not do. I can give no slumber to my soul here. I must start afresh, and shake myself from the dust, and press on. I must have no unfinished works in the wilderness. As each day's journey is finished, I would have it completed really, and not feel that I have go to back over it again. Happy is such a pilgrimage! Dispensing benefits everywhere. Entangled with snares nowhere. Thus would I journey on.

Fourth, Then perfect contentment should be my daily companion. My pilgrimage is all laid for me. It has its dark and cloudy days; its miry and sandy roads; its mountains and rivers to cross. This is natural and reasonable. Why should it not be so? But it has also many bright and pleasant spots; many precious and happy scenes; many delightful and instructive companions. God has set the one over against the other. I have every reason to be contented. I do not want—I cannot want provisions for my soul's welfare. If my body is sometimes worn and burdensome, this is a small evil. I desire to sing songs of praise in my pilgrimage. To go home with songs of joy and triumph. Alas! my difficulty is never so much that my pilgrimage is too trying and sorrowful, as that is too attractive and entangling. Lusts of the flesh and of the mind ensnare me in the world, and make me too fond and not too wearied of it. Let me never complain. Every evil is transitory. I shall be at home. A happy, cheerful temper becomes me. I will daily try to gain it, and exercise it.

Fifth, Thus ought my Christian pilgrimage to pass. Remembering my heavenly home. Earnest and persevering in my journey towards it. Never entangled or dallying on my way. Always contented and thankful for every blessing. How happy is the pilgrim's lot! How gracious the guidance I receive! How bountiful the love which upholds me! How glorious the home which welcomes me!

As every day thy mercy spares,
Will bring its trials and its cares,
O, Saviour, till my life shall end,
Be thou my counsellor and friend;
Teach me thy precepts all divine,
And be thy pure example mine.

PETER AND THOMAS.

What a number of things we may read in the Bible that are not written down! For instance what a volume of character and individuality may be gathered from incidental circumstances mentioned of the twelve Disciples. The characters of four of these have engaged my imagination—Thomas, Peter, James, and John. Ardent, affectionate, impulsive, even fiery was Peter, I have imagined him to myself as a man of low stature, ruddy complexion, keen, bright blue eyes that could sparkle, glitter, or melt; his step light and quick. He was prone by nature to "draw conclusions at a jump, and throw them at you in a lump." I really have been unable sometimes to repress a smile to see how ready Peter was to speak.

His "head and heart were too near together" for him to be a very prudent man, and yet his "heart was in the right place," too. When our Lord was transfigured on the mountain, "Peter said let us make here three tabernacles, one for thee, one for Moses and one for Elias, for he wist not what to say." How characteristic! Peter had come to the conclusion that his Master was about to set up His Kingdom. He was ready to do his part with head or hands. He was the type of a class without which the world would get along very slowly. This class are convinced, determined, up and doing, while slow, cautious people are making up their minds, by weighing evidence and calculating consequences. And if this sort of people do get on the wrong side sometimes, they are always to be found in the van of all great undertakings. Luther was of the same stamp as Peter in many things. People of their temperment rarely ever doubt their own powers, or those of their friends.

That Peter denied his Master I know; but I impute that to a sudden impulse of shame, not fear. He had been very proud of his Master, and very confident of His power. He trusted that He was a temporal Prince, who should redeem Israel, and set up His Kingdom, in great power and glory. Now, he saw his Master in the power of the Jews, buffetted, spit upon, and mocked. His spirits sank; and from a sudden temptation he denied the Master that he had loved so well. How full of meaning the few words of the Bible: "Christ turned and looked on Peter." This was like water on the parched ground. This warm-hearted man felt in a moment the great wrong that he had done, and "went out and wept bitterly." I do not think Peter was a Christian 'till after this. He might have thought himself one, but his fall showed him his weakness, and drove him from his self-righteousness and self-conceit.

When the disciples heard that Christ had risen, his ardent, impulsive disciple was one of the first to hurry to the sepulchre. Very kindly, very gently, did the Great Shepherd act toward Peter, when he restored him to his office, as a pastor and teacher.

"Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me?" "Lord, thou knowest that I love thee." "Feed my sheep." Simon Peter was grieved because he said to him the third time, "lovest thou me?" He felt and knew all that his Savior meant. He needed this mild reproof, and this restoration to office. Tradition says that he chose to be crucified with his head downward, not thinking himself worthy to be put to the same death that his Master had suffered. In place of that high opinion which he once had of himself, was humility, yet courage. Firmness and a warm heart remained. There seems to be a leaven of his old character remaining when he answered the voice—"Not so, Lord; for nothing common or unclean hath at any time entered into my mouth." He did not wait to think if his Lord commanded it must be right.

Thomas was exactly the opposite of Peter in temperament. He was prone to look on the dark side of things. As a proof of this, witness his remark to his fellow-disciples: "Let us go with him, that we may die with him." He felt sure if his Master went up to Jerusalem he would be stoned, but he could die with him. This disciple is a very interesting study to me. He was gloomy—wanting in that hopefulness that supported Peter; yet he was "true as steel." There is something beautiful to me in the love and truth of those who have so little of the buoyancy of heart that supports sanguine, hopeful men, under trials.

I imagine Thomas to myself, a being of a bilious temperament, with large, sad-looking, dark eyes, straight black hair, tall and thin in person. He was slow in coming to conclusions. Naturally a doubter, he must have demonstration; and when satisfied which was the right course, he was as immovable as a rock in that course. Christ does not seem ever to have harshly reproved his doubting disciple. He knew what was his peculiar constitution. Thomas says: "Lord, show us the Father, and it sufficeth us." Christ does not turn and reprove, but says: "I am the way, the truth, and the light." He instructs his inquiring disciple. And when Thomas says: "I will not believe unless I can thrust my hand into his side, and put my fingers into the prints of the nails,"—Christ gives way to Thomas' peculiar constitution, and permits him to convince himself. He only commended the more highly those, who, not having seen, believed. Here I would drop a word of advice to Parents, Teachers, and Pastors: Remember your great Teacher and Pastor, follow his example, and take into consideration the constitutions and temperaments of those under your charge.

Thomas excites my pity, esteem and love, when I see him ready from love to die for his Master, because he believed him to be a good man. Now, Peter would have followed his Master to death, believing that he was a Prince and Prophet; and he would have gone to death with triumphant songs, and contempt of death, and of the inflictors of it. Thomas would have followed him, perhaps with a sad look, and a sorrowful heart, but he would have gone firmly to death, nevertheless. Thomas has my sympathy and admiration, because he had so much more to contend with in order to be a believer and follower of the new and despised Religion.

PHOTOGRAPHS OF CHRIST.

We like to have photographs of our earthly friends—i. e. their portraits drawn (graphe) by the light (phes, photos.) How can we obtain a photographic likeness of our best Friend, (God,) who is invisible? Let us see: Christ is "the image of God," 2 Cor. 4: 4, and Col. 1: 15. "The glory of God" is seen "in the face of Jesus Christ," 2 Cor. 4: 6. But where is the Light that shall draw this image for us, that we may possess it and feast our eyes upon it when we will? Again let us see. God himself is Light, 1 John 1: 5. He shines (2 Cor. 4: 6) with a glory that mortal eye cannot behold and live, (Ex. 33: except that glory be veiled in human nature, as it is in Jesus Christ. In Christ it shines upon all men, John 1: 9. Thus, He is "the Light of the world," John 8: 12. He is "the Sun of Righteousness," Mal. 4: 2. His Gospel conveys His Light, 2 Cor. 4: 4.

Now comes the greatest difficulty. On what shall a photograph of Christ be drawn? It is the likeness of a spirit; it cannot be drawn on canvas, ivory, silver, or "tables of stone;" but solely on "tables of the heart," ineffaceably on the soul, which will live forever. It is drawn "not with ink," or colors, "but with the Spirit of the, living God," 2 Cor. 3: 3. But how can infinite purity be imaged on impurity? Indeed, it cannot. But if the heart receive the Light (John 1: 12) there is an image formed at once; the soul is renewed, born again, born of God—shows a likeness to its Father, and is called "godlike," ("godly,") "Christlike," "Christian." Let "the Light of the glorious Gospel of Christ, who is the image of God," continue to "shine" into the heart, (2 Cor. 4: 4, 6,) i. e. let the soul commune with Jesus in His Gospel, which is the operative instrument or "sword of the Spirit (Eph. 6: 17,) by which the Spirit works on the heart, and "the soul will be renewed day by day, (2 Cor. 4: 17,) and as that on which it is drawn shall be improved, the likeness itself will improve toward the perfection which it finally attains, 1 John 3: 2.

The man who possesses a photograph of Christ is wonderfully changed. Before he possessed it, he could see no beauty in Christ that he should desire Him, Isaiah, 53, 2. Now he is unspeakably lovely and precious to him, 1 Pet. 2: 7, and Cant. 5: 16. Then he sought his own pleasure (1 Pet. 4: 3,) or at least was not ready to give up all to please Christ, Mat. 19: 22. Now he is ready to die, if need be, to serve and please Him, Acts 21: 13. Reader, if you desire a photograph of Christ, do not copy those of other men, however Christlike they may seem; for not one of them is perfect, because that on which all are taken is imperfect, very imperfect. It is as if, instead of asking a friend to sit for his photographic portrait, you were to copy one which had been taken on an imperfect plate. Your copy will contain all the imperfections of that plate, added to all those on your plate; and if yours be copied by another, this other will add to the imperfections of its own plate all those on yours, and so on indefinitely.

Young Christian!—soul new-born of God—take no fellow-Christian, however experienced, whatever be his reputation for piety, for your standard. Take Christ himself; study his life on earth, his Gospel, the whole Word—for the whole of the Bible is his Word. What these teach, do. If you find that it will carry you far aside from the path of those about you, who profess to love God, do not be startled; but look more carefully, and be sure that you have rightly apprehended Christ, touching and asking wisdom from above, (James 1: 5;) follow His teachings wheresoever they shall lead you—remembering that "every one of us shall give account of himself to God," Rom. 14: 12. Not only may you not safely follow, without inquiry and examination, the example or teaching of any individual Christian, but you may not thus follow any body of Christians however respected and honored. "Search the Scriptures," says Christ, (John 5: 39;) and God, in his Word, commends as "noble" the Bereans, who "searched the Scriptures daily whether these things were so," before they would take the Words of these honored men of God, Paul and Silas, Acts 17: 10, 11. Merely convicted sinner! when you think that in order to be saved, you have only to reform your life, and live as Christians do, so far as you can see (2 Cor. 4: 4) do not let Satan deceive you with the thought that you have "counted the cost!" Luke 14: 25, 28. "Search the Scriptures," (John 5: 39;) see what God requires. He asks all that you have, (Luke 14: 33,) and it is an excellent bargain you make when you give up all for Christ, Mat. 16: 24, 27, and 13; 46. What is all you have now? What will it be in your dying hour? What will it be at the bar of God? What is Christ now? But you do not know how "precious" he is, Pet. 2: 7. What will Christ be then to his friends? What to his enemies? What the inheritance in which they are co-heirs with him? Rom. 8: 17.

Give up your heart to Christ; and though you shall then find yourself a changed man, a new man, yet you will find that on account of the warfare that is within (Rom. 7: 18, 23,) the world will not see truly in your life your heart. They will not see fully your determined purpose; but the corruptions of the "old man" will mar the life of the "new man;" and as Satan now tries to cause you to stumble over these things in Christians, into perdition, so he will use your faults then to destroy others. But also remember now, that not all who wear the Christian name are Christians. God only knows who are tares among the wheat. For aught you know Satan may now be using tares to stumble you. But "believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved," Acts 16: 31.

NEANDER'S LIBRARY.

Most of our readers will remember that the Library of Neander was purchased for a Baptist University in Rochester. The books have arrived at their destination, and the New York Recorder gives an interesting article on the subject entitled "A Day in the Neander Library," from which we take the following paragraphs:

"Are not these books consecrated by strangely interesting associations? This feeling is increased by every hour's examination of its contents; its marked and earnest features are so in accordance with the character of the man! Neander's Library is in fact a biography in outline of Neander himself. It is no show library, resplendent in modern typography and binding. It is no growth of classic taste, seeking to surround itself with the menus of refined cultures and enjoyment for the hours of elegant leisure. It is no more antiquarian collection, rich in mustiness and black-letter for its own sake. Its very deficiencies have a value as characteristic of him. For instance, on the reception of the library, a complete collection of his own works were sought for and expected, as a matter of course. But not a single volume made its appearance. What other man on earth, after having elaborated these great works with such enthusiasm, such intensity of mental action, but would have fondly called back his offspring, and placed them where they would whisper pleasant things of his genius, and learning, and future fame? But it was just like Neander; the simple, child-like soul, which looked upon itself and the best it could do but as humble instruments for advancing the honor of Him whom he glorified in calling Master.

Equally characteristic is the absence of the merely amusing and entertaining; nay, more, the almost total lack in the department of taste and imagination—no collections of classic poets, dramatists, and orators, none of modern belles-lettres. The few broken sets and odd volumes, found here and there, seem stragglers who have wandered in uninvited. Genial and loving as Neander was, his natural level seems to have been far above that of ordinary men. Amusement, and even the recreations found in the realms of taste and fancy, were pleasures too trivial for his earnest spirit. His common, daily walk, was among the great moral interests of humanity. That burning love to God and man, which was the mainspring of his life and labors, needed no effort to keep his soul ever awake, ever at the full stretch of its powers, or his social nature fresh with the loveliest affections and sympathies. Whatever illustrated the character of a man, as a moral and religious being, had an intense interest for him. Hence, travels in foreign countries exhibiting varieties of human condition under different governments and religions; biographies of individuals in whom the religious element had a strong or peculiar development; geography, history, and philosophy; of these there is an abundance, but a great scarcity of mere literature, and a very few works in physical science.

The central point of interest in the collection is found, of course, in the department of ecclesiastical history. Here we are in the workshop of one of the master minds of the age. These are the tools with which he wrought at his great earnest life-task.

THOUGHTS ABOUT GREATNESS.

What do we mean by greatness, as distinguishing men? Greatness is rather the element in the man, than the expression of that element in this or that or the other form. Certain works reveal greatness, but do not make it. Great works are the outgoings of an inward being; they are the embodiments of the ideal man; they are the expression to others' eyes or ears, of the interior, refined, ever active consciousness of the worker. But behind all these, and above all these, in the secret mould and fashion of the man, lies the greatness itself. He is not made great in the course of life and things; he is born great. Greatness is an attribute of the great man's being; it is not something which he had not once, and which was brought to him fortuitously and by circumstance.

The mother's teaching may introduce a somewhat prepared child to the primary school; and that may prove a stepping-stone to the grammar school; and that may lead to the academy; through that to the college and the university. But this course never made a great man. Rather it too frequently trammels and mars the ample and free expression of greatness. We do not disparage education; but that of itself will make no man great. Education gives no man intellect; it may discipline and direct it according to the modes and the rules. This is its chief work.

Neither is it true that great occasions make great men. That is a false maxim. Great occasions are the necessities for which great men are the supplies. * * * * There is a something which the world dignifies with the name of greatness, which is made up of circumstances; a greatness of "shreds and patches." That kind of greatness, an altogether unenviable distinction, a man's lot in life may deprive him of; and those who have attained it, let them beware; the next wave or two of circumstances will wash it away. Circumstances are fickle, very capricious.

Of this type of greatness is wealth. The world says: "Thou art rich; therefore, thou art very great." Wealth, greatness! Of all the things called by the world, greatness, wealth is the meanest. Was Stephen Girard great? He was wealthy; but was he great? who calls him great? Do not disparage him; but things should be called by their right names. Wealth is not greatness. Wealth may build large monuments, and costly ones, too, and enduring ones; but not being monuments of greatness, their value is intrinsical only. We would rather be the dead Poet whose brain and soul wove out the "Elegy in a Country Churchyard," than the dead millionaire, whose money builds a college.

Power is an estate which men call greatness. But power worships and fears wealth. The Jew-bankers of Europe, one of whom was, the other day, berated by a cab-driver, his personal appearance in no way indicating his immense wealth; these have more power than kings. Kings rule their subjects; but the Jew-bankers bind and loose kings at their will. And theirs is an iron rule. It is the rule of wealth. It is the rule of four per cent., and immense national securities. Kings pledge to them their crowns and sceptres, jewels and all. They mortgage to them their subjects as well as their palaces and themselves. The world is mistaken when it calls either power or wealth greatness. Louis Napoleon, the Third Emperor, is not great. Circumstances took him from street vagrancy in NewYork, and from the old vagrant cells of City Hall, NewYork, to call him Emperor of France, and circumstances will unescw him in due season. Power makes no man great. Position may give him a power, but greatness never. The intelligent, unfaltering republican of France is greater than Louis Napoleon. Kossuth is greater than Francis Joseph. Mezzini is greater than Pio Nono. Nicholas has his peers. Cassius was greater than Cæsar.

Why should the world be attracted to worship wealth, and be overawed by power?

We speak therefore of greatness as an attribute. And as such, we speak of it as something that comes not to the man, but comes with the man. It is not an adjunct, but an element; not a part of the man, but the whole, the inseparable, the indestructible man. It is like the fragrance of the rose; it is like the flavor of fruit; it is like the refreshingness and refreshing quality of fountain-waters in a desert; it is like the charm of an Italian sky; it is like the wisdom of Solomon; it is like the strength of Hercules; it is like the life of man. Wealth! he who has it puts it in his purse, and a robber steals it; he builds houses with it, and fire devours them; he ladens ships with it, and the floods drown them; and he then is as poor as another man. Power! it is not in the man. It is in the sceptre he holds in his hand; in the crown he places on his brow; in the throne in which he reclines. There! what are they? tinsel, gaudiness, vanity, and less than nothing. The hand, the brow, the form that claimed them in the morning when the sun came up, may not have them in the evening when the sun goes down; and the man may be a wanderer, outcast and despised. But greatness! time impairs not that; circumstances affect it not; calumny reaches it not. Time, the "tomb-builder," builds no resting place for it; and the withering, cold glances of death quails before it. [Philad. Daily Register.

THE MAN WHO STRUCK HIMSELF.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

Jason Elder belonged to that rather large class of persons who find pleasure in the sufferings or misfortunes of their fellow-men. This is stating the case rather broadly, and we do not, in the least, doubt that Jason, should he ever chance to discover this introduction of himself to the public, will eject our classification, so far as he is concerned. We make it understandingly, however. The fault we have indicated is usually the companion of another. The man who feels pleasure in the ill-fortune of his neighbor will hardly hesitate to inflict an injury, if it can be done with impunity.

Men of the class to whom Jason Elder belonged rarely pass far on their life-journey without misunderstanding with some of their fellow-passengers. Of course, they are always in the right, and their fellow-passengers in the wrong. And, as they are the injured and the oppressed, it is the most natural thing in the world for them to feel indignant, and quite as natural to retaliate—giving blow for blow.

"The man who wrongs me, I neither forgive nor forget." This was one of Jason Elder's sayings, and a very bad saying we cannot help declaring it to be—particularly so in Jason's case, for he quite lived up to his principles. Of course, judgment as to wrong was always rendered by himself, and on evidence wholly ex parte. If he believed that another meant to do him wrong—and he could believe, sometimes, on very slight evidence—an evil purpose was as quickly born in his mind as if positive testimony were before his eyes.

In fact, Jason Elder was a very bad sort of a man, and often very troublesome to those who had any dealings with him.

Among those who were favored with the hearty dislike of Elder, was a master mechanic in a small way, named Martin Lee, who, by industry and economy, had accumulated enough to buy himself a house of moderate size, as a home for his family. Elder also owned a house in the same neighborhood. These houses were built on a piece of ground that originally belonged to the same estate.

Mr. Lee was a very upright man—too upright and independent to have much intercourse with a man like Elder, and not mortally offend him. He had so offended him, and the offence was neither forgotten nor forgiven. In more than one instance his enemy had sought to do him injury, but the poisoned arrows, flung from his bow, had flown harmlessly by him.

One day, while in conversation with one of those idle gossipping individuals, who give more attention to other people's business than they do to their own, the latter said, in responding to some ill-natured remark uttered against Mr. Lee: "I learned a fact yesterday, that, may be, you would like to hear."

"About that Lee?" eagerly inquired Elder.

"Yes, sir, I might better say, about the ground on which he has built that snug little house."

"Indeed!" Our gentleman was all alive now, and commenced rubbing his hands in delighted expectation. "What about the ground?"

"Title defective," was the laconic answer.

"No!"

"Fact. Had it from old Larkin; and I rather think he ought to know something about it."

"Well, that is news! Got a bad title, eh? I wonder who's on the hip now, Mr. Martin Lee!"

"But surely, Mr. Elder," said his informant, "you will not take advantage of this information to injure our friend Lee?"

"Won't I, indeed! Wait and see. If I don't deal him a staggering blow, my name is not Jason Elder—that's all. I always said I'd hide my time. Ha! ha! A flaw in his title. But that's just his way of doing business. I'd like to see any one pick a flaw in mine.

True to the evil purpose declared, the first opportunity to search out the [illegible] whose the property owned by Lee was [illegible] In case a defect really did exist in his title, [illegible] communicated the fact alleged. This latter, whose name was Earl, seemed at first [illegible] less; but when Larkin was mentioned as authority, seemed to feel quite an interest in the matter.

"I am really indebted to you," he said, with a bland smile; "should it prove true that there is a defect, I shall have quite a windfall; and it could not have reached me in a better time. I will have the matter investigated at once."

"That blow will tell hard, surely. I have planted it below the fifth rib," said Elder to himself, in a tone of cruel exultation, as he left the presence of Mr. Earl.

Through much self-denial and hard labor, continued through many years, had Mr. Lee been able to provide a modest homestead for his family. He had been the more anxious to accomplish this, from the fact that declining health warned him of the approach of a day—how speedily it might arrive, he knew not—when the beloved ones who leaned on him so confidingly, would have none to care for them. If he could secure a home, into which they might cluster together, he felt that much would be gained. And this he had accomplished; but the effort cost too dearly. He had taxed his physical system to an extent that produced a serious reaction; and, though he secured a dwelling for his family, he permanently weakened his constitution.

One day, in making a sudden [illegible] tured a blood-vessel, and was [illegible] a dangerous condition. This was the very [illegible] that Jason Elder made the [illegible] of a defect in the title of the property. [illegible] dreamed he, as with [illegible] knocking at his door, he found consolation [illegible] that his family, even if he were taken from them, would not be left without a home; that [illegible] very time, there was a movement on [illegible] prive them of their little patrimony. [illegible] for him was it that the veil of ignorance [illegible] before his eyes; for, had he known of the [illegible] ened danger, the knowledge would surely have cost him his life.

On the day following, a gentleman called at the house of Mr. Lee, to notify him that proceedings were about being instituted for the purpose of testing the validity of his title. But learning that he was dangerously ill, he [illegible] away without leaving any word as to the purport of his business.

In the meantime, Elder, who had [illegible] of Mr. Lee's illness, was waiting, with interest, to see the ultimate effect of the blow he had struck. There were times when, in a moment of pain, he repented of what he had done; but his repentance was not very deep; and towards Mr. Lee soon obliterated all thereof.

On the third day Elder received a [illegible] from Mr. Earl, desiring him to call at his office as he wished to see him on [illegible] business. There was something in this [illegible] Mr. Elder unpleasantly. [illegible] he could not discover, although [illegible] and ever again, at least half a [illegible]

"I wonder what he wants with me unusually, as he started off promptly [illegible] summons.

"Ah, Mr. Elder! I'm glad to see you," Earl smiled, and offered his hand. [illegible] was something wrong in the smile, and no [illegible] whatever in the pressure of his hand.

"I've been investigating that matter you brought to my notice," said Mr. Earl, and his countenance assumed a grave aspect.

"Ah! Have you? Well, sir, did I not tell it as I said?"

"There is a flaw, certainly, and a [illegible] ous one."

"I was sure of it, from what Larkin [illegible] He's never at fault in matters of this kind.

"You aimed a heavy blow at Mr. Lee, my friend," said Mr. Earl. There was a [illegible] shenge in his manner, followed by a pause. Then he added:

"But it passed him unharmed, and struck another?"

"Who?" eagerly inquired Elder.

"Yourself!" was the startling response.

"Me! I do not understand you, Mr. Earl!" The countenance of Jason Elder had become suddenly overspread with alarm.

"Mr. Lee's title is good."

"It is?"

"Yes. But—yours is defective."

"Impossible!" exclaimed Elder, [illegible]

"Not at all. Mr. Larkin is rarely [illegible] in matters of this kind. He knew [illegible] was a flaw somewhere in the property [illegible] longed to my uncle's estate, but [illegible] instance. Mr. Lee is safe, but your [illegible] worth a copper. I am much obliged [illegible] hunting up this windfall for me—I should [illegible] ly come across it myself; and in [illegible] thereof, will deal with you as leniently [illegible] ble. Of course I do not expect you to [illegible] my word in regard to the flaw. Its existence, however, will soon be demonstrated. You had better see your lawyer, and ask him to call [illegible] In the mean time, I will say that, for [illegible] reasons, I am ready to compromise. I [illegible] wish to encounter the vexations, [illegible] pense of legal proceedings; and, [illegible] you are disposed to meet me, [illegible] not be too exacting. In a word, then, I [illegible] my own mind the sum for which I will execute a quit claim to the property. That sum is [illegible] hundred dollars."

Jason Elder groaned aloud.

"If my claim to the property is [illegible] know it to be," resumed Mr. Earl, [illegible] cover three times that sum. If you [illegible] I will act in a spirit of great moderation. [illegible] If you compel me to resort to law, I will [illegible] the law awards."

Poor Jason Elder! The blow was a [illegible] one, and it staggered him. A careful [illegible] tion by his lawyer only proved the [illegible] Mr. Earl. His title to the property [illegible] worth a dollar. Glad enough was he [illegible] the proffered compromise, though [illegible] loss of over five hundred dollars!

Well for Mr. Lee was it that the blow [illegible] with such bitter malignity did not [illegible] will of him by whom it was given. [illegible] quence would, to all human [illegible] proved fatal. Not until he was [illegible] covered from his dangerous ill[illegible] again, did he learn of the evil [illegible] meditated, and how it had [illegible] head of his enemy.

His pointed answer [illegible]

"He digged a pit, [illegible] fell into it."

This declaration of Elder, made to [illegible] one, that he had struck Mr. Lee a [illegible] was remembered [illegible] connection with [illegible] less [illegible] subject in his [illegible] time afterwards, he was [illegible] among those who knew him, as [illegible] struck himself."

A broad illustration, this, as [illegible] place daily, in hundreds of [illegible] us. The evil that is meditated [illegible] usually comes back, in some [illegible] who seek to do their neighbors a [illegible] this matter, there is a law of [illegible] which acts with unerring certainty. [illegible] that is struck in malice at another, [illegible] seem to rebound. But, as a [illegible] will its power to do harm [illegible] the circle of consequences is [illegible] trated News.

A Good Inscription.

—It is said that the late Amos Lawrence gave away in his life-time not less than five hundred thousand dollars. Probably he was made wealthy by prosperity. His pocket book had this inscription on it: "For what is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?"

CHURCH RECORDS.

A [illegible] Louisiana, writing on the same [illegible] at the same time, holds similar [illegible] And as they cover substantially the same ground, the publication of one may be [illegible] attention to this matter. It is [illegible] authenticated history of [illegible] book of reference, and for [illegible] preacher in possession of the [illegible] the Church upon his first taking [illegible] coming-house, books are not [illegible] to a merchant, than a well [illegible] of the Church."

The correspondent judiciously suggests that [illegible] embrace these parts: First, A [illegible] in full connection. Second, [illegible] probationers, and the time of their [illegible]. Third, The several classes. Fourth, [illegible] and marriages. Fifth, Deaths. [illegible] Expulsions. Seventh, Subscribers to [illegible] periodicals and a statement of their [illegible].

CHURCH BELLS.

A church steeple and a church bell in [illegible] or city will often improve the size of [illegible] congregations twenty-five per cent. The [illegible] manager is guided by them to the house of [illegible]. The sound of the church-going [illegible] rouses many a listless citizen: he thinks [illegible] of church and goes at the suggestion. It [illegible] often the time of assembling the congregation, so that people do not come in, some [illegible] come early, according to the various [illegible] clocks and sun-dials. Besides the [illegible] and the poetry of it, there is real [illegible] utility in the church bell. And if any who [illegible] this think as we do, and ask our opinion as to where good church bells may be had, [illegible] refer them to Meneely & Sons, whose [illegible] may be seen in another column. An exchange paper says: Few persons [illegible] an idea of the extent to which the manufacture of bells is carried on in the United States. We were under the impression that the amount of trade done therein must of necessity be very limited; but in this we were mistaken, as we have lately been credibly informed that in the foundry of A. Meneely & Sons, West Troy, N. Y., there have within the last year been cast and sold [illegible] bells; and the demand therefor is so much on the increase as to compel them to considerably enlarge their works. Messrs. Meneely cast on an entirely new principle; but as we are not thoroughly conversant with the mysteries of their craft, we will not attempt to describe where the difference lies. The extensive patronage they receive bespeak a favorable opinion entertained for those of their manufacture.

In almost every part of the civilized world [illegible] the chimes of Meneely's bells be heard. In a short period they have filled orders [illegible] Cuba, St. Helena, Cuba, Jamaica, California, Oregon, besides several to Canada, and [illegible] every State in the Union.

High-church Religion.

—Dow, Jun., the eccentric preacher, in allusion to the exclusiveness of many would-be-church-goers from the sanctuary, by reason of the enormously high rents in our fashionable churches, characteristically remarks:

"There is a high duty on the fashionable articles of divine grace, and you have to pay [illegible] a penny a piece for a nibble at the bread of life. To go to church in any kind [illegible] style, costs a heap every year; [illegible] very well why a majority of you [illegible] because you can't afford to [illegible] at the present exorbitant [illegible] bills; and the demand therefor [illegible] so much on the increase as to compel them to considerably enlarge their works. Messrs. Meneely cast on an entirely new principle; [illegible] as we are not thoroughly conversant [illegible] the mysteries of their craft, we will not [illegible] to describe where the difference lies. [illegible] extensive patronage they receive bespeak [illegible] favorable opinion entertained for those of [illegible] manufacture.

PASTORS THE GIFT OF GOD.

Therefore may the Church ask them, in prayer of Him from whom is "every good gift and every perfect gift." The rain is prayed for, and the fruitful season, and the stay of pestilence. It is well for the Church to know also this gift of God. The following remarks are from a late publication of the Baptist Society on the pastoral office:

"It has already been observed that pastors are the gift of Christ. It is his prerogative to endow them with the requisite talents, to impart to them that love for God and for dying souls, which shall make them cry, 'woe is unto me if I preach not the gospel!' They must go forth commissioned, and thrust into the ministry by Him, or go in vain. The churches then must seek for pastors by obedience to the neglected command, 'Pray ye the Lord of the harvest, that he will send forth laborers into his harvest.' He honors those who honor him, and will grant to humble and earnest prayer, blessings which he will curse the prayerless by withholding. Most churches attach but a trifling value to this gift, if we may judge from their few, inkowarm prayers for it. How seldom, either at the family altar, or in public, do we hear heart-felt, agonising petitions for this inestimable blessing; and, yet, can the Christian, or the church who neglects it, escape the charge of sinful indifference to the wants of a lost world, and to the command of the Lord?"

ARRIVAL OF BISHOP SOULE.

It will be cause of gratitude with the Church here and in the Atlantic States, as also to the numerous friends of Bishop Soule, to learn that he has accomplished the laborious and perilous journey to California, and arrived among us in fine health and spirits.

He came up on the Pacific Mail Steamship Company's steamer California, which arrived in this port at 5 o'clock P. M. on Thursday last.

We have never seen the Bishop in better health, and though always cheerful and deeply interested in the great work committed to his charge, we think he comes to us with these greatly augmented by his large and well-based views of the character and importance of our country.

We hail his visit with inexpressible pleasure—as the precursor of good things to come—and venture an expression of our strong hope that he may find it practicable and agreeable to himself to remain with us during the coming Conferenos year. Nothing, in our humble opinion, would so much contribute to the prosperity of the Church.

The Bishop was to have preached in Wesley Chapel of this city on Sabbath morning last, but was prevented by an incessant and heavy rain. Notwithstanding the rain, however, and almost impossibility of climbing the hill to the Church, quite a number of persons were in attendance at the hour. As the appointment was transferred to the coming Sabbath, there will be a crowded audience to hear the Word of Life from this distinguished and venerable minister of the Gospel.

As it will doubtless be a matter of pleasing interest to many, we take tha occasion to state that he is now about seventy-two years old, has been a regular itinerant preacher fifty-four years, and a laborioue Bishop, travelling from Maine to Texas, and from the extreme Northwestern borders of the United States and Territories to the coast of the Gulf of Mexico, near thirty years. [Christ. Observer, California, March 30.

Invitation to Bishop Soule.—We notice that the lower branch of the California Legislature has adopted a resolution requesting our venerable Bishop Soule to preach in the State Capital at such time as may suit his convenience. The Bishop duly appreciates this token of respect shown him by the above-mentioned branch of our State Government, and authorizes us to say that he intends visiting the Capital, and will take pleasure in complying with the above request. The gentlemanly Clerk of the House has officially informed Bishop Soule of the adoption of the resolution. [Ibid.

Acknowledgment.—The following remittances, made through Rev. W. P. Miller, of Crawford Circuit, Ala., have been received: $5,00 for German Missions, and $5,00 for general Missions.

The birth of another Prince is the "peculiar event," that forms the topic of remark in the last English papers. Her Majesty's loyal subjects seem to be in ecstacies at this addition to the Royal household, which now numbers eight in all—four sons and four daughters. The London Times thus announces the "happy event:"

"The intelligence which it is our pleasing duty to publish this day will be received with satisfaction by the nation which has been so long happy and prosperous under the rule of Queen Victoria. At ten minutes after one o'clock yesterday the Queen was delivered of a Prince in the presence of the usual officers of State. Her Majesty and the infant Prince are both doing well. It has pleased Providence to bless Queen Victoria with so numerous an issue that tha event can scarcely be received as one of great political importance. Tha succession to the Throne was already secure in the direct line of the present Sovereign, unless, indeed, more than ordinary calamity should fall on the Royal house. But we may be permitted to hope that this fresh addition to the family of a lady as distinguished for her domestic virtues, as exalted in her station, may bring with it comfort and happiness. It is a grand thing for the Monarch of this country that amidst shaken crowns and falling loyalty, she alone sits securely enthroned in the hearts of her people. The event which brings fresh happiness to her heart will be felt as a private joy by every fireside, where English is spoken, in every quarter of the habitable globe."

How particularly it is all told. Tha very time of the day it took place, to a minute! In the "presence," too, of the usual officers of State! Then, as the New York Express says, and over the complacent jubilation of the editor, about the "grand thing" for the monarch of that country, and say if the Times editor was not in the very best of good humor when he penned the announcement. Brother Jonathan tenders his compliments to Her Majesty on the interesting occasion, accompanied by tha wish that, in her capacity as sovereign of a great nation, she will live up to every other divine injunction as well as she has to that one which bids her multiply and replenish the earth.

LECTURES OF GAVAZZI.

This eloquent Italian padre is driving a powerful crusade against the Papacy. The latest intelligence is that he is lecturing to immense audiences in Baltimore, and making a sensation. We regard his visit to American as well timed, and hope he will not fail of visiting New Orleans. Under suitable heads we present some extracts from his second and third lectures in the Tabernacle, of New York:

WARNING TO AMERICA!

"There are in Europe but three free countries—Belgium, Sardinia and England. In each of these the Pope is brewing trouble. Belgium is menaced with interdiction on the question of the schools; Sardinia is agitated on account of its Siccardi law; England, as a reward for Catholic emancipation, is menaced with the spiritual war of Popery, and a coalition of despotic Powers backing the Pope and profiting by the discord which his priesthood may scatter through the land. Men of profound sense now comprehend the certain result of fostering a viper and fattening the reptile. The Americans had better look to their particular position in this respect; for history is written for the instruction of man. America is young; England was once young; and Italy also—they then feared not Popery. But now Jesuits venture to plot; they dare to boast that they are strong; they look forward to a future triumph in England.

Let Protestants preserve their purity. Let them look out watchfully for the Pope's emissaries in America. Let Americans recollect that what the Pope loses in Italy he expects to gain here. Therefore, the shortest way, the only way, is to get rid of Popery altogether. The spiritual is upheld by the temporal power—there is no distinction between Pope and King in temporal matters."

PETER'S SUPREMACY.

"We must now examine and see whether there exists a spiritual supremacy of the Pope—see if St. Peter was appointed head of the Church, and if Pope Pio Nino is the successor of St. Peter, and if the early Christians acknowledged the supremacy of the Pontiff of Rome. We will proceed, therefore, by the Divine Book of God, and by history.

Now, was there any spiritual supremacy among the Apostles? 'Yes,' say some, 'because Christ said to Peter, "I give to you the key of heavon,' therefore St. Peter received the power of the key.' Christ said to the Apostles, 'Go and preach the Gospel to every creature.' Therefore, to obtain eternal salvation it is only necessary to preach and obey the word of God; and therefore the key of Heaven is the word of God. But this preaching of the word of God was not given exclusively to Peter, but to all the Apostles in the same way. And in the words of Christ, after his resurrection, 'Go and preach the Gospel to every creature,' is also equally a command to all the Apostles. Peter was of rather an impetuous nature—a sort of an Italian Apostle—desirous of being first, of preceding the others. But no special prerogatives were given to him; and therefore we have no supremacy at all for Peter in the Gospel. After having received the Holy Ghost, Peter spoke first, but this also was owing to the impetuosity of his nature. Throughout the New Testament we have no evidence of the supremacy of Peter."

"UPON THIS ROCK, ETC."

"But the main point of support used by the believers in this supremacy is founded on a verse in the XVIth Chapter of Matthew: 'And I say also unto thee, Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it.' I maintain that in this text Peter is not the nominative, and not the capital name. Now I will try practically to prove my proposition. Suppose that upon Peter you have built the Church of Christ, and therefore the foundation of the present Popish Church is really Peter. But Peter was a man! If the Church was built upon Peter, the present Church of Rome is no more a Divine Church, but is a human Church; because the Divine Church is built upon Christ. [Applause.] In the same XVIth Chapter of Matthew Peter is called by Christ, 'Satan.' If the Church of Rome is built upon Peter, it is a Satanical Church. [Laughter.] Thirdly, Peter was a perjurer to Christ, because he denied him three times. If the Church of Rome is built upon Peter, it is a perjured Church to have denied Christ. If, however, they prefer to have Peter instead of Christ, let them do so. As for me, I prefer to have Christ as the foundation of the Church to which I belong. [Applause.]

Now, what is this rock? "Upon this rock I will build my Church." What is this rock? According to the Council of Trent, and the creed of Pius IV, the Church of Rome received the Scriptures according to the interpretation of the Fathers. Now, what is the rock, in the estimation of the old Fathers? I cannot, of course, now occupy the time necessary to quote all the evidence on this head.

We have one example in St. Hilary, who says that the building of the Church upon this rock, is merely as Peter's confession. This faith is the foundation of the Church. After him St. Ambrose said: 'The foundation of the Church is the faith of St. Peter.' Therefore, according to the Fathers of the Church, the 'rock' of the XVIth Chapter of Matthew, is the faith of Peter. Therefore the Church of Rome is not built upon Peter, but upon the faith of Peter. The rock is Christ himself. He is the chief corner-stone. Christ meant to convey this idea to Pater:

I shall build you, Peter, upon myself, and not myself upon you, Peter."

ST. PETER'S CHAIR.

"Now, as to the Chair of St. Peter at Rome. I think I can prove that a humbug. I have now in my possession a document written by the celebrated traveler Champollion—a document which enables me to speak with the utmost confidence, without apprehension of being told, 'you lie!' wherein he says he has thoroughly examined into the whole history of this Chair, at Rome, and he is confident that it belongs to the fifth century, because its architecture was not yet discovered in the age of Augustine. He says he has no doubt but that it was the property of some Consular man of the fifth century. Therefore Peter never sat in it, as it was not made till five hundred years after his death! This is a mathematical demonstration." [Applause.]

THE BOASTED UNITY.

"True, the Papists themselves claim to be the only Church that is united—say that the Protestants are not united. But what kind of unity is there in the Roman Catholic Church? If they speak of unity in dogma, I would ask them if Protestants are not also here united? If they are united in regard to the unity of God, and the incarnation of Christ, we are also here united. What kind of unity can the Roman Catholic Church produce that is not enjoyed in the Protestant Church? Where there are ten differences among Protestants, there are ten thousand differences among Catholics. But there are no material differences existing among believers in the Protestant religion. Bacon says that the water of the sea, when agitated by storms, appears dark and turbid; but that after the storm has passed away, the waters become calm and placid again, and appear clearer and brighter than before. So it is with all the little differences which may come up between members of the Protestant Church. But the differences in the Church of Rome are far more serious; they are differences for war—not for moral war, but for a war of hatred and malignity. Papists enjoy two unities; first, the unity of the Hierarchy—or a unity of despotism; and, secondly, a unity of strength in lies. [Applause.] In this respect, it is true, Papists are united. They have, first, a unity of slavery; and, secondly, a unity of impostures. Between priests and friars there is a perpetual war. The priests constitute a spiritual clergy, and the friars a secular clergy; and between them there is the same unity as between dogs and cats. [Laughter.] The Monastical Orders have introduced into the Church great disunion and differences in doctrines and teachings. Each one of the monastical institutions has a separate and peculiar school. There is the Dominical School, and the Augustin School, the Barnabite School, and the Bernardian School, the Carmelite School, and the Jesuit School. And this is the union in the Roman Catholic Church! The Dominicans look very severely and indignantly upon Franciscans; and in their turn the Franciscans are equally bitter against the Carmelites, and the Carmelites against the Augustins, and the Augustins against the Jesuits. And as there are many different kinds of cloaks in that Church, so also the heart is different." [Applause.]

THE USE OF MONEY.

"In my Italy we have hundreds of priests and monks. The infidelity of some of my countrymen comes from this great army of priests and monks. In the Roman States it is thought that the clergy possesses one hundred millions dollars. The richest people in this country belong to monks, who rob society to dress themselves. And now remember what I say. These monks come here to America. They cannot live here without money. I remember we sent from Italy 35,000 francs to support a Jesuitical School somewhere in the vicinity of New York. Now, if these Jesuits get a little stronger here, they will support themselves. After the arrival of Cardinal Wiseman in England, he obtained from dying Catholics £200,000 sterling. Jesuits work for this maxim: 'Obedience—blind obedience—passive obedience;' they also work for a definite end—the destruction of Protestantism. Jesuits ruined Spain, Portugal, France, Italy; and they will ruin America if they are allowed to flourish here. It is impossible for them to support your Republican Government. These Jesuits work against all Republican and Constitutional Governments. They uphold and work for tyranny and despotism, and therefore it is that the tyrant of Austria is a great friend of the Jesuits. In America you do not know how steadily and insidiously they work. They come here very simple, and humble in their appearance, but they greatly deceive you in their influence."

LOOK OUT FOR JESUITS!

"Woe to the people in the midst of whom the Jesuits flourish, and found churches and colleges! That people cannot but perish! I want no theories; I have facts more than enough to convince any one who will open his eyes and look. The Jesuits have ruined Spain, Portugal, Mexico, France, Italy, and they will ruin America if the Americans suffer them to get a footing in the land. [Applause.]

Woe to the nation in which the Jesuits prosper, for the people must soon become their slaves! Neither science, nor belles-lettres, nor commerce, nor nationality, can exist under the withering shade of Jesuitism.

Nowhere can Popery exist except in darkness, ignorance, and superstition. We have found it in Italy. The first word of liberty uttered in 1847 was 'Fuori i Gesuiti!' (Out with the Jesuits!) and then they left Italy, taking the road to England and America, leaving behind a few in disguise to sow the dragon's teeth of discord. Now Austria protects the Jesuits as the tools by which she hopes to effect more mischief to the human race than she can accomplish by means of her hundreds of thousands of armed warriors.

I speak not now for Italy. It is in the interest of America that I speak. If you wish your children to be uncorrupted look sharp after the Jesuits and keep them at arm's length. Would to God that America would perceive her danger! Would to God that America would listen to me, and learn what is the pestilence most to be feared by man!" [Applause.]

Extracts from Correspondance.

Last week having been one of unusual interest to us over here, we have thought, perhaps, a plain statement of facts might be of some degree of interest.

On Sabbath evening having presented to our congregation the subject, "The way of transgressors is hard," we discovered from the solemnity and interest manifested that the truth had at least arrested the attention, and we hoped had made a permanent impression; so, guided by the rule, "to be instant in season, and out of season," an opportunity was extended to those who felt disposed, to kneel for prayer. None knelt; but the evidences of deep conviction were manifest in the countenances of many. Having closed, we repaired to our room weary by the day's labor's, with the pleasant assurance of having done duty; but had scarcely become seated before a brother entered with a request to go and pray with some penitents. We found upon arrival that the Lord had already done the work, and our souls were made glad in sweetly sympathising with a converted soul.

On the next day we learned that another had gone home from Church, the night previous deeply convicted, and also experienced the pardoning love of God.

These evidences of the willigness of God to work among the people inspired us with new courage, and a series of night meetings was begun which resulted in the conversion of four persons, all of whom have attached themselves to the Church, and bid fair to be good members.

The most exciting incident connected with our meeting was the conversion of a Catholic, a young lady who had fortunately, for some time past, been living with Methodist families, and thus received correct notions of religious truth. The news of her conversion soon reached the ears of her mother, who resolved to undo what, to use her own language, the devil had done for her daughter. She took her home, locked her up in a room, and demanded of her to tell what was the matter with her. With all the simplicity and candor of a newly converted soul, and obedient child, she told her all, stating that she "never felt so happy when the priest pardoned her sins, as when, by faith in Christ, she experienced God's pardoning love." This simple statement seemed to change all the feelings of a mother into those of a demon; her daughter knowing the ungoverable rage of her mother, when once aroused, lost no time in seeking protection elsewhere. She was followed up by her inhuman mother, and most cruelly beaten, until as the only resort, a warrant was issued, the old lady arrested and made fast in the calaboose.

On the following morning, through respect for her age and with fair promises to cause no further disturbance, she was set at liberty. But, faithless to her pledges, the following evening she entered the Church, during service, rushed towards the altar, and had nearly laid hands upon her daughter, but was prevented and put out of the house. We still continued our exercises for some considerable time, though somewhat disturbed by the confusion and loud noises of voices without. Upon passing out of the Church, as we had suspected, a crowd was at the gate, headed by this Catholic mother, impatiently awaiting to seize upon the innocent girl; but they failed in getting hold of her. Still untiring in the accomplishment of their object, they rallied again before the house where the object of their persecution had gone; and there, like wild beasts, they howled and raved, thinking by boisterous oaths and threats to prove successful; but, finally, through the timely presence of policemen, the crowd was dispersed.

Since then reports of a very serious nature have become prevalent—such as burning down the church, raising a mob to have revenge, etc.

Mr. Editor, if these be these practical workings of the Holy Catholic religion among that numerous class who throng our streets, where, we ask, is security that unmolested we may worship "the God of our fathers?" Should not freemen take a stand against such priestly fear, which is dreaded more by their slavish adherents, than the penalties attached to the laws of the land? Many doubtless would attend our churhes, receive instruction, and renounce their errors, but they dare not do it.

CATHOLIC EDUCATION—The Beginning of the End.

The Chicago Tablet (Catholic paper) of a late date gives an article from which we make a few extracts which are well worth consideration: [Baltimore Clipper.

While the thoughts and efforts of our fellow-citizens of the City of God throughout the country—and no where more zealously and effectually than in the neighboring diocese of Michigan—are occupied with the momentous subject of Catholic education, and while they are protesting, in the face of the brow beating and menaces of the Pope, and the gross misrepresentations and obloquy of infidels and seducers, against the injustice of the State school taxation, it will not be deemed impertinent in us, we trust, to pen a short editorial homily on the subject of education, for the benefit of our readers and fellow Catholics in the Prairie Diocese.

Parents must first come to feel the dangers of the Godless schools so profoundly as to forego with alacrity all the apparent advantages they afford, and to dream no more of consigning their offspring to those nurseries of heathenism, vice and crime, than they would of casting their children into some Ganges, or beneath some car of Juggernaut, or immolating them to some grim and bloody Molook, or making them over, soul and body, for time and eternity, to the Devil.

We may return in a future article to the discussion of this latter point of our subject; but at present we have to do with the question whether a Catholic parent can permit his children to receive the State school instruction, without becoming accessory to, if not the very principal in spiritual murder. It may be that there are Catholics—we fear there are—here and elsewhere—who have not settled this question satisfactorily to themselves; or, who, carried away by a miserable parental ambition that would sooner expose children to tha most certain loss of faith, than sacrifice one iota of their earthly prospects, balancing the chances of a respectable estate for the offspring in future life, against the probabilities of unending misery beyond the grave. If these remarks should arrest tha attention of any such, we beg that those of the former class will take the proper steps to come to a decision in the premises by consulting their pastor or some other ecclesiastical authority, and that those of the latter class will cease to call themselves by so ridiculous misnomer as that of Catholics and Christian parents, and will style themselves, what they really are, heathens, minus all the natural virtues and all the religious instincts which the heathens possess.

If any Catholic hitherto ignorant of duty in the matter, be desirous to know whether he can with a good conscience patronize infidel schools, he need only say one word to his pastor, and he will be informed that the voice of Pater has been heard again and again in thunder tones condemning, denouncing and anathematising the whole scheme of mixed or godless education, and its founders and abettors. There is no mistake about this. The trumpet of the Vatican gives no uncertain sound; and the Prince of the Apostles speaks with no double stammering tongue. Peter has spoken; and that voice of solitude, vigilance and authority has flown across the loud sounding waves of seas and oceans, and been echoed heartily by the assembled hierarchy of the United States, as well as by the Bishops individually speaking from the pulpit and through the Press.—Catholic Bishops, Pastors, Journalists writing with the general approbation of Bishops, have agitated the question from one end of the land to the other, until now there is hardly an excuse for ignorance on the subject.

If your son or your daughter is attending a State school, you may be as certain that you are violating your duty as a Catholic parent, and conducing to the everlasting anguish and despair of your child, as if you could take your oath of it! You ought not to be able to rest an instant, to bargain, labor, recreate, eat, drink, sleep with common comfort, until you have removed your child from that proximate occasion of spiritual ruin in which, perhaps ignorantly, perhaps thoughtlessly, you have placed him. Do you wish him to be a reputable member of society; a comfort and a prop to your old age; an honor to your name; but above all, a Catholic man, and an heir of Heaven? Take him away from that school. Perhaps he has been too long there already. Perhaps he has already contracted habits of vice, or infidel principles, which he will carry to his grave, and into the endless world beyond.

Take him away. Let him rather never know how to write his name, or spell his way through the plainest paragraph of a newspaper, or perform the simplest calculation, than become the bond and chained slave of Satan, than rise up at the last dread day of accounts to curse you in all the unavailing repentance and bitterness of final despair. Take him away if you do not wish your bed of death to be tormented with the spectre of a soul which God has given you as a sacred trust surrendered to the great enemy of mankind. Take him away, and let him be a boor, a hewer of wood and drawer of water; let him incur the scorn of the enlightened age; let him be accounted by lettered infidels and heathens only an ignorant Papist, rather than incur the anger of God and the loss of his soul. Take him away, let what will be the consequence.

METHODIST PRESS.

State of the Church.—Happy are we to find the editor of the Northern Christian Advocate of the 13th instant, ceasing awhile from agitation and inditing such healthful passages as these. From our heart we say, Amen, and Amen!

"From the numerous revival notices which have appeared in our columns for a few months past, it will naturally be inferred that the cause of religion is prosperous in this region. Many thousands have been converted and added to the Church, and the good work is still going on. So far as we can learn there is scarcely a Church or congregation which is not holding its own, and in most cases a decided advance is perceptible. New church edifices are springing up in places heretofore obscure and unimportant, and old ones are vamped over new, or rebuilt with enlarged and improved accommodations. Sunday Schools, Missionary and Bible Societies, religious literature, ministerial support, and a thousand other things connected with the progress of the gospel, are receiving increased attention. We mark those indications, not only because they are peculiarly grateful at this juncture when the evangelical forces of Protestantism are so much needed to counteract both our own natural depravity and the superstitions of the Old World which are drifting in upon us at a fearful rate, but because they clearly reveal the great law of progress by which the Church is to 'win its widening way' to final victory. Every genuine revival is a miniature conquest: it developes the order of God in subjugating men to his authority—in establishing his kingdom. Such instances of his power need only to be multiplied to revolutionize this fallen world.

The efficient cause of this work is no secret. The word of God faithfully preached and applied by the Holy Spirit, is the grand agency. Men could have no success in this work, were it not that supernatural truth and supernatural influence combine to make their labors effectual. It is emphatically the work of God. Each instrument employed in it has felt more forcibly than words can express, his own incompotency, and has known full well the meaning of this scripture: 'Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of hosts.' All have rejoiced in the evidently divine character of the work, and been glad to hide themselves behind the Cross—all have undoubtedly felt that their weakness was, so to speak, one of the necessary conditions of its performance, as is more than intimated by the Apostle: 'We have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of us.'

While revivals of this spiritual character are frequent in the Church; while ministers and members aim at the conversion of souls, not by 'the intervention of a sacrament,' but by an application of the word of God to the conscience—we have hope. The fruits of such precious awakenings are to the ministry the only indisputable seal of apostleship, and to the membership they constitute one of the best evidences of adoption. The people whom God thus blesses, are blessed indeed, and it is not in the power of jealous, unobartable rivals to curse them."

What Gold is Coming To.—The North American Review has an elaborate article on the production of gold and silver, in which the writer thinks it but the exercise of ordinary caution to assume that "the annual supply of the precious metals will not fall below a hundred millions of dollars for many years, and that in a quarter of a century this supply will depreciate money to one-half or one-third its present value."

Ireland—the Exodus.—The daily increasing drain of the population is beginning to reset upon the labor market, and, almost for tha first time in the annals of the working classes, the fears of a scarcity of hands to till the soil form the staple complaint of nearly all the Irish provincial journals. Already wages have advanced to a scale hitherto undreampt of by the peasantry, and, in some instances, offers to triple and even quadrupla the ordinary rates, have failed to satisfy the demands of the laborers, or induce them to remain at home and give the mother country another trial, before joining in the universal "rush" across the two great oceans. M., (April 23,) making the pas[illegible] from Aspinwall to NewOrleans in 6 days and [illegible] hours.

The health of the Isthmus was very good, a[illegible] no trouble in crossing is experienced by th[illegible] passengers.

While at Aspinwall, a son of Mr. E. E. Dash[illegible] werth, about fifteen years of age, took an ex[illegible] press from Aspinwall to Panama in the [illegible] cedented space of time of 8½ hours, the shor[illegible] time probably ever made across the Isthmus.

The steamship Certee reports the total loss [illegible] the steamship Independence, of the Nicaragu[illegible] Route, by shipwreck and fire. She struck o[illegible] a sunken reef some distance from Margarita [illegible] Island, about 150 miles N. W. from Cape St. Lucas, was hacked, and being in a sinking co[illegible] dition was beached some distance from [illegible] shore. In the meantime she took fire and [illegible] ed to the water's edge. About 140 lives were lost, and the remainder of the passengers were saved by some whale ships which were in one of the Bays near at hand, and taken to San Francisco.

THE BURNING OF THE INDEPENDENCE

The following is Capt. Sampson's statement of this deplorable catastrophe. It will be read with painful interest by all classes of our citizens:

Messrs. Editors—I am under the painful necessity of reporting the loss of the steamship Independence, lately under my command, on her passage from San Juan del Sud to this port, and about one hundred and twenty-five lives consisting of the passengers and fifteen of the crew. She was lost on the Island of Margarita, off the coast of Lower California. After leaving Acapulco, we experienced strong [illegible] from N. W. to N. Passed Cape St. Lucas on the morning of the 15th February. At 12 o'clock, M. of the 15th, we were in latitude 23 04 N., longitude 110 42 W.; steered N.W. by W½W compass, intending to go to the westward of Margarita Islands.

On the morning of the 16th, at 1 o'clock, A. M., made the mainland to the eastward of the Island, having been set in shore by the current. Altered the course to S.W. [illegible] the Island of Margarita, the south point bearing W. by S. per compass; then altered the course to W. S. W. I intended to give the point a berth of three miles, but owing to a haze over the land I was deceived in the distance. At 5 minutes past 6, just as day was breaking, struck on a sunken reef extending off from the south point of the island about a mile from the shore. The sea was very smooth at the time not breaking on the reef at all. Backed the engine, and she came off: examined the hold, and found that she was filling fast; knew that I should have to beach her to keep her from sinking; got a sail over the bow (under her) to try to stop the leak, and set a gang of men to work at each hatchway bailing, and run along the west side of the island, close in, to find a good place to put her ashore. Told the engineer to let me know five minutes before the water would be up high enough to put out the fires. When we had run about four miles, the engineer came up and reported the water near up to the fires, and that they would soon be extinguished. Put tha helm hard a-port, and run her ashore into a small cove on the south-west side of the island, head on. Lowered a boat and sent the mate and two men in her to run a line to the beach, which was about a hundred yards distant, but the boat breached to and was swamped in the surf. Lowered another boat and sent three men in her with another line, which they succeeded in getting ashore. I then ascertained that the ship was on fire. Told the engineer to take his men and put out the fires if possible. Ordered the other two boats to be lowered, and to come forward, and the women and children to come to the forward gangway. Loaded both boats with women and children, and sent them ashore.

The ship had now swung round, broadside on. The mate and two men came off with the line that took the line ashore, and she was immediately loaded with women and children, and went ashore with them. The fire originated from the furnaces. It was necessary, after the steam was struck on the reef, to use wood and boards for fuel, in order to keep up steam until I had struck on the beach, when the water was so high as to stop the draft from the lower fires, which forced open the furnace doors, and the flames rushed out and caught the wood work in the fire room and also around the smoke stack, thence spreading very rapidly. Every effort was made to get the fire under, but of no avail. The flames were now coming up from the hatchways, fire room, engine room, ventilators, and around the smoke stack; every thing was consternation and dismay; the people seemed completely bewildered, and were jumping overboard by dozens.

The scene was perfectly horrible and indescribable—men, women and children screaming, crying and drowning. I ordered the spare hatches, tables, and every thing that would float, to be thrown overboard, which was done, and they were immediately covered with people. About an hour after the ship struck the beach she was in a perfect sheet of flame, and there was no one on board of her except one of the coal passers, named Beaumont, and myself.

The smoke stack had fallen, and the promenade deck forward had tumbled in; the flames were coming out of the side lights, and it was impossible to stay on board any longer. A boat came off from the shore with two of the boat hands in her. Beaumont, who was near the fore rigging, jumped into her, and I jumped overboard, swam to her, and commenced pulling up those who were afloat. After picking up three boat loads, Thomas Herren, the steward, succeeded in launching another boat and saved some of the people. When all that were alive had been picked up, and some of the baggage landed, and had the spars which had drifted ashore hauled up into a ravine, and with one of the sail that had washed ashore, made a tent large enough to shelter the women and children.

The ship was still in flames, so that it was impossible for any one to board her. I gave the mate and engineer orders to have the dead taken above high water mark and buried, and to board the wreck as soon as possible, and save all tha provisions and water that they could, and then took a boat and four men, and started to pull round the north end of the island to Magdalena Bay in search of assistance, expecting to find some ships there.

We pulled until ten o'clock that night, when, not being able to see any vessels, and not knowing in what direction to pull, I landed on the north shore of the entrance to Magdalena Bay, hauled up the boat, and waited until daylight, when I started again to pull across the bay; after pulling an hour and a half, I discovered a vessel close in to the main land, pulled for and reached her at 11 o'clock A. M.; found her to be the schooner A. Emery, Captain Gordon. The Captain and most of the crew were ashore, looking for water; set a signal, and they came on board.

Captain Gordon said that he had been in the bay five days, and that there were no other vessels in the bay. After stating the circumstances of the wreck to him, he consented to go to sea (under way, (although he had but sixty gallons of water on board at the time,) and take tha survivors to San Jose or Cape St. Lucas, where they could get tha necessaries of life until other assistance could be rendered them; and he immediately got under way, and commenced beating out. At daylight of the 18th, it being calm, and the schooner being a long distance from the wreck, I took twenty gallons of water and a sack of bread in the boat, and started for the camp, expecting to find the people suffering for water, as there was none on the island at all to drink. Arrived ahead of the wreck at 2 P. M., having been gone from there fifty-one hours. The surf was breaking heavily, making it dangerous to land. The mate sama down on the beach, and said that the passengers had gone across the island, and that I had better pull round the south end of the island to the other side, which I did, and found the boats' crews from the whale-ships Omega, James Maury, Meteor, and bark Clematis, busily at work taking passengers on board the ships, which lay about twelve miles distant from the point of embarkation, in the lower bay,

The New Orleans Christian Advocate.

While I was away in the boat, the mate and engineer had gone across the Island, seen the ships and boats, and signalized to them, and so obtained relief. I then took a boat and crew, and started off to meet the schooner, and take her back into the bay, where we arrived on the morning of the 20th. I then went on board the ships, and mustered a party of men, and went across the Island, to save and bring over all the provisions we could find.

On the 3d of March, every thing being ready, and the passengers all on board, except a few who choose to go to the Sandwich Islands in other ships, we sailed for this port.

I was on the larboard paddla-box when the steamer struck, and had been on deck the whole night. If the steamer had not taken fire not a soul would have been lost, for they could all have been landed safely if there had been time.

Too much cannot be said of the humana conduct and kind treatment received from Capt. J. Fisher and officers of the ship Omega, Captain Winslow, of the James Maury, Capt. Jeffries, of the ship Meteor, Capt. Lane, of the bark Clementine, and Capt. Gerdan, of the schooner A. Emery, who promptly came to our relief as soon as they heard of our situation, and rendered us all the assistance and made us as comfortable as possible during our stay in the bay Voire.

Respectfully, F. L. SAMPSON,
Late master steamer Independence.

San Francisco, March 31, 1853.

Oregon.

The news from Oregon at San Francisco is as late as the 19th of March. The miners in Southern Oregon were doing well. The small pox was creating great havoc among the Indians. The question of establishing a State Government was being strongly agitated among the people.

Sandwich Islands.

News from the Sandwich Islands to the 23d of February had been received at San Francisco. The King received the French Minister Plenipotentiary at the palace on the first of February. The repeal of all port charges in the island is warmly urged. Some of the planters in the other islands think it would only benefit the merchants of Honolulu.

China.

The Overland Register, in speaking of the Chinese rebellion, thus contemptuously says:

"The rebellion has traveled out of the reach of our own correspondent," and has retired into the illimitable prospective of the member for posterity; but the belief in it is as strong, if not stronger, than ever. We have not changed our opinion in the least on the disturbances which are now agitating China—they have been and are the cause of much distress in the country; but that there is any aim in them beyond the mere love of plunder, which seems to be altogether local, the so-called rebels not willing one foot of ground except the place they stand on, we deny, etc.

Panama.

We have dates from the Isthmus as late as the 16th inst. The Panama Herald states that Senor José Gregorio l'az Soldan, the newly appointed Minister from Peru to Bogota, was latelyrobbed whilst crossing the Isthmus, en route for Bogota. The robbery appears to have been preconcerted. The Herald gives the particulars as follows:

On Monday (4th) the Minister's baggage left Gorgona, and on the following day he and suite started for Aspinwall, with the intention of taking the British mail steamer to Carthagena. On their arrival at Gorgona, on Tuesday evening, they stopped at the NewYork Hotel. Here the first robbery took place, consisting of the trunks containing the dresses and effects belonging to the lady of the Minister's brother and Secretary. On the following day the party descended the river to Barbacoas, where some of them stopped at the "Ohl Joe Hotel," kept by a man named Hunter; while they occupied the only private room in the house, into which their baggage was conveyed; and during the night the robbers effected an entrance, and managed to make off with another portion of the property.

On the same evening, the party who had gone on to Aspinwall were also robbed at the hotel where they put up, thus effecting the two robberies in two evenings.

The facts being made known to the police of Aspinwall, Holmes, the keeper of the NewYork Hotel, and four other persons, were arrested. Careful and some peculiar coins found in their possession leave no room to doubt their guilt. They were all lodged in the jail at Gorgona, and the NewYork Hotel closed to the public and put in charge of the police. The total amount stolen is valued at $12,500, including some valuable jewels, and about $4000 in money.

The man named John M. Hugo, a carpenter on the Panama Railroad, who was in prison for the murder of Mr. Stevenson, the superintendent of the road, committed suicide last week.

ROUND THE WORLD.—The London Times says: "Among the passengers of the Royal are Messrs. Pemberton and Sparkes, of New South Wales. The former of these gentlemen has, perhaps, for the first time, circumnavigated the world by steam, having gone out in the Great Britain to Melbourne and Sydney, and returned by the Chusan to Singapore, and thence by the company's other steamer's to Southampton. He has been absent from England only seven months. A correspondent of the Daily News contradicts the assertion that the gentleman named has in reality sailed round the world, inasmuch as to do so a man must start in one direction and continue on until he arrives at his starting point from an opposite direction. This gentleman proceeded, it appears, easterly, and he arrived from the east.

Advices have been received that the steamer Cleopatra, which left London last year for Australia, via the Cape of Good Hope, will arrive out by way of Cape Horn. When she reaches there safely, any of her officers, crew or passengers who have left London in her will have the very circumnavigated the globe by steam, and will be the first that have done so."

GOLD IN BARS.—The editors of the Baltimore Sun have been shown some early specimens of the operations of the Mint under the new law by Mr. Warfield, of Adams & Co.'s Express. They are of a very attractive character. One is a respectable brick of solid gold, weighing 220, 24-100ths, 989¼ fine, and the other a miniature specimen of oz. 14, 42-100ths and 9.0 fine. The value of the former is $3501 97; cost of coinage $22 52, at ½ per cent.; value in coins $3524 49. The latter is worth $233 71; cost of coinage $1 17; value in coins $232 54. These specimens have been obtained by Messrs. Adams & Co., with their customary promptitude, for the purpose of supplying the commercial world with general information upon the subject.

From Vera Cruz.

The Texas arrived in Vera Cruz on Sunday, April 17, making the run down in seventy hours, and back to New Orleans in sixty-six hours, the quickest trip on record.

Loss of the Albatross.—On Monday, the 18th, at two o'clock, a dispatch arrived in Vera Cruz, to the agent of C. Morfoot, advising him that the Albatross had gone on the preceding night, on the Cabezas, a few miles from the shore, and about twenty-six miles from the city; that six of the passengers had succeeded in reaching the shore, and were in great distress from the impossibility of getting away.

At daylight on Tuesday morning, Captain Lawless, of the steamship Texas, got up steam, and proceeded to the scene of the disaster, hoping to be able to save the lives of the passengers, and perhaps the ship; but on arrival there found the passengers and crew had left, and the ship had slid off the reef, where she had first struck, and was nearly out of sight.

The Captain of the Port, together with two pilots and Custom House officers, proceeded in the Texas, in order that should any necessity arise, he might be able to act with additional capacity, and after being absent the greater portion of the day, returned, without having had the opportunity of rendering any service.

The people of Vera Cruz are highly pleased with the safe arrival of the new line of mail steamers and with the beautiful pioneer of the line—the Texas. Capt. Lawless, in a card published in the Eco del Comercio of the 19th inst., invited the officials and inhabitants of the city to visit his ship, which invitation was accepted by very many, all of whom returned delighted with her. Messrs. Harris & Briggs sent down a special agent in the Texas, in order to make the necessary mail arrangements, and he called on all the principal merchants, who expressed their willingness and desire to do every thing in their power to make the line successful.

Santa Anna arrived in the city of Mexico on Sunday morning, the 17th inst., amidst the rejoicing of the inhabitants, who testified by their manner the great joy they experienced at his return. The whole city was brilliantly illuminated at night, and amidst the booming of cannon and firing of rockets their new chief assumes his power.

MR. SOULE ON THE PURCHASE OF CUBA.—The New York Times regards it as silly to suppose that Soulé has been appointed Minister to Spain to facilitate the purchase of Cuba, as Mr S. is opposed to such a purchase To prove this the Times quotes from Mr. Soulé's speech, of January last, as follows:

"Sir, I am against purchasing Cuba Whoever knows any thing of Castilian pride must be aware that Spaniards can never be brought to sell Cuba to us. And it seems to me strange that we should persist in seeking to purchase Cuba when Spain is unwilling to sell it—when her own Ministers have declared in the most solemn manner that they would sooner see that beautiful possession sunk in the bottom of the ocean than to see it go to any other power. Your tender of purchase, therefore, can effect nothing. No, sir, I have still another objection against purchasing Cuba There is something there that speaks aloud for those suffering Cubanos who call upon us for assistance. They are proud and would not consent to this purchase. I am unwilling to move their susceptibilities; and thus, as far as a wish of mine can have any bearing upon any policy which might now or hereafter be pursued, the idea of purchasing Cuba has become an obsolete one, and must be abandoned."

LOUISIANA.

The Opelousas Courier of the 23d contains the following:

POISONING.—An accident resulting from imprudence or negligence has occurred on Thursday last near Flat Town.,

Mrs. Lafleur, a widow, aged about 50 years, had sent a boy into the woods in quest of Teichi roots, very much used among our Creole population, in the way of tisanne. She had ten made of it, and drank a cup full. Her daughter also tasted some of it, but finding it bitter, set the cup down again, and paid no further attention to it.

A few hours afterwards, Mrs. Lafleur was dying amidst the most excruciating pains, which poison creates, and her daughter was extremely ill when last heard of.

The fact was, that instead of the "tetchi," the boy had brought her the root of the yellow jasmine, a most deadly poison, and very similar in appearance to the roots of the "tetchi."

TERRIBLE AFFAIR.—On Saturday last, 16th instant, the town of Washington was thrown into commotion by the result of a frightful accident.

Madame Dessauze, the wife of a French engineer of this parish, had suddenly disappeared, and no reason could be assigned for her absence, and searches for her were vain and fruitless. On Saturday last, some one drawing water from a well was startled at the sight of human hair in the bucket. A second trial was attended with the discovery of a greater quantity of hair. He called for assistance, and by the aid of a hook, the body of the lost Madame Dessauze was drawn out in a state of putrefaction.

It has not yet been ascertained whether this terrible affair has been the result of accident or of design.

DAY WEATHER.—The Louisiana State paper, published at Clinton, says:

"We have had a six weeks' spell of dry weather, and the planting of cotton seed has been suspended in consequence of the dryness of the soil."

CADETS.—The following young gentlemen were appointed by President Fillmore before retiring from office, Cadets to West Point from Alabama: George W. Holt, 1st District; Geo. A. SUBSCRIPTION OF $250,000 AT PENSACOLA.—The citizens of Pensacola, on Monday the 18th inst., in public meeting, agreed to instruct the Mayor and Council to subscribe $250,000 to the Florida and Alabama Railroad. The large majority of the citizens were present, and the vote was unanimous. The subscription was made next day by the municipal authorities, and the Mayor was also instructed, we learn from the Democrat, "to appoint delegates to meet the citizens of Montgomery on the 1st of May next, for the purpose of agreeing with them on the ways and means to bring this undertaking to completion."

The NewYork Herald contains letters from an intelligent printer, who went to Australia, in preference to Californin, to seek a golden fortune. His statements are very despanding as to success in the mines, not only as effects himself, but for the great majority thern. It is indeed the same story with which we are all familiar as regards California—a "streak of luck," for a very few, which is always sure to be heralded, but only hardships and disappointments, not a tithe of which was propably ever expressed, for the many. If he had money enough to get back again, the writer says he should be happy to do so.

HORRIBLE.—The Lawrenceburg (Ind.) Register says that on the night of the 7th instant, Samuel Hodge and wife, of Logan county, while under the influence of liquor, quarrelled, which ended in the death of the husband.

So far as is known of this tragical affair, it appears that the woman bore two severe wounds upon her head, inflicted by a hatchet, which made her insensible for some time, while on the bed was found the lifeless body of her husband. It is thought that he had thus fallen asleep, and the wife had in this condition killed him.

There is quite a civil, or rather uncivil war, raging at present in the Gallician Church, with an immense expenditure of ammunition in the shape of pamphlets, sermons, speeches, attacks and reports. The Bishop of Orleans and the Archbishop of Paris have just taken the field.

ATMOSPHERIC TELEGRAPH.

The Boston Daily Advertiser of Saturday, the 16th, has the following notice of this new invention, by which it is claimed letters and parcels can be transported considerable distances with almost incredible velocity, rendering it practically nearly equal in speed to the Magnetic Telegraph, over which it is obvious it has many advantages in other respects. The apparatus is in operation in the Boston Merchants' Exchange:

It consists of a tube connecting the places between which communication is to be maintained, in which a sort of piston, called "the plunger," is fitted with a loose leather packing. The matter to be sent is inclosed in a bag attached behind this plunger. Its proportion is secured by the pressure of the atmosphere of ordinary density behind it, that in front being rarified by means of an air pump, producing a partial vacuum. This propelling power is so great as to produce an apparently instantaneous motion of the plunger with its load from one end to the other of the model tube on exhibition, which is about 30 feet long and 1½ inches in diameter; indeed the plunger issues forth with so much force when not confined, as to knock down violently a heavy billet of wood placed opposite the end of the tube, if it is left open. The speed is estimated at about one thousand miles in an hour.

The apparatus is so arranged that there can be intermediate stations upon the line, at which the progress of the "plunger" can be arrested, or if preferred, it can pass directly through to the terminus.

The mechanical difficulties to the plan which readily suggest themselves have been ingeniously and apparently effectually obviated by Mr. Richardson. The inconvenience of the sudden shock occasioned by the arrival of the "plunger" at the end of its journey is avoided by an arrangement by which a portion of the air in front of it is compressed and allowed to escape but gradually, forming a sort of cushion to ease the jolt. The retarding effect of the friction caused by the motion of the large column of air which necessarily follows the plunger in the tube is prevented by the occasional recurrence of valves in the tube connecting with the atmosphere to be opened by the plunger as it passes. The friction of the plunger itself is reduced to a very low point by the manner in which its packing is constructed.

We are informed that the apparatus has met with the approval of several gentlemen competent to form a sound opinion, who have examined it.

The patent right for the machine is owned by the Atmospheric Company, of which Mr. Richardson is agent. It is proposed to open on Tuesday next, in this city, the subscription books of a company under the name of the "NewYork and Boston Atmospheric Company," to construct a line between this city and New York. The tube of this line, it is proposed, shall be two feet in diameter. The cost of laying it down is estimated at $2000 per mile. There will be supply valves as often an once in twenty-five miles, and intermediate stations at suitable points, for instance at Worcester, Springfield, ato. There will be air pumps at all the stations. Hourly mails may be made up and dispatched, a part of them at fixed hours stopping at all the stations and the others proceeding throughout direct It is expected that letters and parcels from NewYork would be delivered in Boston in less than half an hour. A company able to carry mail matter at this rate of speed would be powerful competitors as contractors for performing the mail service. If a sufficient amount of matter is presented, it is claimed that the actual cost of transportation is not more than half that of any other method, while it is twenty times as fast. The line need not be straight, but can be curved so as to follow the face of the ground, or underlie the channels of rivers.

It will be observed that this invention bears some resemblance to the "Atmospheric Railway" so much talked of at one time, but that it avoids the objectionable features of that scheme, as the tube is closed throughout. It is worthy the attention of business men. We are informed that Mr. Richardson has had in successful operation a line of 3 inch tube of a mile length.

PROTECTION TO EDITORS AND REPORTERS.—A bill has been introduced into the Senate of New York for the protection of this class of sufferers, who are often subjected to great persecutions by actions for libel, brought against them by gentlemen who find mere "truth than poetry" in the newspapers. The bill le to the following effect:

No reporter, editor or proprietor of any newspaper shall be liable to any action or prosecution, civil or criminal, for a fair and true report in such newspaper of any judicial, legislative or other public official proceedings, of any statement, speech, argument, or debate in the course of the same, except upon actual proof of malice in making such report, which shall in no case be implied from the fact of the publication.

LETTERS OF CREDIT.—The London Times has a report of a case of some interest to travelers abroad. An American gentleman bought for cash a circular letter of credit from a mercantile firm in the city, addressed to the agents on the continent, and this document authorized the various houses to whom it was addressed to honor his drafts. Shortly afterwards, a house which had some disputed accounts with him, lodged an attachment with the London firm on the funds which they had thus received for the sale of the letter, upon the plea that the transaction was a simple deposit, and that the money so attached still belonged to the person who had paid it to them, and that they, the garnishees or issuers of the credit, incurred no responsibility until they came under acceptance. The jury found that the money passed absolutely to the garnishees in exchange for their credit; that it simultaneously ceased to be the defendant's, and consequently was not attachable.

THE IRISH HEART.—One of the most admirable traits of the Irish character is the fine vein of true golden affection that runs through it. It is a perpetual thing to find in the newspaper accounts of how poor starving women, who have come from the old sod, and, from day wages, have saved enough to bring over either an infirm father, a desolate and starving mother, or brother whose life was an eternal toil, with hardly a subsistence. These are noble traits of character, and may be found every where among the Irish peasantry. We see that even as far off as Australia what is so common in this country is noted. An Irish paper states that at the Limerick post-office letters are continually received, enclosing from $50 to $500, sent by poor emigrants to their poorer kin, to help them onward from the desolate home of their birth to those far off golden fields.

SLEEPERS AWAKENED.

Let us introduce our readers to a small chamber, a passenage, in the lattor part of [illegible] story. The room presented a perfect picture of neatness, quiet, and repose. It was [illegible]ly furnished, but manifested a certain taste and refinement in the arrangement of the few simple ornaments on the chimney-piece, the flowers and books, and the old china cup of smoking drink that stood on a small round table by the window, through which the warm air of summer stole softly, laden with perfume from the magnolias and stocks that flourished in the garden beneath it. The sun's rays, broken by the fresh green leaves of a large walnut tree, cast a clear, pleasant light through the snowy dimity-curtains of the bed on the face of an invalid who lay there, gazing with the listlessness of weakness, on the glimpse of blue sky visible [illegible] open casement. It was a countenance on which sunlight might be imagined to love, so pale and gentle was it. Nor did its expression belie the heart within. A holy, charitable, unselfish man was that village pastor; but with more resemblance he bore—and it was a strong one—to Goldsmith's portait of his brother, there mingled much of the thoughtlessness and improvidence of the poet himself; and the consequence of his boundless charities, and of his ignorance of money-matters, had led him into embarrassments, from which he saw no escape.

He would have cared little had his difficulties affected his own comfort only; but they fell likewise on those dearest to him, and anxiety for their sakes preying on his affectionate and rather timid spirit; the probable shame of an execution in his house, and the nervous horror he felt at the idea of being consigned to a prison, had brought on his present illness, and haunted his thoughts as he lay there in solitude after many restless nights of agonized and perplexed reflection, listening to the church bells ringing for Sunday service, at which a stranger was to fill his place. From the days of Whittington to the present, the imagination has frequently given a language to those airy voices; and the poor pastor, as he lay overpowered and exhausted by long hours of painful and fruitless meditation, felt the nightmare, like a load of care which oppressed him, pass off as he listened, and a childlike faith in the goodness of Providence once more dawning on his mind. We do not pretend to interpret what they whispered, but it is certain that, soothed by the chimes, he yielded to a gentle and profound slumber, in which his wife found him shortly afterwards.

There was at first taken not to break this desired repose; but as noon, evening, night, nay, a second day passed, and still it continued, he finally became alarmed, and tried to rouse him. In vain! The awful slumber was as inexorable as that of death itself. It bound his senses in an iron forgetfulness. He could not be awakened by sound or touch. Sun after sun rose and set, and still the deep sleep continued. Meantime the evils he had dreaded gathered round his family. His physical condition preserved his personal freedom; but an execution was put in his house, and his wife and daughters were exposed to the direst evils of poverty. The rumor, however, of his trance-like slumber was noised abroad, and reached the lordly dwelling of a nobleman who resided near the spot, though he was not one of the clergyman's parishioners. Being much given to the study of physical science, he visited the parsonage to request permission to see the sleeper, and thus learned the [illegible] sorrow that had fallen on its gentle inmates. With equal delicacy and generosity he proffered as a loan the means of paying the harsh creditors, assuring the poor wife that if her husband should ever wake, he would give him the means of repaying the pecuniary obligation. The offer was thankfully accepted, and the debt discharged. For the following two days Lord [illegible] was a regular visitor to the parsonage.

Sunday morning again dawned—once more the sun-light fell on the sleeper's pillow, and the bells called men to pray. Beside the couch were seated the miserable wife and her noble friend. The faint, regular breathings of the trance-chained man deepened, and to her anxious eye the difference was perceptible, though Lord E—— shook his head, as she told him of it. She bent eagerly over the pillow: there was a slight flutter of the eye-lids; she held her breath, and clasped her hands in an agony of expectation and dawning hope. The hand, so many motionless, stirred; the eyes opened; she could not speak for overpowering joy. The sleeper raised his head, slightly smiled on her, and observed, "I thought I had slept longer—the bell has not yet ceased ringing!"

His was unconscious that a whole week had elapsed since its tones had soothed him to rest. The wife fainted, and was conveyed from the chamber. The doctor was summoned; he found his patient weak, but not otherwise ill. A still more extraordinary mental cure had been effected by the genius of Sleep; he had totally forgotten his threatened difficulties, and from that hour recovered rapidly. Lord E—— conferred a living of some value on him; and when he was strong enough to bear the disclosure, his wife informed him of the loan so nobly bestowed on them, and the suffering from which he had been so marvellously preserved. The lesson was not lost. The new rector henceforward strove to unite prudence and generosity; and a career of worldly prosperity, as well as the far greater blessing of an implicit and cheerful faith in Providence, attended the renewed life of the sleeper awakened.

In this instance, the sleep or trance was dreamless and unconscious. But there is one remarkable case on record, in which the body only of the sleeper was subject to the death-like thraldom of slumber, the mind remaining awake; and the account given by this individual who entered this interval of life in death, is very singular and interesting. She was an attendant at a German princess; and, after being confined to her bed for a great length of time, with a nervous disorder, to all appearance died. She was laid in a coffin, and the day fixed for her interment arrived. In accordance with the custom of the place, funeral songs and hymns were sung outside the door of the chamber in which the fair corpse lay. Within they were preparing to nail on the lid of the coffin, when a slight moisture was observed on the brow of the dead. The supposed corpse was of course immediately removed to a different couch, and every means used to restore suspended vitality. She recovered, and gave the following singular account of her sensations:

"She was perfectly conscious of all that passed around her; she distinctly heard her friends speaking and lamenting her death; she felt them dress her in the garments of the grave, and place her in the coffin. This knowledge produced a mental anxiety she could not describe. She tried to speak or cry; but vainly; she had no power of utterance; it was equally impossible for her to raise her hand or open her eyes, as she vainly endeavored to do. She felt as if she were imprisoned in a dead body. But when she heard them talk of nailing the lid on her, and the mournful music of the funeral-hymns reached her ear, the anguish of her mind attained its height, and agony mastering that awful spell of unnatural slumber, produced the moisture on her brow, which saved her from being entombed alive."

One more little anecdote of a somewhat similar kind, which was related to us on the authority of a Hastings fisherman, and we will close our paper. It occurred during the cholera. The people of England have an especial horror of this terrible scourge, and nothing will induce them to believe that the infection is in the air, and not in the person affected by the complaint; consequently it was difficult, in some places, to persuade them to perform the last offices for the dead, and they hurried the interment of the victims of the pestilence with unseemly precipitation.

A poor seafaring man, who had been long absent from his native land, returning home at the time it was raging, found that his wife had been dead about three days, and that her coffin had been placed in a room with those of others, who, lodging in the same dwelling, had also perished of the disease. Greatly afflicted, the sailor insisted on seeing his dead wife. The neighbors would have dissuaded him, but his attention and grief disdained all fear, and he rushed into the chamber of death. There, striking open the lid of the coffin, and bending over the beloved corpse, the rude mariner shed tears, which fell fast upon the pallid face, when suddenly a sound, some hing like a sigh, was emitted from the white lips, and the next minute the exhausted and death-like sleeper opened her eyes and gazed upon his face! The joy of the poor fellow may be imagined.

We might multiply instances of this phenomenon, but as they would probably be familiar to the reader, we shall but add a wish that the old adage, "too much of a good thing," may not be found a practical truth with regard to his sheep; and wish

> To all and each a fair good
> And pleasing dreams and rest to night.

A certified copy of the same shall be deposited in the office of the Auditor of Public Accounts; the same shall also be published once a week for four weeks in the official journal of the State, and if the official journal of the State, should not be a newspaper in the city of New Orleans, the said act shall also be published for the same time, in at least one daily newspaper of the city of New Orleans, and also in a newspaper at the place named in the act as the place of business, if there be one published there. A duly certified copy of the record of such an act may be used as evidence for and against such corporations.

Sec. 5. Be it further enacted, etc., That the act thus recorded and published, shall contain and set forth under the signatures of the subscribers and associates, the name assumed to distinguish such Banking Company, and to be used in its dealings—the place where the banking business of such association is to be carried on, designating the particular parish and city, or village in the State, the amount of the capital stock of such Banking Company, and the number of shares into which the same shall be divided; the names and places of residence of the shareholders, and the number of shares held by each of them, respectively, and the time when and manner in which payments on stock subscribed shall be made; the period at which such association shall commence, and the period of its duration; the number of its directors and managers, and the mode of election, and the mode of liquidation at the end of the term.

The same may also provide for an increase of the capital, and of the number of associates, and for any modification, addition or alteration in the articles of association; Provided, that such increase, and every such modification, alteration or addition shall be submitted to a general meeting of the stockholders, held after thirty days' notice, and shall be approved by two-thirds of the amount of the capital stock, and every such increase, modification, alteration or addition, shall be executed, recorded and published, as provided in this section for the original articles.

Sec. 6. Be it further enacted, etc., That all stock subscribed to any Banking Company under this act, must be paid up in full, in specie, within twelve months after the said company shall commence business.

Sec. 7. Be it further enacted, etc., That no loans by any Banking Company shall be made to any of its stockholders on a pledge of its own stock.

Sec. 8. Be it further enacted, etc., That the shares of said Banking Companies shall be deemed to be personal property, and shall be transferable upon the books of the same, in such manner as the by-laws may direct; but no shareholder thereon shall be liable for its debts and contracts to a greater amount than the whole amount of his shares therein; nointeorporated bankers shall be liable to the full amount of their obligations and contracts.

The liability as stockholder shall apply not only to such persons as appear by the books of the company to be such, but also to every equitable owner of stock, although the same may appear on such books in the name of another person; and also to every person who shall have advanced the instalments or purchase money of any stock in the name of a person under twenty one years of age, and while such person remains a minor, and also to every guardian or trustee who shall voluntarily invest funds in such stock, or any trust funds shall be found in the corporate debts, but the guardian or trustee shall be personally liable, until the person beneficially interested becomes competent to control and dispose of the same, and for sixty days thereafter. But when a guardian or trustee holds such stocks under a transfer from a third person, in good faith, or by positive directions to make such investment, the person so transferring or directing such actions, or his estate, if he be deceased, shall be responsible for the debts and liabilities chargeable on said stock.

Sec. 9 Be it further enacted, etc., That the stockholders of any Banking Company formed under this act, shall be exempted from any responsibility therefor in respect to any stock which shall have been duly transferred on the books of the association, in good faith, and without the intent to evade such responsibility, before default has been made by the company in the payment of its debts. The assignee in said case shall succeed to the same responsibilities as though he had been owner of the stock at the time of contracting the debt or liability for which the stockholders are responsible, and the same rule of responsibility shall prevail in regard to all subsequent assignees.

Sec. 10. Be it further enacted, etc., That every Banking Company established under this act shall, on proof of any act of insolvency, or non-compliance with any of the conditions of this act, forfeit its corporate rights, and it shall be the duty of the District Court of the district in which such corporation is situated, at the instance of any creditor or of the Auditor of Public accounts, and on proof of the alleged facts, to the satisfaction of the said court, to decree such forfeiture, and to appoint thereupon commissioners to effect the liquidation of the affairs of the said corporation—to convert into cash, as speedily as may be, under the direction of the court, all the assets of the corporation, including the sums that may have remained unpaid by stockholders upon their respective shares of the capital stock; and after providing according to article 120 of the constitution, for any unpaid balance which may be due to the bill holders, to distribute the same, as now provided by law, in the case of insolvencies of individuals.

Sec. 11. Be it further enacted, etc., That the Auditor of Public Accounts of this State is hereby authorized and directed to cause to be engraved and printed, in the best manner to guard against counterfeiting, such a quantity of circulating notes, in blank, of the different denominations, not less than five dollars each, which are authorised to be issued by the Incorporated Banks of the State, as he may from time to time deem necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act; such blank circulating notes shall be countersigned by the said Auditor and numbered and registered in his office, by and under his direction by person appointed for that purpose, so that the notes of each denomination of such circulating notes issued to the same banker or banking company, shall be uniform. All such circulating notes, of every denomination, shall be stamped upon their face "secured by pledge of public stocks," specifying the class. The form and devices of such circulating notes may be selected by the bankers and banking companies, who may be entitled to receive them from the said Auditor, under the provisions of this act; but the Auditor shall prescribe a uniformity among all the notes engraved, in the device for receiving the signature of the Auditor, and the number herein directed to be put upon each note, by him or in his office.

Sec. 12 Be it further enacted, etc., That Banks and Banking Companies established under this act, upon legally assigning to, and depositing with, the said Auditor, the bonds, or evidences of debt, of the United States, bonds of this State, or bonds of the consolidated debt of the City of New Orleans, authorized and secured by the thirty-seventh section of the act "to Consolidate the City of New Orleans, and provide for the government and administration of its affairs," approved February the twenty-third, eighteen hundred and fifty-two, and the fifth section of the act approved February the twenty-third, eighteen hundred and fifty-two, entitled, "an act supplementary to an act to Consolidate the City of New Orleans, and providing for the incorporation of the City of Lafayette with the City of New Orleans," shall be entitled to receive from the said Auditor, an equal amount of such circulating notes, in blank, of the denominations such as they may prefer, numbered, registered, countersigned, and stamped as aforesaid. But such public stocks shall always be, or made to be, equal to a stock of this State, bearing not less than six per cent interest; and it shall not be lawful for said Auditor to take such bonds at a rate above their par value or above their market value.

Sec. 13 Be it further enacted, etc. That the said Auditor shall collect, at the regular periods, the interest which shall accrue upon the bonds and stocks deposited with him, as security for the circulating notes, issued under the preceding section of this act, and shall pay over the same, on demand, to the parties from whom they were received, so long as the market price of said bonds and stock do not fall below the rate at which they were taken by him. In the event of such a depreciation, the said Auditor is authorised and directed to retain the said interest until the said security shall recover their full value, as rated in their receipt on deposit, or until such further deposit shall be made as will fully make good the amount for which the circulating notes were issued. And the Auditor is further empowered, in case of such depreciation in the securities deposited, to require from the Banker or Banking Company, either an additional deposit of bonds, to make up fully the original security for the notes issued, or the return and surrender, by the parties depositing, of so much of the amount of circulation received from the Auditor as will make good the deficiency of security, produced by such a fall in the market value of the said deposited securities, and on the failure of such Banker or Banking Company to comply with such demand, within twenty days after it shall be made, all the privileges acquired under this act shall be forfeited, and the Auditor shall immediately take the proper steps to cause the affairs of said Banker or Banking Company to be liquidated, as provided in cases of insolvency. Provided, that the said Banker or Banking Company shall have the right to appeal from the decision of the Auditor, within ten days, to the District Court of the place where said Banker or Banking Company shall reside; and the said Court is hereby required to hear and determine the issue, in preference to all other cases, either in open court or in chambers, and the decision of the District Court may be appealed from to the Supreme Court then in session, at such time as may be fixed by the District Court, in order to have the same as speedily disposed of by the said Supreme Court as the interest of the parties and the public may require.

And provided further: That during the pendency of said appeal, all proceedings of said Banker or Banking Companies, as such, shall be suspended.

Sec. 14 Be it further enacted, etc., That all the securities deposited with the said Auditor under this act shall be held exclusively for the redemption of such circulating notes as have been issued therupon, but he may, on application of the depositors, change and re-transfer them, on receiving the amount of securities of equivalent value receivable under this law, or on receiving and cancelling an equivalent amount of the circulating notes for which they were pledged or depobited. He may also receive and cancel any mutilated notes, and issue in exchange other circulating notes of a corresponding amount, but the notes thus received shall be recorded and preserved as vouchers, until the annual examination of the legislative committees.

Sec 15. Be it further enacted, etc., That whenever said securities shall be assigned to, and deposited with the Auditor, in manner aforesaid, a full description of the same, signed by the said Auditor, and the parties assigning and depositing the same, shall be filed and recorded in the office of the said Auditor, also in the office of the Treasurer of the State; and every change, transfer or substitution of the same, shall be described, filed and recorded in the same manner. The securities shall be delivered to the Treasurer for safe keeping, on his receipt to the Auditor for the same; and every re-delivery of the same to the Auditor for any of the purposes of this act, shall be made on a written order of the said Auditor, specifying the purposes for which they are required; which order shall be filed and recorded in the Treasurer's office, with the Auditor's receipt for the securities or any portion of them delivered to him. A report from the Auditor of every sale and disposition of said securities, shall also be filed in the office of the said Treasurer.

Sec 16 Be it further enacted, etc., That it shall not be lawful for the Auditor to countersign bills for any Banker or Banking Company to an amount in the aggregate beyond the amount of stocks or bonds deposited, at their rate of value estimated under this law. A violation of this provision shall subject the Auditor, on conviction, to a fine of five thousand dollars, and imprisonment for ten years at hard labor.

Sec. 17. Be it further enacted, etc., That the plates, dies and materials procured by the Auditor, for the engraving and printing of the circulating notes, as directed by this act, shall remain in the custody and under the direction of the Auditor. The necessary expenses incident to the procuring of said plates, dies and materials, the printing, numbering, countersigning and registering of the same, shall be paid by the respective Bankers and Banking Company for whose use they were incurred, before the said notes shall be delivered by the Auditor; and the Auditor is further authorised to charge, and receive from every Banker and Banking Company such rate per cent. as may be sufficient to defray his or their equitable proportion of the general expenses incident to the execution of this act.

Sec. 18. Be it further enacted, etc., That Bankers and Banking Companies, receiving such blank circulating notes from the Auditor, are authorised to execute and sign them in such manner as to make them obligatory in law as promissory notes, payable to bearer on demand, and without interest, in the place of business of the said Bankers or Banking Companies, and not elsewhere, except as otherwise provided by this act; and may circulate and use the same as money, according to the usual course of banking business as defined in this act, and regulated by the laws and usages of the State. All such circulating notes shall be signed by the Banker or Bankers and his or their Cashier or by the President and Cashier of the Banking Company issuing them, and by no other person whatever for them.

Provided: That no individual firm or corporation, except the legally chartered banks now existing, shall issue and circulate as money any note except such as are authorized by this act, under a penalty of one thousand dollars, to be recovered with costs of suit, one-half of such penalty to the use of any person who shall sue for the same, and prosecute the same to a final judgment, before any court of competent jurisdiction, and the other half to be placed in the State Treasury.

Sec. 19 Be it further enacted, etc., That in case the maker or makers of any notes, soauteriigned, numbered, registered and issued as aforesaid, shall, at any time within the usual hours of business at the place where the same is made payable or redeemable, refuse or fail to pay or redeem the same on demand, in lawful money of the United States, the holder of such note may cause it, or an exact copy of such notes as he may present, and if which default in payment is made, to be protested for non-payment; and the Auditor, on receiving and filing such protested note or notes, shall forthwith give notice to the makers of such notes to pay the same and all costs; and if he or they shall omit to do the same for three days after the service of such notice, the said Auditor shall thereupon give public notice, through the official journal of the State, and one other daily newspaper in the city of New Orleans, and if the official journal be not published in the city of New Orleans, in at least two daily journals published in the city of New Orleans, and also in the newspaper published at the place of business of the maker or makers of such notes, if out of the city of New Orleans—in which no one published there—that all the circulating notes issued by the maker or makers of said notes will be redeemed by him, out of the Trust Funds deposited in his hands.

Sec. 20. Be it further enacted, etc., That whenever a notice of Protest for non-payment of any note as described in the preceding section shall be lodged in the said District Court verified by the affidavit of the creditor, that the amount is still due and unpaid, the court shall forthwith issue a writ of sequestration and appoint a receiver to take charge of all the assets of said Banker or Banking Company, and place his seal upon the same to await the further action of the Court, and the said Court shall forthwith also issue a rule requiring the Banking Company or Banker issuing said note to show cause within ten days why the said note or notes were not paid on presentation; and in case, on the hearing of said rule, said respondent should fail to show cause, it shall be the duty of the said Court to pronounce judgment of insolvency, and proceed to provide for the liquidation of the affairs of said Banker or Banking Company.

Sec. 21. Be it further enacted, etc., That no Banker or Banking Company shall after protest of his or their note, as recited in the nineteenth section of this act, make any assignment, transfer, conveyance or sale of his or their property or assets; every such assignment, transfer, conveyance or sale shall be null and void, and every Banker, President, Director, Manager and officer assenting to such assignment, transfer, conveyance or sale of such property or assets, shall be personally liable in full, for all the debts of the company and may be adjudged guilty of a misdemeanor, punished on conviction by fine and imprisonment, Provided: That the protest of the first note protested shall constitute a lien for the benefit of the creditors of said Bank upon all the assets of the Bank not in the hands of the creditors.

Sec. 22. Be it further enacted, etc., That the Auditor, immediately on giving the public notice required by the 18th section of this act, of the non-payment of any protested bill or notes issued under the authority of this act, shall proceed to advertise for sale, at public auction in the city of New Orleans, the stocks or bonds deposited with him, by the maker or makers of said protested notes, and on the day of sale, which shall not be less than thirty days from such advertisement, and which advertisement shall have been published at least twice a week for four weeks in two daily newspapers printed in the city of New Orleans, he shall cause the said securities to be sold for cash under his own supervision, and shall, after deducting the expense of such advertisement and sale, apply the proceeds of said sale to the redemption pro rata of all the notes in circulation, whether protested or not protested, made and put into circulation by the maker or makers of such protested notes: Provided, that nothing in this act shall be considered as implying any pledge or undertaking on the part of the State for any payment beyond the faithful application of the said securities deposited with the Auditor.

Sec. 23. Be it further enacted, etc., That if the proceeds of the sale of the said securities should exceed the amount required to redeem and pay the circulating notes aforesaid in full, the Auditor shall pay over such excess into the general fund of the assets of said insolvent Banker or Banking Company; but if the proceeds of such sale should be insufficient to provide in full for the said circulating notes, and he should declare a distribution pro rata therupon, he shall forthwith furnish in writing to the commissioners or liquidators of said insolvents, a certificate in writing of the amount of said deficiency, which said certificate shall be legal notice to them to reserve out of any assets of such insolvents which may be in or come into their hands, an amount sufficient to provide for such deficiency; and he shall further furnish to every holder of any note or notes presented to him for redemption, and redeemed in part, a certificate of the amount unpaid on such note or notes, and such certificate shall entitle the holder to payment of the amount therein designated—in full out of the assets of the insolvents herein directed to be reserved—if the said assets should be sufficient to pay all the said notes in full—or, ratably if they should not be sufficient—in preference to any other claims and debts whatever, except the costs of liquidation.

And should the proceeds of the sale of said securities be sufficient to redeem all the notes put in circulation by any corporation established by this act, then the stockholders of said corporation shall be liable for the full amount of all unredeemed notes in the ratio of the stock which each one may own.

Sec. 24. Be it further enacted, etc., That the holder of any circulating note, which may have been protested for non-payment, shall be entitled to damages at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum, in lieu of interest, until final payment, payable out of the general fund of said insolvent party.

Sec. 25 Be it further enacted, etc., That Bankers and Banking Companies, doing business under this Act, shall be entitled to charge and receive discount at a rate not greater than the maximum allowed by law on conventional obligations; and their other contracts shall be regulated by the laws in regard to interest upon contracts between individuals.

Sec 26. Be it further enacted, etc., That every Banker and Banking Company, doing business under this Act, is required, in addition to the securities for circulation deposited with the Auditor, to have on hand at all times, in specie, an amount equal to one-third of all its or their other cash liabilities, and for the remaining two-thirds of the same liabilities an equal amount in specie, specie funds, bills of exchange, or discounted paper, maturing within ninety days, and not renewable.

Sec. 27. Be it further enacted, etc., That if at any time the said specie, and specie funds, and short paper, held by such Banker or Banking Company, should fall below the proportions to cash liabilities, prescribed in the preceding section, and shall remain so for a space of ten days, it shall not be lawful thereafter for such Banker or Banking Company to make any loan or discount whatsoever, until its or their position is re-established according to the terms of the said section. A violation of this provision shall be held to be an act of insolvency, and the Auditor shall cause the necessary steps to be taken for the liquidation of the affairs of such Banker or Banking Company as in cases of insolvency, and every Director or Manager of a Banking Company who may participate in, or assent, to such a violation, shall become individually liable for all its debts and obligations.

Sec. 28 Be it further enacted, etc., That every Banker and Banking Company, out of the city of New Orleans, doing business under this Act, and issuing circulating notes, as herein authorised, may keep an officer or designate an agency in the said city, for redemption of said notes. The appointment of such officer or agent shall be made in writing and filed with the Auditor, with the Board of Currency, and in the office of the Recorder of Mortgages in which the charter is filed; provided, however, nothing herein contained shall be so construed, as to authorise such Banker or Banking Company to refuse to redeem its notes at the counter of the principal Bank, as contemplated by this Act.

Sec. 29 Be it further enacted, etc., That the Board of Currency, as now established by law, or as it may be organised hereafter by law, shall supervise the execution of this Act, and possess all the powers, and perform all the duties which are conferred or imposed upon them by the laws in regard to incorporated Banks, or may be hereafter conferred or imposed upon them by law, in regard to incorporated or other banks. They may examine the affairs of Bankers and Banking Companies, doing business under this Act, whenever they may deem it necessary to do so, and shall require from them weekly statements, verified upon oath by every said Banker and his Cashier, or by the President and Cashier of every such Banking Company; which said weekly statement shall give the following particulars of the affairs of the Bank:

1st. Capital paid in.

2d. The amount of stocks deposited with the Auditor, with a list of the same, and the rate at which they were received for circulating notes.

3d. Amount of investments in real estate.

Sec. 30th. Be it further enacted, etc., That the said statements shall be regularly filed in the office of the Board of Currency, and the statements so furnished on the last Saturday of every month, by the Bankers and Banking Companies doing business in the city of New Orleans, shall be signed by the Board of Currency and published in the official journal on the first Wednesday of each and every month. The Board of Currency shall prescribe for each Banker or Banking Company, doing business out of the city of New Orleans, a period within which their said weekly reports shall be furnished to the said Board, and said monthly statement published by the Board of Currency shall include the last weekly statement duly received from every such Banker or Banking Company.

Sec. 31. Be it further enacted, etc., That a list of the stockholders in every Banking Corporation doing business under this Act, verified by the oath of the President or Cashier, shall be furnished monthly to the Board of Currency, but need not be published with their monthly reports.

Sec. 32. Be it further enacted, etc., That the Legislature shall annually appoint a joint committee of the two Houses, whose duty it shall be to examine the securities deposited by Bankers and Banking Companies, together with all books and papers relating to the business of banking under this act; Also to count all circulating bills which may have been returned by any banker or banking company, and after comparing them with the books, to cancel and destroy the same, giving the Auditor a sufficient certificate for the same; and generally to make such investigations as they may deem proper to enable them to report a true statement of the condition of the Banks operating under this law.

Sec. 33. Be it further enacted, etc., That any Banker, and any Director, Officer, Agent or Clerk of any Banker or Banking Company doing business under this act, who shall make false statements or entries in the books of such Banker or Banking Company, or who shall exhibit false paper or practice wilful concealment of facts within his or their knowledge, with intent to deceive the Board of Currency or other person having lawful authority to examine; or to deceive the public as to the condition of such Banker or Banking Company; as also any person who shall, with a view to defradd any such Banker or Banking Company, knowingly draw or pay any check or check or checks, without funds in the said Company drawn by such Banker, or by accessory to the drawing or paying of any upon or to the embezzlement of any of the money or assets of said Banker or Banking Company, or by any officer or agent thereof, shall be subject, on conviction, to imprisonment in the penitentiary of this State, for a term not less than one year or more than three years. And when any such false statements are made under oath, the person or persons shall be adjudged guilty of perjury, and punished according to law.

Sec. 34. Be it further enacted, etc., That all banks hereby established shall be banks of discount and deposit, as well as banks of circulation.

Sec. 35 Be it further enacted, etc., That bankers and banking companies doing business under this act, shall be taxed upon their capital stock, at the same rate as other personal property, under the laws of this State.

Sec. 36. Be it further enacted, etc., That whenever any Banker or Banking Company shall have redeemed 80 per cent. of its or their notes, and delivered to the Auditor a certificate of a deposit to the credit of the State Treasurer, in such Bank as the Auditor may approve, to an equal amount with the circulating notes still unredeemed, it shall be lawful for him to receive the same, and to give up all securities therefore deposited by such Banker or Banking Company, for the redemption of the circulating notes issued.

Sec. 37. Be it further enacted, etc., That such Bnuker or Banking Company, after having complied with the provisions of the thirty-sixth section of this act, may give notice once a fortnight for one year, in the State paper, also in a paper published in the City of New Orleans, and in a paper published in the parish in which said Banker or Banking Company has its or their domicile. INDIAN COMPOSITORS.—His fingers are small, and he picks up his type from the case with a rapidity truly astonishing. I have not seen it equaled in an English printing office. But his day's work over (and he will get in done, sometimes, in two or three hours), he is the most indolent and dissipated creature in existence. He is never out of debt, and never without a dun at his heels; but he invariably disputes all claims upon him, and never pays till he does so by order of some court. I required ten of these compositors, and engaged them at exactly double the rate of pay they received in Calcutta. "Look at the distance," they would say; "to be so far off from your families to whom you must send money, sir!" The compositors said they should require five distributors. In India a compositor never distributes his matter. He would consider it beneath his dignity. Besides, it seems to soothe his feelings to have some one under him—a human being at his book and call—somebody whom he may bully with impunity, and strike, if it pleases him. These native distributors do not know a single word of English; many cannot tell you the names of the letters; but they will fill a case as speedily and as accurately as any European. FATALITY OF FRENCH EMPRESSES.—From the wife of Charlemagne down to the marriage of Louis Napoleon, says the University Magazine, some sixty-seven in all of the royal and imperial consorts, there are but thirteen on whose names there is no dark stain of sorrow or sin. Eleven were divorced, two died by the executioner, seven wore very early widowed, three were cruelly tradueed, three were exiles, thirteen wore bad in different degrees of evil—the prisoners and the heart-broken made up the rest. About twenty were buried at St. Denis, who were denied the rest of the grave; their tombs were broken, their coffins opened, their remains exposed to the insults of a revolutionized populace, and then flung into a trenoh and covered with quiok lime.

A DOG KILLED TO BE SULD AS MUTTON.—William String, a hutoher in Ciuoinnati, was arrested a few days ago, on the charge of killing a dog, and dressing it after the fashion of dressing mutton, for the purpose of offering it for sale in market. The dog, regularly dressed, scored and prepared for market, was found suspended in his slaughter-house, and two witnesses testified before the police court that they had known the prisoner to purchase a "slunk" oalf, three days uld, and offer its meat in market for sale, and also diseased hogs. The prisoner alleged that he killed the dog to preonre its fat for medicinal purposes. The court, however, sentenced him to pay a fine of $20 and costs, to forfeit his market stall, and not to appear in market for six months.

POPULATION OF THE UNITED STATES.—William Darby has published a communication in the National Intelligencer, from which it appears that should the population of the United States continue to increase in the future, in the same ratio as during the past, the aggregate in 1950 will be 405,973,000 souls! He says that part of the Continent of North America already in the possession of the United States, falls little if any short of 3,000,000 of square miles, and therefore, when the population reaches 100,000,000, the mean density will be only thirty-three to the square mile. The existing population, amounting to 24,000,000 at most, does not reach to more than eight to the square mile.

UNIVERSALISM IN VERSE.

The Universalist preachers hold and teach the final salvation and happiness of all men. Their system is justly chargeable with all the inferences which may be deduced from its position, whether they admit them or not. This train of inferences is not a short one, and their pertinency and logical connection are unquestionable. We have just run over, among sold old pamphlets, a poem on the Universal Plan, or Univeren Explained, by John Peck. Who, what was he? We do not know. It is clear he was not a poet; but hie logic was close and vigorous; and in doggerel strains he draws out the logical consequences of believing Universalism. Universalist preachers may decry these consequences, but their creed cannot separate them from the doctrine. That the author understood the true issue is clear from the earnest tone in which he writes on this subject. It may be thought that he is not serious enough with sacred things; but there are some positions with regard to sacred things, that are little short of ridiculous, and the only way to overthrow them is to place them in the true light, as Mr. Peck has done the consequences of Universalism. Repent we may, reform and pray,
If not 'twill all be well,
For do our worst, we shan't be curst,
Nor can we get to hell.

Some think the just alone reach heaven,
But all who curse and swear,
And lie, and steal, get drunk and kill,
Find safe admittance there.

But can such naked souls as these
Angelic honors hold?
Oh, yes, they wear white raiment there,
And walk in streets of gold.

For there God gives to every knave
A bright and radiant crown;
For there they eat ambrosia sweet,
And swill the nectar down.

And all who full by suicide
Are wise beyond compare;
They spill their blood, then fly to God,
And reign eternal there.

King Pharaoh and his mighty host
Had god-like honors given;
A pleasant breeze, brought them with ease,
By water into heaven.

But still the chosen of the Lord
Through drought and danger drage,
They live in fears full forty years,
Curst with a thousand plagues.

And yet, poor fools, they loudly sang,
When they had passed the flood,
Where their blessed foes forsook all woes,
To walk in bliss with God.

As all the filthy Sodomites,
When God bid Lot retire,
Went in a trice to Paradise
On rapid wings of fire.

And there impure they rest on high,
For Jesus came to save;
But righteous Lot must take his seat
Within a lonesome cave.

Has did not Sodom's crimes pull down
God's vengeance from above?
Can flaming wrath, freighted with death,
Bestow eternal love?

Oh, yes, God saw them all in sin,
And sent that dreadful storm,
To bring them straight to heaven's height,
Their manners to reform.

And when the murm'ring, marching tribes
Requir'd a dainty dish,
And food was sent around each tent,
Well suited to their wish;

God kindly sent the raging plague,
Which brought the lustful brood
To Zion's hill, their soule to fill
With heaven's choicest food.

And thousands more made speedy flight,
As we from Scripture hear,
To scrambolize above the skies,
Because they worshipped Peor.

Proud Korah, with his factious club,
Whom hell thought to devour,
By crafty slip, too nimble trip
To heaven's lofty tower.

And when the filthy Canaanites
To Joshua's host were given,
The sun stood still, so they might kill,
And send them on to heaven.

God saw those villians were too bad,
To own that fruitful land,
He therefore took the rascals up
To dwell at his right hand.

The hardened thief upon the cross,
Mocking the Saviour there,
Went with him through the other blue
His glories there to share.

And Ananias and his wife
Soon reached the starry throne,
When they in pride had loudly lied
Unto that Sacred One.

And Judas, that perfidious wretch,
Was not for crimes accurst;
He by a cord, outwent his Lord
And got to heaven first.

And every vile, abandoned wretch
Beneath the spacious sky,
Who dieth in the act of sin,
Shall reign with God on high.

LETTER FROM ENGLAND.

[Special Correspondence of the Advocate.]

London, April 6, 1853.

It is a vulgar and mischievous error to suppose that in the days of Old and "Merrie England," the lowest classes of the laboring population were better off than they have been in recent times. Macaulay, in his History, has most luminously and conclusively investigated this point. Our agricultural laborers of to-day are the lineal successors of the serfs of Saxon and Norman days, who were hereditary bond-slaves adscripti glebæ, tied to the land, like the Russian serfs of the present hour. During the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries these serfs, almost universally, but still very gradually, acquired freedom. But yet their wages, fare, and treatment, were such as better agreed with their former condition than with their recently acquired freedom. They were the unnoticed undergrowth of the population. They were not recognized as a class whose interests were to be cared for. Of them contemporary writers made no mention. While in the Parliaments of the Tudors the demands of the commercial classes, and the claims and needs of the yeomanry, made themselves heard; there was no mention, and apparently no thought, of the condition and claims of the poor, depressed, and toiling peasantry. Low as their wages have been of late years, they were in the palmy days of England's olden time, even relatively much lower; and this state of things continued with scarcely any abatement until the close of the last century. Then, at length, the grievances and wants of these classes of our fellow-men began to attract attention; and during the present century their condition has been brought more and more under the public eye. For many years past a feeling of sympathy and concern on their behalf has been growing and deepening. Hence the multiplication of National and British Schools throughout the country districts of our land; hence the labours in the same districts of Bible readers, and of bible and tract distributors. Hence the benevolent and Christian associations which have, on every side, been organized and brought into active operation.

But there yet remained one evil, and that a radical and fental evil, which all such efforts were inadequate to amend. I allude to the wretchedly low rate of wages. It is true that this bad been, very gradually, rising for a century or two, and that this rise had been more than in proportion to the advance of price in provisions, while clothing of every description had been for many years becoming continually and rapidly cheaper. Still this rise of wages had not been by any means in the same proportion as the advance to mechanics of every kind, or as the general increase of riches and prosperity in the community at large. So that compared with other classes of laboring men, and with the nation at large, the agricultural peasantry might perhaps have been justly considered, not many years ago, as more degraded than at almost any former period of history since their serfdom.

Nor was it easy to see how their wages could be expected to rise, or their general condition to be elevated, as things stood. It was a question of supply and demand in the labor market. True, many, or most of the farmers, could have afforded better wages to their laborers, but when as yet have any class of men given good and high wages merely because they could afford it, or given in fact any more than the market price for what they buy, whether it were labor or ought else? Selfishness, and not Christian love and righteousness, is as yet the rule of general and collective action in this world. Right or wrong men will, as Peel laid it down, "buy in the cheapest, and sell in the dearest market." There was in fact a surplus agricultural population, and therefore wages could not but continue low.

But the rapid growth and spread of manufacturing industry introduced a new element into the labor market; and this was the first thing which tended materially to improve the condition of the "sons of the soil." The high wages offered to manufacturing operatives drew multitudes, especially of the young, away from the green and scented meadow and corn-land, even to work in crowded factories, and to dwell in narrow and nauseous streets and alleys. (Things in the manufacturing towns are infinitely better now than they were at first.) This diversion of labor produced its necessary result of raising the rate of wages in the neighboring agricultural districts and countries; and more or less, it has, of course, operated throughout the island, and raised them every where. Still the impression made by this diversion in the most distant and densely agricultural provinces has been but faint. The rate of peasant's wages in Lancashire has been for many years nearly double that in Wiltshire and Hampshire.

Another effect followed this manufacturing diversion. The farmers near the manufacturing towns being compelled so greatly to raise the wages of their farm-servants and day-laborers, were compelled to become proportionately more scientific and economical in cultivating and managing their farms than they had formerly been. Hence the farming of the North of England speedily became greatly superior to that of the South.

The repeal of the Corn Laws gave another turn to the wheel. This measure immensely stimulated manufacturing production; hence the agricultural population more and more crowded to the manufacturing towns. By this time the balance had completely turned. Forty years ago, or less, the agricultural laboring population much more than doubled the manufacturing. Now the manufacturing laboring population probably doubles the agricultural. The rush to the manufacturing towns was the greater because, in the first panic inspired by the repeal of the Corn Laws, many of the farmers, especially the middle and small holders, dismissed some of their laborers, and lowered the wages of the rest. But this could not last. Those who did this must have changed their system or been speedily ruined.

Indeed, there can be no doubt that the effect of repealing the Corn Laws has been exceedingly disastrous to a considerable proportion of third-rate farmers, and ruinous to some. The old monopoly (I mean the now repealed Corn Laws) secured a profit, on the average, to all steady farmers, however ignorant and wasteful might be their system of farming. They went upon a calculation of the average cost of raising corn, and were designed to secure a profit to the raisers of corn at their average cost. But the average cost of growing corn depended of course on the system of cultivation generally prevailing. Now the old, traditional, and generally prevalent system of farming, though far in advance of that practiced in France, and generally on the Continent of Europe was, notwithstanding, in itself anything but scientific or economical. In the low lands of Scotland the farming was generally excellent, and in some parts of England, especially where of late years manufacturing towns had created at the same time a market for produce, and a counter-demand for labor. But in general, you might see throughout middle, Southern, and Western England, waste in every department—science in none. All was prejudice, sturdy hard work, and old tradition. The ploughs were heavy and cumbrous, and had as many cattle used in drawing them as need have been. The most valuable manures were allowed to run to waste; thick and heavy hedges drained and overshaded the land; the fences were irregular and needlessly multiplied; at the same time wasting land and imposing useless extra labor, in following the windings of the boundary, upon man and horse—while the chemistry of agriculture, the science of sub-soiling, and artificial dressing and manuring, was for the most part either altogether unknown, or only heard of as a subject of ignorant stupid jests; nor were the mechanical inventions of recent agricultural science much more in favor. And for all this ignorance, and waste, and prejudice, the Corn Laws made the nation pay.

But with repeal of the Corn Laws came universal competition—that from without stirring up that from within. Farmers found they must be intelligent, economical, and to a certain extent scientific, or go to ruin. Now agricultural chemistry is extensively studied; steam engines and machines of every description are in vogue, manures are collected and stored, (not wasted,) hedgerows thinned or extirpated—(hardle fences in their stead are coming into extensive use,) the boundaries begin now to be right lines instead of irregular curves, the land is better cleaned and kept, fewer horses and oxen are used, but more men, and though the men demand higher wages, yet so much saving is effected by economy, and so much more with the help of the machinery is produced from the farms, that the employer can afford to pay the wages that are asked. In many instances the land produces full double what it did not many years ago.

Farmers destitute of intelligence and capital cannot, however, keep up in this race of competition; and accordingly many small farmers have been compelled to emigrate. Yet how kind is that Providence which, just at this crisis, has pointed them to such promising openings abroad!

Farmers, as a class, will soon form a very remarkable contrast to what they have hitherto generally been. They will be men of scientific intelligence and enterprise, as well as of capital. Of small farmers there will be few, because to compete successfully with other farmers, and with foreign growers, it will be necessary to employ machinery to a great extent. But to do this requires capital, and besides will not pay on a small farm.

Under these large cultivators will be employed, as in manufacturing establishments, able, active, and well educated agents and managers—some of them in the receipt of handsome salaries; who, in due time, having amassed a sufficient amount of capital, will themselves become master-farmers. And the laboring population will be paid at a rate of wages continually increasing in amount, till it rises to fair approximation—till in fact it attains to a relative equality with the wages paid to manufacturing operatives.

Nor can this issue be very long delayed. The extensive and still increasing emigration to your own Continent, and to Australia, combined with the high and still increasing rate of wages paid to manufacturing operatives, must soon create such a pressing scarcity of agricultural labour as will compel the farmers, first, to give the highest remuneration in their power to their laborers, and then to look on every hand for mechanical inventions to diminish the immediate demand for hand labor. In the end, we know, the application of machinery both multiplies the demand for human labor, and enables the employer to augment his rate of payment. But it does this by cheapening the cost of production and increasing its amount, and thus enabling the employer successfully to compete with others, so extending his market and augmenting his gains. Thus, if an employer finding himself unable to employ a sufficient number of laboring hands at the wages demanded, calls in the aid of machinery, this is an immediate relief to himself, and an eventual benefit to all parties.

By such a train of events is Providence doing away with the last relics of serfdom in Britain. Thus is the Divine Wisdom and Goodness elevating all classes of the community.

In Ireland, however, the change has been far more sudden and marvellous than in England, and brought about in another way. The great curse of that country has undoubtedly been Popery; but another most disastrous fact connected with the condition of that ill-fated land has been the system of continual sub-division of farms among the children, grand-children, and posterity of the holders, vegetating generation after generation, upon the same spot. These sub-divided farms were generally let on rack-rents; and the more they were subdivided the higher in proportion grew the rent. So mounted the rent-roll of the landlord—so deepened the misery, from father to son, of the continually impoverished tenants. Imagine this system going on till in some districts there were almost as many wretched and groveling holders, detesting their landlord, and crouching under the priest, as there were acres on the estate! Nor could these poor people be induced to migrate from their native spot, or to change their occupation. Every native Irishman esteemed himself a gentleman—the land belonged to his fathers, and he would not leave it. Perhaps sacred or royal blood ran in his veins; how could he degrade himself by taking to mechanic labor or a trade! To beg or starve were better. Such was a very prevalent feeling not many years ago. But the potato-famine and other causes have changed all this. And now the nation, in their "Exodus," seem as hasty and unanimous to quit their fatherland, as for ages they were obstinate in clinging to their ancestral soil. And the idle, lounging, uncleanly Irishman, of Tipperary, becomes abroad a different, a contrasted being.

What has been the consequence of this? That at this moment there is much less pauperism in Ireland than even in England—prosperous as our country has now been for so long a time.

The total number of persons—aged, infirm, idiots, orphans and friendless, foundlings, maimed, vagabonds, or out of work, men, women and children, who were relieved in the workhouses or from the public funds, in England, during the first week of the present year, were 731,483, out of a population of 15,157, 505, being (not one in eight, as some American writers have supposed,) but one in twenty-one. In Ireland, the same week, the number was 141,822, out of 6,515,794, being one in forty-six, a proportion indicating not a redundancy, but a scarcity of hands in the labor-market. So that in Ireland, at this moment, there is only half the pauperism that there is in England. It must, however, be remembered that professional begging is still much more extensively practiced, and more tolerated in Ireland than in England; and that there, also, the practice of poor relatives resorting numerously and as a matter of course to their more prosperous kindred, to live upon them from month to month, and from year to year, is yet far from extinct, though much less prevalent than it was. The estimate of population above from the census of 1851 is, also, it should be remarked, probably above the reality, emigration having gone on more rapidly than ever during the last twenty months.

Meantime, whilst this emigration increases the wages of the remaining peasantry, it lowers the resources of the resident and now often surplus priesthood. The following paragraph, from the Dublin Post, a Popish paper, is significant:

"There is another country which needs not to be named, that imperatively demands the interposition of the State with regard to its Catholic clergy. In that country these were hitherto maintained by the voluntary contributions of their flocks; but these are departing from the shepherds with a rapidity unexampled in the annals of the human race. The priests, except in the cities and great towns, are left without any income whatever; and if Government do not speedily step forward to their rescue from utter destitution, we see no other end to it but that they will perforce be compelled to join in the Exodus. We confess we are only surprised that this course has not been already taken to a very considerable extent. It has not, however. Very few Catholic clergymen have left for America or Australia; but we may be quite certain, if means be not found to keep them at home, that the young and healthy must betake themselves to exile."

So in Ireland, in Piedmont, and in Italy, generally, Popery is losing ground; while not only does it seem to be advancing in France and Germany, but even Holland, once republican, and Presbyterian, and puritan, has so far degenerated as a commonwealth, and so far been infected and penetrated by a proselyting Popery, that it has lately degraded itself to ask his Holiness to re-establish the Papal Arch-Bishopric of Utrecht, and the whole subordinate hierarchy—which had been abolished since the days of the Reformation. Alas, for Holland! No apostacy of which I have read in history has so sadly and deeply impressed me as this.

The Kuffir war is at last certainly terminated. So also, it appears, is the Birmese war, virtually if not formally; but "more," according to the proverb, "by good luck than good guidance." The old tyrant of Birmah has been unseated by a younger brother who wishes to be in alliance with the British.

The Porte has succumbed absolutely, first, to Austria, and then to Russia. The particulars of the latter affair are not yet fully known. The rashness of French diplomacy, and arrogance of French pretensions, in regard to the protection, as it was styled, of Latin or Romish priests and devotees at the "sacred places," has afforded this pretext for interference to the Czar, who considers himself the head of the Greek Church, and champions its interests. The interests of Britain are identified with those of Turkey, which is one of our very best customers, and whose commercial and religious regulations are vastly more liberal than those of Austria or Russia.

The income of our Missionary Society for the past year is now ascertained to be £105,370 19s. 6d. That of the previous year, exclusive of Mr. Marriott's legacy of £10,000, was £103,780 19s. 9d., so that the increase on the regular income is £2,639 19s. 9d. To God be all the glory!

The following, which I extract from the Church and State Gazette, will interest your readers:

"Illustrations of the truth of Scripture are constantly being collected by travelers in distant lands. The narrative of the gallant but unfortunate Richardson, to Central Africa, has just been given to an expectant and now gratified public. While Richardson was sojourning with his colleague, also now deceased, Dr. Overweg, at Tintalous, the residence of the Sultan of En-Noor, they witnessed some very interesting natural phenomena. Among others was the following: 'About four o'clock in the afternoon there was a cry in the encampment, 'El wady jaee!' 'The wady is coming!' Going out to look, I saw a broad white sheet of foam advancing from the South between the trees of the valley. In ten minutes after a river of water came pouring along, and spread around us, converting the place of our encampment into an isle of the valley. The current in its deepest part was very powerful, capable of carrying away sheep and cattle, and of uprooting trees. This is one of the most interesting phenomena I have witnessed during my present tour in Africa. The scene, indeed, was perfectly African. Rain had been observed falling in the South; black clouds and darkness covered that zone of the heavens; and an hour afterwards came pouring down this river of water into the dry parched-up valley. This incident of Wady Tintaghoda explains the Scriptural phrase, 'rivers of water;' for here, indeed, was a river of water appearing in an instant, and almost without notice.' This will furnish matter for those who are accustomed to annotate their copies of Scripture."

Rappings and Spirit manifestations are attracting attention and coming to vogue, I lament to say, in this country. X. Y.

THE FUTURE LIFE.

[If William Cullen Bryant had never written but the following lines, they would give him a perfect title to the name of Poet:]

How shall I know thee in the sphere which keeps
The disembodied spirits of the dead,
When all of thee that time could wither, sleeps
And perishes among the dust we tread?

For I shall feel the sting of ceaseless pain
If there I meet thy gentle spirit not;
Nor hear the voice I love, nor read again
In thy serenest eyes the tender thought.

Will not thy own meek heart demand me there?
That heart whose fondest throbs to me were given?
My name on earth was ever in thy prayer,
Shall it be banished from thy tongue in heaven?

In meadows fanned by heaven's life-breathing wind,
In the resplendence of that glorious sphere,
And larger movements of the unfettered mind,
Wilt thou forget the love that joined us here?

The love that lived through all the stormy past,
And meekly with thy harsher nature bore,
And deeper grew, and tenderer to the last,
Shall it expire with life, and be no more?

A happier lot than mine, and larger light,
Await thee there; for thou hast bowed thy will
In cheerful homage to the rules of right,
And lovest all, and rendest good for ill.

For me, the sordid cares in which I dwell
Shrink and consume the heat, as heat the scroll;
And wrath hath left its scar—that fire of hell
Has left its frightful scar upon my soul.

Yet, though thou wear'st the glory of the sky,
Wilt thou not keep the same beloved name,
The same fair thoughtful brow, and gentle eye,
Lovelier in heaven's sweet climate, yet the same?

Shall I not teach me in that calmer home,
The wisdom that I learned so ill in this—
The wisdom which is love—till I become
Thy fit companion in that land of bliss?

SINS EXAMINED ONE BY ONE.

BY REV. WILLIAM WISNER, D. D.

About a year ago a leading member of one of the evangelical churches in this place, inquired of me whether I remembered preaching a sermon in which I urged the importance of calling up to our recollection our sins one by one, and examining them in detail, and confessing them individually to God.

I told him I did recollect preaching a sermon upon that subject some years previous to our conversation.

He said he should never forget that discourse, for it was the means in the hand of God of bringing him to the Saviour. He had always, previous to that time, examined his sins in the gross, and confessed them in the gross, and though he could see that they were very many, and knew that they were great, yet he could get no definite view of their enormity, and usually left off about where he began. On returning home from that meeting he went to his barn, and there while alone with his God, he commenced the work of self-examination upon the plan which I had recommended. He had not proceeded far in this work before his sins rose up before him like a black cloud, and pressed him down like a heavy burden—too heavy for him to bear; and before he left the place of his retirement, he was enabled to cast his burden upon the crucified Redeemer, and to rejoice in the hope of the glory of God.

If impenitant sinners would examine themselves as this man did—if they would look at each particular sin, so far as they can remember them, as so many specifications in an indictment drawn up against them by their righteous Judge, and would bear in mind that they must each of them be washed out by the blood of Christ, or be answered to before the judgment seat in the last day, they would not remain long in their present careless state, but would be pricked in their hearts, and inquire what they should do to be saved.

If Christians, too, would look at their sins one by one, and confess them, and pray over them separately, and feel that the pardon of each one must be bought with the price of the Saviour's blood, there would be more humility, and more deep repentance and godly sorrow in the Church; and in proportion as these graces should abound, Christ would become more precious in the eyes, and to the hearts of his people, and his love would constrain them to live more above the world, and to devote themselves more entirely to his holy service.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

MRS. MARGARETTA E. HILL.

Mr. Editor:—Nothing but severe indisposition has prevented my friendship from paying, ere this, the tribute of respect which I feel due to the memory and to the virtues of loved and lamented Sister Hill.

It has been my pleasure and privilege for the last fourteen years to know her as a friend and a brother; and during all that time, have only known her to respect and love her more. Sister Hill was comparatively a young woman, yet "seeking the Lord early," she had been a quarter of a century a member of God's Church, and in that respect was almost "a mother in Israel." Sister Hill's home has always been the home of God's ministers, where they ever met from all her family a cordial and a Christian welcome. It is not likely that there is a sister Methodist in the South who has personally entertained so many of our bishops and ministers as Sister Hill; and scores of them will read with more than common emotion, that they are to see her friendly smile, and take her cordial hand no more "until the resurrection of the just."

There are some traits in Sister Hill's character worthy of our especial remembrance and emulation. She possessed great simplicity and transparency of character. She was just what she seemed to be—as free, I think, as any one I ever saw from affected or ostentatious deportment.

She was a candid woman. She freely and plainly expressed her mind. I never once, during my long friendship, heard her use any of the unmeaning and varnished phrases so common in the mouth of the fashionable. She pretended to no joy, nor sorrow at meeting and parting, which she did not feel. But one of the most valuable and commendable traits of her character was firmness—an unyielding adherence to principle and Christian duty. Many circumstanced as Sister Hill would not have had the firmness to have resisted the temptations to fashionable gaities and sinful amusements, as she uniformly did. All who knew her, knew she claimed to live and act like a Christian and a Methodist.

Her affliction was long and of the most distressingly afflictive character, yet she bore it with that resignation and fortitude which only the strength of God can impart.

She had an only son, (her other children died in early childhood:) for this son, especially for his spiritual and immortal good, she felt all the solicitude which a Christian mother's heart can feel. For the sake of this son, though suffering, she long desired life; but told me some weeks before her death, that she felt she could leave him in the hands of God. During all her illness her mind was calm and unclouded in relation to immortal interests.

It was among her last requests that when her dying hour should come, the writer and her family should be gathered together, and sing that solemnly beautiful hymn of Charles Wesley's, which has so long been hallowed in the hearts of the thousands of our Israel, and especially consecrated to the devotions of the domestic altar:

"A charge to keep I have,
A God to glorify."

And then to join ones more with her in family worship before, she went to join "the family in heaven." At midnight, on the last day of the week, we thus gathered together; from full hearts the song poured forth, bedewed with our tears. It seemed to rouse her failing consciousness to a lively appreciation of the scene. Towards the dawn of the Sabbath, very early, while it was yet dark, her peaceful spirit passed away. Thus Christiane die:

"They sol as sols the morning star, which goes
Not down behind the darkened west, nor hides
Obscured among the tempests of the sky,
But melts away into the light of heaven."

Hundreds will realize that they have lost a friend. But most of all a bereaved husband, and sorrowing son, will realize that the best of wives and mothers has been taken from the hearth-stone forever. But we must all be comforted with the consoling reflection, that while the Church has lost a Christian, Heaven has gained an Angel.

New Orleans. J. B. Walker.

Qualification for an English Bishop.

The lively London correspondent of the Inverness Courier tells the following story respecting the elevation of a member of the Denison family from a curacy to the bishopric of Salisbury, by Lord Melbourn:

"One of the family applied to his lordship for the preferment of his brother, the curate, to a living. "How old is he?" was the Premier's reply. "Thirty-six," answered the applicant. "Too young," returned the Premier, "far too young. We only give the livings to the old parsons; but at the same, if there were a bishopric vacant, would your relative accept of it?" Of course, to a such a question, there could be but one response, on which the cool Premier instructed his suitor to send the candidate for episcopal honors to him, as he wanted to see if he was fit for a bishop. Accordingly the reverend gentleman hurried to present himself, but was somewhat staggered when Lord Melbourne gravely shook his head, and leaning back in his chair muttered: "Ah! too young, too young-looking for a bishop!" "My Lord," the reverend gentleman is reported to have said, "My Lord, does this please you better?" and so saying, he slipped off a dashing curly wig, and exposed a most grave, philosophic and dignified bald head. He looked quite another man in a moment, and the Premier starting to his feet exclaim: "My dear, sir, I congratulate you; you have every requisite that I know of for being a bishop."

Bishop McCoskrey on Common Schools.

We gave last week some extracts from the memorial of the Episcopal Bishop of Michigan, to the Legislature of that State, asking for his share of the School fund, if it must be divided. The petition was evidently intended to expose the cunning and impudence of the Romish Bishop's pretensions and demands. A correspondent of the Christian Observer, who seems to have been present when Bishop McCoskrey's counter memorial was read in the Senate, gives the following description of its effect upon the minds of "the grave and reverend seniors:"

"The effect of this memorial, which so handsomely applied to Bishop LeFevre, was conclusive upon the minds of the Legislature, and when read in the Senate chamber, caused the worthy Catholic prelate, and his hand of lobbying priests, to make a hasty retreat from the room amid the laughter of all present, and hurry back to Detroit. While I have no fears that the virtue of the country members (for to them alone could the friends of Free Schools look in this emergency) would have allowed the proposed amendment of the School Law to pass, even though Bishop McCoskrey had not spoken; yet I am frank to admit that his memorial did more than any other to put a quietus upon this unworthy scheme, and to drive the Catholic Bishop and his priests from the halls of legislation back to their proper sphere. In this Democratic State of ours, one Bishop was regarded by the Legislature as full as good in all respects as another; and if they yielded to Bishop LeFevre's request for Catholics, they would then have to do the same to Bishop McCoskrey for the Episcopalians, to Dr. Duffield for the Presbyterians, and so to all other denominations who saw fit to ask for a share of the spoils; and thus our noble school fund would be frittered away into sectarian schools and colleges, and the door of the republican common school be forever closed. The Legislature at once resolved that no legislation was needed at present in reference to the school law, and so the subject was dismissed from their consideration."

Eloquence.

There are two sorts of eloquence; the one indeed scarce deserves the name of it, which consists chiefly in labored and polished periods, an over-curious and artificial arrangement of figures, tinselled over with a gaudy embellishment of words which glitter, but convey little or no light to the understanding. This kind of writing is for the most part much affected and admired by people of weak judgment and vicious taste, but is a piece of affectation and formality which the sacred writers are utter strangers to. It is a vain and boyish eloquence, and has always been esteemed below the great geniuses of all ages. The other sort of eloquence is quite the reverse of this, and may be said to be the true characteristic of the Holy Scriptures—where the excellence does not arise from labored and far-fetched elocution, but from a suprising mixture of simplicity and majesty. Hints to Parents.

Few parents realize how much their children may be taught at home by devoting a few minutes to their instructions every day. Let a parent make a companion of his child, converse with him familiarly, put him questions, answer inquiries, communicate facts, awaken curiosity, explain difficulties, the meaning of things, and the reason of things, and all this in an easy, playful manner, without seeming to impose a task, and he himself will be astonished at the progress which will be made. The experiment is so simple that none need hesitate about its performance.

Fixed Law of Society.—In society we find a law running through the most apparently uncertain events. Thus the proportion of men and women born into the world has been so nearly ascertained, that we can guess very near the proportion of boys and girls that will be born in any place at a given time. The proportion is about 106 males to 100 females. There have been various reasons assigned why there should be more males than females come into the world. Some say the surplus of men is in allowance for wars and accidents, to which men are more exposed. Others, that the six to every hundred are given on account of the celibacy of the Catholic priesthood. Others, again, suppose that society needs a certain infusion of old bachelors, to give it flavor, as lemons to punch. But the most philosophical reason, probably, is that given by a lady, the other day, who said it was to produce a proper equilibrium of character between the sexes—100 women amounting to as much as 106 men. Suppose the law changed, and three-fourths of the persons born to be males. What a state of society should we have? It would be like that of San Francisco, in the early age of gold digging—and no shirt type of hell. If the reverse should happen, and three-fourths of humanity become females, every year would be a leap-year. The poor males would be obliged to hold Worcester Conventions in favor of the rights of men, and the propriety of the Bloomer costume.

"Homes have gone out of fashion, the Sunday Times thinks. "The mother, in grand toilette, deserts the crib and the cosy sofa in the corner, for the drawing-room in the hotel or boarding-house; the daughters follow (and frequently exceed) the example of their mother; the sons resort to the billiard-room, the bowling-alley, the coffee-house, or the theatre, while the discontented papa, exiled from home, seeks compensation for the cares of business and the disappointments of his home—where, we will not even venture to guess. Such habits of life inevitably beget carelessness, extravagance, profligacy—sometimes even crime. This pernicious hotel and boarding-house life is the curse of the wealthy and idle classes. It promotes extravagance, gossip, gadding, insincerity, and general depravity of the whole moral nature. A community thus, as it were, deprived of the grand central attraction and regulator of home, must tend towards all sorts of evils and disasters." Our neighbor overstates the case. It is not the "entire community" that have deserted their homes, but an inconsiderable fraction of the same. There are still a few homes of the old sort left.

EPISCOPAL APPOINTMENTS.

Brother McTyeire:—I see you have published a list of appointments suggested by me some time, not long since, for the Conferences of the Middle District. The times therein given were only proposed, and not by any means finally fixed. They were published to elicit correspondence on the subject, in order to the most satisfactory arrangement in my power. You will oblige me by publishing the following list as final:

Western Virginia, at Clarkesburg...Aug. 24
Kentucky, at Versailles.....Sept. 14
Louisville, at Owensboro.....Sept 28
Tennessee, at Franklin.....Oct. 12
Memphis, at Grenada.....Nov. 2
Mississippi, at Port Gibson.....Nov. 23
Louisiana, at Mansfield.....Dec. 14

Dedication.—The new Methodist Church, on Carondelet street, will be dedicated on Sunday morning next, at eleven o'clock. Dedicatory sermon and services by Rev. C. Parsons, D. D. The Public are invited to attend. Seats free.

Acknowledgment.—The Ministerial Education Society, of Alabama is under way in contributions. Rev. T. W. Dorman, Treasurer, acknowledges the receipt of $10,00 from Rev. George Shaeffer. The Treasurer says to all: "Go, and do likewise."

Information Wanted.—Rev. A. Castle seeks information concerning a box of books shipped to his address, in December last, from Jackson, Mississippi, to Clinton, Louisiana. Information may be sent to him at Smithdale, Amite county, Mississippi.

Centenary College, (La.)—This Institution, says the Jackson Mirror, has enrolled in its several departments more than two hundred and fifty students during the current year, and still others are arriving. The annual catalogue will show a much larger number than ever entered the College before in one year.

Summerfield (Ala.) Conference.—Rev. C. C. Callaway, pastor, informs us that the revival meeting noticed some weeks ago has had gracious results. About sixty souls have professed conversion, and the Church, before strong in this favored place, has been strengthened.

Marion (Ala.) Conference.—We learn from Dr. Hamilton, who is recently from this place, that a protracted meeting of great interest and power has been and is still in progress. About ninety souls have professed conversion, a majority of whom have joined the Church. This work of grace has embraced a very influential portion of the community. We are happy to learn that Dr. Neely, the pastor, is sustained in health and strength for the work.

Tyler Circuit, (Texas.)—Rev. H. B. Hamilton, pastor, writes of an interesting meeting in this circuit, at which about forty souls professed conversion, and were added to the Church. The letter itself has been mislaid, to our regret, as it contained details and especially acknowledges the labor and usefulness of the local ministry in that portion of the vineyard.

Lagrange College, (Ala.)—The commencement notice may be seen in another column. It will put in motion a large number of visitors. This institution, of old and good report, has amply repaid the Church for all the solicitude and aid expended on it, and is prepared for large and continued efficiency in the cause of education. The corps of instructors is full, having five Professors, besides a Principal of Grammar School. Tried men they are, willing and able to do their work.

The fall session will open the thirteenth day of July, thus enabling students to arrive on the College Mountain before the sickly season.

The Income of the Wesleyan Missionary Society for 1852.

The income of the Wesleyan Missionary Society for the year 1852, is now ascertained to be £105,370 19s. 6d. That for last year, not counting Mr. Marriott's legacy of £10,000, was £102,730 19s. 9d., showing an increase on the regular income of last year, above the one preceding it of £2,639 19s. 9d. This result will be regarded by all the friends of the Society as a clear and encouraging proof of the divine case over the mission work.

An Anecdote.

The following anecdote is related of the late Duke of Wellington. It is both good and true:

A vacancy occurring some years ago in a [illegible] in Ireland, a clerical dignitary, who [illegible] he had peculiar claims on his Grace's interest, wrote him as follows: "My dear Duke, one word from you, and I am Bishop." Prompt came the reply: "My dear ——, not one word!"

REPORT OF THE PUBLISHING COMMITTEE.

The Publishing Committee of the New Orleans Christian Advocate, appointed by the Alabama and Louisiana Conferences, beg leave to offer to the patronizing Conferences and subscribers the following report:

The Committee are glad to find that, though commenced under unusual circumstances, the fiscal condition of the paper is safe. They find the present number of subscribers to be rising of four thousand, and steadily increasing—though not as rapidly as the very low price of the paper would warrant us to expect.

During the past year, upon a survey of all the circumstances, it was determined, in order to meet the wants of the many in the community, and thus widen the sphere of its usefulness, to reduce the price of the paper to One Dollar and Fifty Cents per annum. This was an experiment which had never been ventured upon by any paper in our Church; but we are happy to be able to say that so far it is succeeding fully equal to calculations.

It is very desirable that four thousand additional subscribers should be added to the present list this year. And this can easily be done, if all the friends will do as well as some have done. At present they are coming in only at the rate of about fifteen hundred per annum.

Many of the Agents have done and are doing nobly. There are many more who, we hope, will feel the importance of doing all they can for it. The present condition of things throughout the country, and particularly in this city, in which Romanism, true to its principles, is laboring to get control of, or destroy the systems of Public School instruction, demands that every public print, that has the courage or principle to speak out upon the subject, should be sustained.

In view of this, and many other considerations, we are more than ever convinced of the importance of sustaining a religious paper for our Church at this point.

It would greatly aid the Publishers if Agents, having funds in their hands, would make prompt remittances. The sums thus retained make a much larger amount than brethren would suppose.

The Committee regret to find that a large balance remains of amounts due from the subscribers of 1851 and 1852. They request both Agents and Editor to take such steps as in their judgment may be efficient to collect this balance.

Of the able and efficient Editor it is unnecessary for us to speak, as the public is already acquainted with his merits. He is re-elected for the coming year.

In conclusion, we earnestly commend the enterprise to all the friends of the Church, as one that has already accomplished great good, and one by which immense moral influence can be wielded through a wide region; can be increased at the pleasure of its friends, and one which, therefore, must be sustained.

PROFESSOR AGASSIZ' LECTURES.

We had rare satisfaction in attending the course of five, including the introductory. Audiences have been steadily and unusually large. The Lyceum Committee have shown proper spirit and judgment in securing such eminent reputation and ability for the entertainment and instruction of the people. This is the age of lectures, and let us have the best.

One cannot help wishing that Professor Agassiz would lighten his close, heavy, scientific materials, with an occasional flight of imagination, or even indulging a little fancy. But on the Professor goes, diverted and diverting by nothing,—laying his sentences as closely upon each other as the geological strata, and crowding more into the compass of an hour's talk, than any hour's talk we ever listened to. Notwithstanding this fault, as a popular lecturer, Professor Agassiz' modest manner, and master thoroughness, held the attention of promiscuous audiences, and gained their liking. Through the broken medium of a foreign language, he is remarkably perspicuous.

The matter of these lectures, save those on the Coral Reefs of Florida, and the Human Races, may be found more at length in a small volume, published a few years ago by him in connection with Professor Gould, of Boston.

It was the lecture on the "Races," that every body held back to hear with highly excited interest, and we heard it on Tuesday night—the last. The previous positions of the lecturer, as to the age of the Earth, were not irreconcileable to versions of the Mosaic record accepted by many learned and evangelical men—versions suggested before geology was a science. But how could the theory that the human race had a diversity of origin be received, and the Bible not rejected? Prof. Agassiz not only claims a different origin for the Caucasian, Mogul, Malay, Indian, Negro, Patagonian and Bushman races, but subdivides this division, denying a common parentage to the various tribes of these races! This upsets not only Bible history, but the entire system of human redemption by Jesus Christ, and its correlative and cognate doctrines.

Knowing that the distinguished lecturer was the back-bone of this diversity theory, so much vaunted by some modern infidel philosophers, we took our seat in the Lyceum Hall, last Tuesday evening, expecting at least a highly plausible and ingenious argument. "The foundations" were not removed, and we don't think they were much moved in any body's mind. We are unconscious of any influence urging us inconsistent with candor, and love of the truth, when we say it was a "lame and impotent conclusion." We felt it: the audience felt it: the lecturer felt it. The most interesting, it was the least satisfactory of his lectures.

Making due allowance for want of liberty in discussing a theory, delicate in its relations to facts, before a mixed audience, and the shortness of time for outlining and establishing a great theory, it was yet a failure attributable to the essential weakness of the cause. It failed to convince even those who were willing to believe.

A single instance: The argument for the unity of all human races, derived from the radical likeness of all human languages was acknowledged as forcible by Professor A., and he answered it by adopting a philological method which he honestly confessed was not only different from, but opposed to the methods of all other scientific men!

We like to see, and look without solicitude, on these shakings-up of facts and theories. There is no danger but truth will triumph; and God's word is truth. The Author of Nature and Revelation is the same. His works do not, cannot, contradict each other when understood.

We rejoice not only in the height and depth, but the length and breadth of the Redemption. Yea, and we will rejoice! Christ shall gather unto Him the saved, out of all nations, and tongues, and kindreds, and people! Together may they sing, from the rivers to the ends of the Earth:

"Lord we are vile, conceived in sin
And born unholy and unclean;
Sprung from the man whose guilty fall
Pollutes his race and taints us all."

And together are they addressed:

"Look unto Him, ye nations; own,
Your God, ye fallen race;
Look, and be saved by faith alone,
Be justified by grace."

LOUISIANA LEGISLATURE.

This body adjourned last Saturday. Many interests highly concerning the State were acted upon. The Government was to a considerable extent reorganized under the New Constitution. The Executive and Judicial departments somewhat modified. A system of levecing and of draining, and bringing into market the large and rich domain of swamp lands, ceded to the State by the Federal Government, was enacted. Last week we published the new Bank Act. Railroad Companies have been chartered. The State has subscribed to the three great railroads projected, the Opelousas, Great Northern, and Texas, nearly three and a half millions of dollars. This forms an era in the history of internal improvements.

Among the last acts was the election of Hon. John Slidell to the unexpired term of Mr. Soulé in the United States Senate. The Catholic School Memorial, of which our readers have been advised, was left in profound slumber "in Committee." Though lobbying priests labored hard, no bill was reported. We trust no warning is necessary to the people of Louisiana, that this priestcraft scheme is not dead but sleepeth. Its hissing will yet be heard at ward and primary meetings, and around the polls where future legislatures are made. Beginning to work further off from the State-house, and taking time by the forelock, the Archbishop of New Orleans, and his foreign allies with shaven heads, hope to succeed better another time.

THE OUTSIDERS.

The Register of Philadelphia is a "successor" to the Banner of the Cross. The succession has been in all respects an improvement. The Register's discussions of questions of a politico-religious nature are especially marked with ability. But it cannot keep clear of high-churchism though the Banner died of it.

We were more amused than grieved at an editorial expression in a late number. It was so characteristic. The editor, in course of presenting the missionary operations of the various churches, (sects!) passing them in instructive review before his readers, condescendingly avows:

"We are free to confess to a desire to know, as fully as possible, what is doing by those who are without, in spreading, after their own fashion, what they are fully persuaded to be the truth."

"By those who are without!" The italicising is ours. Is it not amusing, downright, to imagine this high-churchman, and the handful he represents, as "within?" Yes, inside the Church—inside the temple! Full of self-complacence, they confess to a desire to know what is doing by those "without." Evangelical activity "without" is turning the world upside down, and those within hear great noises, and feel commotions, but are not shaken out of their opinion of themselves. They still consider themselves the center.

The Register quit reviewing the work "going on without" the Church, before getting through. It went far enough, however, to notice that small concern, the A. B. F. M. Society, and the Baptist Board, and a few other such "outsiders," compared to whose zeal, labors, expenditures, and largeness of operation, the Episcopal Church is as a drop in a bucket!

No doubt the Register's readers began to think the "outsiders" were doing something. But when will such arrogant pretension get ashamed of itself?

Why did the Register stop? Perhaps it began to appear that the hope of the world, and the mission of Christianity, lay outside the Church! A rather hard statement. Or perhaps the Register, intent on grouping everything around his favorite center, got into the fix of the Quixotic peasant, who was so high that the earth seemed no bigger than a grain of mustard-seed, and the people on it about the size of hickory nuts!

A Jackson Man.—We like that trait in General Jackson's character which said, "I take the responsibility." Here is an agent of this sort, whose letter covers a handsome remittance:

Dear Sir:—I have assumed the responsibility of becoming agent for your very excellent paper in a small way. I have taken upon me this responsibility in view of two consideration: First, We have had no circuit preacher lately, and consequently no agents. It became necessary for some one to act, as some of us have desired to make small remittances. But, again, I desire very much that the New Orleans Christian Advocate should have an extended circulation. Not only in view of its intrinsic worth, but from the fact that it has led off in the experiment in reduction of price. Cheapen our publications is most undoubtedly, in my humble opinion, the true doctrine.

Slavery in England.

The following frightful account of white slavery in London, which we extract from an English paper, is commended to the special attention of the hundreds of thousands of ladies in England who are preparing to give Mrs. Stowe a national welcome for exposing the evils of negro slavery in the United States. As Mrs. Stowe has so largely profited by her first novel, we commend this as a subject for a second, in which her imagination would not be so severely taxed in search of the pathetic. The article is from the London Times, and is written by what is called a "first-hand" sempstress, for which she has been prescribed by her humane employers.

"I have been engaged in this business for fourteen years at different 'first-class houses,' and as my health is now suffering from the 'late hour system,' I have been prevailed upon by this medium to give that information which experience has taught me, in the hope that some enterprising and humane individuals will exert themselves to break the chains of that slavery under which so many thousands of their countrywomen are bound.

"I will now speak of a recent engagement of mine, and which in the 'one' case will illustrate the majority of the 'West-end houses.' I held the position of what is called 'first-hand,' and had twelve young people under me. The season commenced about the middle of March. We breakfasted at six A. M., which was not allowed to occupy more than a quarter of an hour. The hard work of the day began immediately. At eleven o'clock a small piece of dry bread was brought to each as luncheon. At that hour the young people would often ask my permission to send for a glass of beer, but this was strictly prohibited by the principals, as they insisted that it caused a drowsiness, and so retarded the work. At one the dinner bell rang, which repast consisted of a hot joint twice in the week, and cold meat the remaining five days, no pudding, and a glass of toast and water to drink. To this meal twenty minutes were given. Work again till the five o'clock summons for tea, which occupied fifteen minutes. Again to work till called to supper at nine, which also occupied fifteen minutes, and consisted of bread, dry cheese and a glass of beer. All again turned to the stitch, stitch, till one, two or three o'clock in the morning, according to the business, while Saturday night was being anticipated all the week, because then no one would work after twelve. With this one night's exception, all the rest we had for six weeks, from the end of May till the middle of June, was from three to six, while two nights during that time we never lay down. I leave your readers to imagine the spectral countenances of us all. I shudder myself when I recall the picture.

"At midnight I very frequently let all put down their work to doze for ten minutes, while, with my watch on the table, I kept guard, and at about one o'clock each one received a cup of strong tea—as the principals said—'in case we should feel sleepy, to arouse all to work.' In what state of health could July, the termination of the 'season,' be expected to find us poor 'English slaves?' The sequel is easily told. Each one, instead of going to enjoy a little recreation, went home to lie upon a sick bed. For myself, I was attacked with a serious illness, which laid me up for three months, and has greatly impaired my constitution.

"I would endeavor to make known another 'crying evil' which, in 'millinery and dressmaking houses,' demands also immediate reformation. I allude to the 'sleeping-rooms,' or more properly 'sleeping-pens,' in which young people, after a laborious day's work, of perhaps twenty hours out of the twenty-four, are expected to rest, to obtain that refreshing sleep so necessary to fit them for the duties of the day. In most of these dormitories, six, eight, and even ten sleep. Imagine the putrid air generated by the breath of ten persons sleeping in one close room, without a chimney, or any sort of ventilation, with scarcely space to move in, their own trunks and boxes supplying the place of washstand, drawers and dressing-table. This, I assure you, is the case with all the 'assistants,' except the 'first hand,' who always make an arrangement to have either a room to themselves, or shared only with the other 'first hand.' But this is more than the other young people dare to ask for—even dare to wish for—on pain of dismissal, with the reproach, 'O, you are too particular for houses of business!'"

The London Times comments with great severity on this odious system of degradation, and charges it, in no small degree, to the very ladies who, while weeping over the fictions of Uncle Tom's Cabin, can thus countenance the oppression and murder of their own white sisterhood. Referring to their change from their working to their sleeping rooms, the Times says:

"The alteration is from the tread-mill (and what a tread-mill!) to the Black Hole of Calcutta. Not a word of remonstrance is allowed, or is possible. The seamstresses may leave the mill, no doubt; but what awaits them on the other side of the door? Starvation, if they be honest; if not, in all probability, prostitution and its consequences. They would scarcely escape from slavery that way. Surely this is a very terrible state of things, and one which claims the anxious consideration of the ladies of England, who have pronounced themselves so loudly against the horrors of negro slavery in the United States. Had this system of oppression against persons of their own sex been really exercised in New Orleans, it would have elicited from them many expressions of sympathy for the sufferers and of abhorrence for the cruel taskmasters who could so cruelly overwork wretched creatures so unfitted for the toil. It is idle to use any further mystification in the matter. The scenes of misery we have described exist at our own doors, and in the most fashionable quarter of luxurious London. It is in the dress-making and millinery establishments of the 'West-end' that the system is steadily pursued. The continuous labor is bestowed upon the gay garments in which the 'ladies of England' love to adorn themselves. It is to satisfy their whims and caprices, that their wretched sisters undergo these days and nights of suffering and toil."

Early Impressions.—"The old Monks of the Middle Ages had a way of erasing the ancient writings from parchment, that they might substitute the legend of a saint for a Book of Livy. But there is no art of monks, no device of chemist, no tears of repentance even, which can blot from the child's mind the early impressions received in the school room. They strike through like the red letters on a bank bill."

CITY CORRESPONDENCE.

The following extract from a letter of a traveling Jesuit, dated January 10, 1722, will not be uninteresting to your readers:

"I am at length arrived in this famous city, which they have called la Nouvelle Orleans. Those who have given it this name thought that Orleans was of the feminine gender; but what signifies that? Custom has established it, and that is above the rules of grammar.

"This city is the first which one of the greatest rivers in the world has seen raised on its banks. If the eight hundred fine houses, and the five parishes, which the newspapers gave it some two years ago, are reduced at present to a hundred barracks, placed in no very great order—to a great store-house, built of wood—to two or three houses, which would be no ornament to a village of France; and to the half of a sorry store-house, which they agreed to lend to the lord of the place, and which he had no sooner taken possession of, but they turned him out to dwell under a tent; what pleasure on the other side to see insensibly increasing this future capital of a fine and vast country, and to be able to say, not with a sigh, like the hero of Virgil, speaking of his dear native place consumed by the flames, and the fields where the city of Troy had been, (Et Campus ubi Troja fuit,) but full of a well-grounded hope this wild and desert place, which the reeds and trees do yet almost wholly cover, will be one day, and perhaps that day is not far off, an opulent city, and the metropolis of a great and rich colony.

"You will ask me on what I found this hope? I found it on the situation of this city—at thirty-three leagues from the sea, and on the side of a navigable river, that one may come up to this place in twenty-four hours; on the fruitfulness of the soil, on the mildness and goodness of the climate, (in 30 deg. North Latitude,) on the industry of its inhabitants, on the neighborhood of Mexico, to which we may go in fifteen days by sea; on that of Havana, which is still nearer, and of the finest Islands of America, and of the English Colonies. Needs there any thing more to make a city flourishing? Rome and Paris had not such considerable beginnings, were not built under such happy auspices, and their founders did not find on the Seine and Tiber the advantages we have found on the Mississippi, in comparison of which those two rivers are but little brooks."

The impressions of a visitor, written on the spot, more than one hundred and thirty years ago, are curious to say the least. The expectations which the writer entertained of the destiny of New Orleans have all the precision and fulfillment of prophecy; but it is not likely that its vicissitudes of fortune, and its political revolutions were anticipated. The political history of Louisiana, with which the city has always been intimately connected, gives an insight into the causes of the present religious and social condition.

Early impressions are always the most lasting, and the most difficult to erase. What the earliest social, moral, and political impressions of New Orleans were, may be inferred from the character of its first inhabitants. Originally settled by the French, ceded to Spain forty years after, passing again into hands of the French, and finally, in 1803 it was, along with a vast territory, purchased by the United States. The footprints of the French and Spanish have not been obliterated. Their language, manners and religion, still remain; and some illustrations of their jurisprudence are found in our State and municipal laws. Probably no city in the United States contains any thing like so large a proportion of foreigners and persons of recent foreign descent.

Amongst many others, the French are recognized without difficulty as the original staple of our population. This accounts for the continued use of the French language, and for the exclusive possession of certain quarters of the city by the French at the present day. The appearance of that district lying between Canal and Esplanade streets, formerly known as the Third Municipality is decidedly European. The visitor, in his peregrinations, meets with specimens of humanity truly trans-Atlantic. They dress, walk, and look peculiarly, whilst his ears are saluted with little else besides the strange and confused colloquial of Paris and Madrid. The shops, stores and residences, have the same foreign and singular appearance. The creole population, a term properly limited to natives of French extraction, but now applied to every thing of native growth, whether human, animal, or vegetable, hold with great tenacity to the ways of their ancestors. Their cookery is French, and the time of meals, and the make of their dishes are a la Francaise. This is commendable, or otherwise, according to one's taste.

These facts, however, show the advantages which the first settlers have in all countries. The first impression upon the soil, the first influence upon society, and the earliest religious opinions, were French, and all of these still form the deep substratum of our social condition. Hence the laws of Louisiana differ materially from those of the other States, and a profound juris consult of the common law, without a new and regular course, would not be qualified to plead in our courts. The idea is well illustrated in the history of Methodism in America. One reason that she is so much in the ascendant in the South and West, may be found in the pioneer position which she holds in almost every community. Wesleyan seed in most instances preoccupied the ground, and however rudely cultivated, a great and lasting point was gained—a preemption right was secured.

If this is true of Methodism, it was also true of the first occupancy of New Orleans. From the nature of things a preemption of possession and influence grew out of original occupancy, and gave that wonderful vitality and longevity to the imported notions, morals, religion, and amusements of the Europeans.

For this reason the morals of the city have been notoriously bad, and its amusements have been barbarous. Our Sabbath is Parisian—a mere holiday, and the religion of the majority is no better than a solemn mockery. For the same reason the theatres, cock-pits, bull-fights, bear-fights, and other inventions of enlightened barbarism, continue from time to time to disgrace the character of the city.

This is but an anticipated glance of our next article. The marked influence of foreign education and origin upon the present condition of the city, and especially its religious history; and the annals, strength, and tendency of Popery, will claim the attention of your readers hereafter.

A TRIP TO ATTAKAPAS.

NUMBER III.

On Friday afternoon we left Pattersonville, and our kind friends there who had ministered to our comfort. Among these we may not forget our kind friends, the Richardsons, who had furnished us with the means of conveyance all the while we were in the country. Nor may I forget my old friend, the Rev. Thomas Smith, formerly a traveling preacher in the S. C. Conference, but for many years local. I had lost sight of him for many years, and supposed him numbered with the dead. What was my surprise to find him living and settled down among the lakes and lagoons of Louisiana. He has seen his days of adversity since his location, and I apprehend has by this time made the discovery, which is the experience of many scores besides, that those who leave the work of the active ministry, do not thereby gain immunity from trouble.

I must also mention among those who showed us liberal kindness Dr. Kilgore, who resides in the prairies in St. Mary's Parish. Many thanks and blessings for them all, old Brother Ralls included.

About three o'clock we left Pattersonville on board a singular looking little steam-craft called the Fairy. She had once been employed on the waters of the Mississippi as a sort of avaunt courier of the Floating Palace, a traveling circus, or something of the sort, which formerly navigated the waters of the mighty river for the purpose of lightening the pockets, vitiating the taste, and corrupting the morals of such of the inhabitants as were already light in the upper department. She had, however, lately changed her habits for the better, and was now employed in carrying the mails, and passengers who might desire that mode of conveyance from Donaldsonville to the regions of Attakapas.

And right handsomely did the little Fairy perform her task. We glided pleasantly down the Atchafalaya, passing in sight of Berwick's Bay, and wending our way through numerous lakes, bays and bayous, which must be nameless here, as memory fails me at that point. Toward sunset we reached Lake Verret, and a small boat came alongside and carried us ashore. It was well for us that the Fairy was so light of draft, or we should have stuck fast on the bottom in some of the pretty looking sheets of water through which we threaded our way.

And now, Mr. Editor, I cannot follow the example so common among steamboat travelers of complimenting the fare we met with on the boat, for the simple reason that we neither ate nor slept on board our renowned little craft. I may just say that we had a very pleasant ride of some three hours, and paid very handsomely for it. But then we ought not to grumble, when we contrasted our situation with that of former travelers on this route, who probably paid more and were compelled to make the trip in an open boat!

From the point where we landed we took the stage for Napoleonville, some ten or twelve miles distant. Of the beauties of this part of our trip, if it had any, I cannot speak, as it was mostly performed in the night. There is one delectable spot, however, which we may not omit to notice, viz: the supper-house. As we had dined rather early we had looked forward to our evening meal with some interest, and when the "supper-house, gentlemen," was announced, I was in very good trim to receive a good cup of coffee. But, alas! our most cherished hopes are frequently doomed to disappointment. We were shown into the supper-room where sat her, whom I supposed to be the mistress of the eatables, with a fine well grown child in her arms. I looked to see Madame stir about in the preparation of supper, but I looked in vain. There she sat, perfectly immoveable. This I regarded rather ominous, but was encouraged by the apparent bustling activity of the gentleman. After long waiting we were invited to supper. We sat down to a table of substantials, and by the time we were nearly done with these, we heard them in the next room grinding the coffee for our supper. We were told the coffee would soon be ready, but as the stage was ready, we did not choose to wait longer, and left our portion of the coffee for the next set of hungry passengers who might call. Our landlord, though he had forgotten the coffee, remembered the bill, and was promptly in his place to receive the dimes, which he did with the best possible grace.

We resumed our places in the stage, and after some two hours, rode into Napoleonville about nine o'clock. This is a small village, to which its founders probably intended to add dignity by connecting it with a lofty name. Some few miles distant was the house of Brother Littlejohn, which was our point of destination. After waiting an hour or two, with the cheering prospect of spending the night in this little city with a big name, the whistle of a steamer arrested our attention. We hastened to the bayou, and were soon on board of the fine steamer Dr. Batey, which landed us near midnight at the hospitable mansion of our kind friend and brother, Rev. William Littlejohn, whom I had formerly known in the Western District of Tennessee. Here a heart-warm welcome and a good supper made us feel quite at home, and prepared us to forget the toils of our journey in a comfortable night's rest.

We remained at our pleasant re[illegible] till Sunday morning, when we le[illegible] appointment at Thibodauxville, [illegible] miles distant. He saw the hand of Providence in this, and still his heart rebelled, still he resisted, and to shake of those convictions which clung to him, and made him miserable by day and by night, he quit his farm and threw himself into whirl of excitement which attends the busier and more active scenes of modern commercial life. But he found no relief; his mind was still troubled with the awful belief that hell should be his portion. He sought to absorb his thoughts in gaming, and to drown them in the intoxicating bowl; but there were times when reflection would come upon him in spite of himself, and those were times of indescribable anguish. He then withdrew from society, gave himself to meditation and prayer, and began to search the Scriptures. He was the "stricken deer." In this state of mind he chanced to attend a meeting where at last he found ONE to extract the barb from his wounded side.

In the summer of 1849 there was another revival at Greenwood, at which about forty professed. This meeting was carried on very successfully for several days by lay-members, Dr. Avery, the preacher in charge, and his assisting ministers having been taken sick. In the fall of 1850 another revival occurred at which some twenty-four joined the society. Since then several meetings have been protracted at which good has been done, and some souls born to God.

During the period of five years, embraced in our history, as the result of these extraordinary efforts in getting up religious revivals by protracting meetings, one hundred and fifty-seven members were added to society, which with the fourteen original members, make one hundred and seventy-one names entered upon the class-book. I say, as the result of these extraordinary efforts, because although some have joined at other times, where there was no general excitement, and a few others (seventeen) have joined by letter, yet in so far as is known, in every instance the first class of persons have traced their convictions back to a revival; and for the rest it has generally required quite a revival to induce persons who have brought letters from the older States to hand them in and have their names enrolled among the people of God. Some of these have candidly acknowledged that they came to this new country to make money, and they thought they could not get rich and be Christians, and they made choice of trash, and have generally failed to get even that!

The largest number of names upon the class-book, at any one time since the revival in July, 1848, was one hundred and twenty-five, and the smallest, is the present, being thirty. What then has become of the one hundred and seventy-one members whose names have been enrolled upon the records of the Church? Thirty-one were dropped before their probation expired; eighteen have died; ten have withdrawn; seventy-nine have removed from the place; two have been expelled; one was admitted to preach—joined Conference, and is now preaching somewhere in the Mississippi swamp; and the remaining thirty are still members of the society. This shows a great mortality, and a very migratory population. But further than this the statistics of this society go to prove that Methodist Societies owe their existence, their origin, and their perpetuity, to religious revivals; that there is a strong tendency in these societies to dissolution, and that without a continued perservance in extraordinary religious efforts they must become extinct from natural and other causes which continually and everywhere operate to this end.

Of those that withdrew from the society, several did so to join other churches, and several others were droped for joining the Baptist Church to get themselves immersed. Besides this quite a large number have been converted at Methodist revivals, at Greenwood, and in the neighborhood, who have joined other churches. Thus Methodist revivals not only supply Methodist societies with members, but to a very great extent they find other denominations, and keep them alive.

We should not attempt to establish general principles from a few isolated facts, gathered from a brief period of history of one society, if we did not believe that similar facts would be presented of nearly every other society in the church if their history were written. Was it not a religious revival that gave Methodism existence? And is it not the same thing that has kept it in being? Why, the fact is Methodism is nothing else but a great religious revival. But it is often asked by the opponents of revivals, who are so afraid of excitement, and such a dreadful noise, that they would rather hear the stones in the streets cry out than a sinner groan, "Jesus have mercy upon me!" where are the fruits of revivals? Now, we invite such an one to an analysis of the statistics of this society. A large proportional number have died in the triumphs of faith, and gone to heaven; thirty more are stumbling along that way, and hope at last to get there, too. Then of the seventy-nine who have removed, a good many are known to hold membership in other societies and have a name to live. Several of these, too, have died happy. Add to this those who have joined other churches, and the influences which have spread from this point to the surrounding country, and those which shall probably hereafter develope, and enough, I think, may be found to encourage the friends of revivals to go on. Other churches may get along without the extraordinary efforts by means of which revivals are promoted, but Methodism has this mission.

How few seek the salvation of their souls with the deliberation of purpose which one exercises in the purchase of an estate? But should persons be encouraged to join the church under excitement? By all means. If they are not excited to join the church, and seek salvation, they will go to hell. Sing them in? Yes, and shout for joy, and pray continually for a revival!

PRAYER-MEETING CHRISTIANS.

There are many Sunday Christians, but how few prayer-meeting Christians! Well, is there any difference? Very considerable difference between them. The Sunday Christian is one who is seldom or never seen at church but on Sundays, when there is a large congregation and a good deal of display. They are distinguished for certain traits of character. Of course these traits are different in different persons belonging to this class of Christians. Some have a marked fondness for money. To make it seems one their chief delights. The very sight of it throws an inexpressible blandness over their faces, and a peculiar brightness into their eyes. Such people you could not expect to trouble themselves with much praying and God-serving.

There are others among the Sunday Christians who are absorbed with the pleasures and fashions of the world. They cannot endure to be outstript here. It will never do to miss an evening party or an exhibition. They must have stock in all that is going, or else they are damaged in feeling. What need have such Christians for prayer? Ah, says one, you call such people Christians? Yes, they claim to be Christians, and we must allow the name. You know the Mormons, and other kindred sects, say they are Christians, but you are conversant with their history. It is easy to claim the title, but it is to be feared that many stop here. They have the name to live while they are dead.

These persons go the sanctuary on Sunday, but what good does it do them? Do they become less worldly? Do they grow in any of the Christian graces—in meekness—in humility—in love to God or man? No, they come and go with fearless eyes and Laodicean hearts. If the poor preacher tries to stir up his own heart to say something to arouse them, they listen to him with a sort of half interest which seems to reprove his zeal, and to say to him, "You can't excite me." Every pastor knows something about these Sunday Christians; they are the weights he has to carry in his pulpit labors. He feels that he feeds them in vain. There is no soul-food which he can give them which they will relish. They don't intend to be profited by him or to do what he wishes them to do. But on the other hand he is sustained and comforted by the prayer-meeting Christians. He feels that these sympathise with him. These are to him what Aaron and Hurr were to Moses. They are with him in all his battles. Their tears, their sighs, their groans, their amens, are all inspiring to his courage. They are not only around him in the Sabbath when he stands up before the great congregation to fight against error, and to persuade sinners to embrace Christ. But they are close at hand during the week-night service to keep in countenance amidst the discouragements. They pray for him and for his preaching, that it may blessed to the good of souls; and they help him pray for the church and its back-slidden members. Oh, does not every pastor love such members of the church? The very circumstances by which they are made to associate together bind his heart to them, and make them essential contributors to his happiness. Pastors, call upon God to enrich the church with a great increase of prayer-meeting Christians, and speedily to rescue from the pit Sunday Christians!

ANGELS SILENCED.

In certain quarters we are accustomed to hear regretful remarks about "good old John Wesley," and that earnest evangelist George Whitfield. What a pity they turned Methodists!" Why did they not do their work according to the canons and the rubrics?

It is not a jest, but a historical fact, that Wesley was often shut out of chapels, and George Whitfield was actually suspended! Whitfield suspended! Things must done up brown, or not at all. Death, spiritual death, can be tolerated; but no breach of decorum. The soul may be stained in sin, but the lawn sleeve must be clean!

The Evangelical Catholic gives the following account of the suspension of Whitfield, with some pertinent remarks thereon. M.

"We find the following in article in the Charleston Gospel Messenger, giving a history of St. Philip's and St. Michael's Churches, in that city:

"It is worthy of remark that the Rev. John Wesley, regarded as the founder of the present American Methodist Church, and also the Rev. George Whitfield, one of the first founders of English Calvinist Methodism, should both in early life, at the commencement of their ministry, have been in Charleston and preached in St. Philip's. The former, by invitation of Mr. Garden, the then rector, preached Sunday, August 1, 1736. Mr. Wesley states this in his journal, in which he gives at the same time a description of the building, its size and congregation. The latter, the Rev. Mr. Whitfield, arrived in Charleston, in August, 1738, having been ordained in England by the Bishop of Gloucester, and preached frequently in St. Philip's Church, attracting large congregations, and acquiring considerable notoriety by his eloquence.

"The year 1740 is memorable in the history of St. Philip's, for his citation, by the Rev. Mr. Garden, for non-conformity to the forms of worship prescribed by the Protestant Episcopal Church. His trial and subsequent suspension in the Ecclesiastical Court, held for that purpose, is very interesting. We need not do more, however, than give an outline of the proceedings, as all the particulars are to be found on record, and may be perused elsewhere.

"The first step taken by Mr. Garden was the organization of an Ecclesiastical Court, composed of himself, as Commissary; the Rev. Messrs. William Guy, Timothy Mellichamp, Stephen Roe, and William Orr. A citation was then issued for the offence of violating the canons of the Church, which enjoins upon every minister 'the use of the form of prayer prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer, and no other.'

"Mr. Whitfield appealed, and took exception to the authority of the Court. A replication was made to these exceptions by Wm. Smith, Esq., whereupon an argument took place before the Court, as to the relevancy of the exceptions, Andrew Rutledge, Esq., appearing in behalf of Mr. Whitfield, and the opposite side supported by James Greene, Esq. The Court unanimously decreed, 'that the exceptions be repelled.' From this decision Mr. Whitfield appealed to the Lords Commissioners in England. This of course was granted, and a year and a day allowed for prosecuting the appeal. In the mean time all proceedings were staid. At the expiration of the time given, as no prohibition was interposed by any superior Court, due notice was again given to Mr. Whitfield to attend, but he did not appear. Successive adjournments were made to give time to him for reflection, but as he neither appeared nor put in any answer, and as he continued to depart from the articles he signified his assent to, to be governed by when he was admitted to Holy Orders, namely, the XXXVIth Canon of the Canons, and Constitution Ecclesiastical, a final decree was pronounced against him in these words: 'We therefore pronounce, decree, and declare, that the said George Whitfield, for his excesses and faults, ought duly and canonically, and according to the exigence of the law in that part in the premises, to be corrected and punished, and also to be suspended from his office; and accordingly by these presents we do suspend him, the said George Whitfield, and for so suspended, we also pronounce, decree, and declare him to be denounced, declared, and published openly and publicly, in the face of the Church.'

"Were another Whitfield to appear in the Church, should we have to get rid of him in the same way? Rubrics and canons are good things to regulate ordinary zeal and gifts, but it is hard to make zeal and gifts extraordinary run just in their channels. Can our Church do nothing with enthusiasm? Must she cast it out wholly as an evil spirit? Has she no way of using such men as Whitfield and Wesley? Might she not have, if she were to unbutton a little?"

APOLOGIES.

What good do they do? They do not make a poor dinner a good one; neither do they add to what is really meritorious. Yet we believe it is allowed the ladies, ex officio, to use them as an exordium at the tea-table. If the repast is coarse, you certainly must not think of dispatching your meal without allowing Madame the pleasure of boring you with an apology; if it be never so fine, make up your mind to undergo the same painful operation. But be certain that, with becoming courtesy, you differ with your hostess as to the merits of the fare, and "think every thing very good." Then the fete is completed, secundum artem.

We can bear them with tolerable grace when used as a kind of table etiquette; but when brought into the pulpit, they always seem to us as much out of place as the frogs that crept into Pharaoh's wine-cup.

Doctor——— is to preach; every body is on tiptoe in expectation; the church is filled; the Doctor arises; all is attention, each waiting to drink the first drop of the intellectual treat; and "we beg to offer an apology, etc., etc.," grates upon the ears of the audience.

Some seem to think them an indispensable prefix to a sermon—a kind of entering wedge, adapted to all circumstances and places. We know more than two preachers who almost invariably preface their sermons with a "lamentable tale of woe!" They are "laboring under" that fashionable pulpit disease "soreness of throat," "feel indisposed," are "called upon unexpectedly," or something else is the matter. Unfortunately for the church, the world, and themselves, fate seems to have decided that their Solomonic intellect shall never discover itself only when shorn of its brightness and power by unfavorable circumstances!

We confess that we have never been able to discover the principles of philosophy upon which apologies are based, unless it be "that our misfortunes are rendered more tolerable by the sympathy of others." To court the sympathy of an audience may not be always impolitic in the office-seeking demagogue, but surely the minister of the Gospel has a nobler work to perform. In the discharge of his duties self should not enter into the account. The proclaiming of the truth, and the whole truth, without regard to what others think of the literary merits of the sermon, should be his object. But let the principle be what it may, apologies always appear to us peculiarly significant—suggestive of one of two ideas:

First, that they are designed as a circumlocution of the proposition; or, secondly, they seem to say, If I can preach thus, when circumstances are so unpropitious, judge what I could do were every thing favorable.

Let the minister have the work at heart, and he will find neither time nor necessity for making apologies.

POSTSCRIPT FROM "SIGMA."

MR. EDITOR: Since I wrote you the brief article on "proselyting," an item or two has fallen under my personal notice which goes far to show that while "Episcopos" has been severe in his strictures, he has not been unjustly so.

I called upon a gentleman a few days since who had just professed religion at a meeting in the Methodist Church where he was a regular attendant, and found lying upon his table a pamphlet, not only attacking Methodism, but all experimental piety! It had been furnished him by the Episcopal minister of the town who, hearing of his conversion, has tried to proselyte him, and loaned him this pamphlet with an injunction that it must be returned, so that it might not fall into our hands! We furnish any one who may wish it with our works.

I learn that the gentleman in Mobile, who was called to an account by "Episcopos," is boasting that he shall get two or three Methodists in consequence of the objectionable document! But if he does, what was their position before "Episcopos" wrote? Something might be said upon that point:

Now, what does the pamphlet charge upon him? Why, that he is "an unmitigated proselyter." What does he confess? That he is at the work, and hopes to succeed! We thank him for the confirmation of the charge. But does the gentleman mean to intimate that his prospects as a proselyter are not injured by such exposures? Then, he will not object to a second edition, or to any thing else that is equally favorable to him. This bravado will not do; for while it makes good the charge and complaint of "Episcopos," we can inform him that "reasons" are opening the eyes of thousands; and if a second edition, "enlarged and revised by the author," is called for we have several items that have come to our knowledge since first edition appeared, as striking as any thing before the public. SMALL TALK.

It is customary, Mr. Editor, for newspaper scribblers, for several months previous to the meeting of our General Conference, to suggest works for its attention. Protected, we trust, from presumption by this time-honored custom, we propose to notice, in a small way, some things which some of our best and wisest members think, might, with profit to the Church, come before that grave body. Now, we do not know, that any prospective member of the Conference will read this, or if he does, that he will give it a moment's thought. Well, we are not particular. We have some thoughts and we are going to write them, and with your consent, we intend they shall be printed.

We are told to "keep our rules, not mend them." Now, this is most excellent advice; but with all due respect to it, we do think some of our rules need mending, and they need mending just in order to their being more fully kept.

This sentiment is hardly in keeping with the progress of the age, which progress our own Methodism has been a most efficient instrument in developing. We should keep our rules until they need mending, and then mend and keep them, too. Every human arrangement is capable of amendment. Much as we venerate the memory of our early founders, (peace to their ashes) we are hardly willing to submit to regulations which their generation required, when by the very spirit which they breathed into us, we are placed in circumstances in which these regulations are inapplicable, and therefore inefficient. Yea, were we to do so their own spirits, could they return, would rebuke us. They toiled on, heroically, through mud and over the obstructions of ungraded roads; but we have turnpikes and railroads now. It is hardly proper that we should prefer these difficult ways simply because they trod in them, and found there so much honor and profit.

To specify: What need have we for that chapter in the Discipline on "bands?" Why are our pages encumbered with an arrangement which is to all intents and purposes obsolete? Who ever pays any attention to it? How many bands have we in the Church? Does the same necessity exist which originated them at first? One, to read the Discipline, would suppose it constituted part of our economy. We are required, in our examination previous to admission into full membership into the Conference, to keep the rules of the bands. Who keeps them? Who thinks it his duty to keep them? Why then retain the rules and disfigure the pages of our excellent book of Discipline with them? Besides we very much doubt the utility of band meetings. We cannot conceive it our duty to tell any one all the thoughts of our hearts, good and evil, without reserve. More harm than good would probably be the result. It savors too much of the confessional. And is not this the general opinion of the Church, tacitly expressed in their almost entire abandonment? Why has this chapter been in the Discipline so long? Let us remove it as an obsolete, useless regulation.

Then there is the chapter on "dress." In Mr. Wesley's day, the fashionable and worldly minded wore "high heads, enormous bonnets," etc.

In order to preserve the simplicity of his societies, he inserted a rule in the Discipline forbidding the members to wear such things This rule is still retained in the precise terms used at first. Our members are forbidden to wear them; we are to receive none into the Church, admit none to love-feast, who do. How shall we apply the rule? Who wears such things now? It is obsolete. Let us expunge it. If we must have a rule on the subject, let it be directed to the correction of extravagance and sin, as they appear in the present generation. Let the law makers issue their bulls of excommunication against figured satins, and embroidered handkerchiefs, small bonnets, etc.; and let the male members have some share in the regulation. One would suppose, from the present rule, that the females only were addicted to dress, the males never. Therefore, let us have enactments specifying fine cloth coats, satin vests, Paris boots, silk beavers, kid gloves, etc. There might be some show of common sense, at least as far as applicability is concerned in such a regulation. The present rule is unadulterated nonsense. What would be considered proper in one place would meet with no favor in another. How ridiculous for a body of grave men to go to work to form an index expurgatorious of forbidden articles of dress—to construct a wardrobe for half a million of men and women! Therefore, we say let us have the present rule out of the books; and the sooner the better. In our next we purpose to resume the subject of changes in our Discipline.

DEATH OF CARDINAL WOLSEY.

Our readers will be interested in the following extract which has been furnished from the forthcoming fifth volume of D'Aubigne's History of the Reformation, now in press by Robert Carter & Brothers:

"On Monday morning, tormented by gloomy forebodings, Wolsey asked what was the time of day. 'Past eight o'clock,' replied Cavendish. 'That cannot be,' said the Cardinal; 'eight o'clock!..... No! for by eight o'clock you shall lose your master.' At six o'clock on Tuesday, Kingston having come to inquire about his health, Wolsey said to him, 'I shall not live long.' 'Be of good cheer,' rejoined the Governor of the Tower. 'Alas, Master Kingstyn!' exclaimed the Cardinal, 'If I had served God as diligently as I have served the King, he would not have given me over in my gray hairs!' and then he added, with downcast head, 'This is my just reward!' What a judgment upon his own life!

"On the very threshold of eternity, for he had but a few minutes more to live, the Cardinal summoned up all his hatred against the Reformation, and made a last effort. The persecution was was too slow to please him. 'Master Kingston,' he said, 'attend to my last request: tell the King that I conjure him, in God's name, to destroy the new pernicious sect of Lutherans;' and then, with astonishing presence of mind in this his last hour, Wolsey described the misfortunes which the Hussites had, in his opinion, brought upon Bohemia; and then coming to England, he recalled the times of Wickliffe, and Sir John Oldcastle. He grew animated; his dying eyes yet shot forth fiery glances! He trembled, lest Henry VIII, unfaithful to the Pope, should hold out his hands to the Reformers. 'Master Kingston,' said he in conclusion, 'the King should know that if he tolerates heresy, God will take away his power, and we shall then have mischief upon mischief—barrenness, scarcity, and disorder to the utter destruction of this Realm.'

"Wolsey was exhausted by the effort. After a momentary silence he resumed, with a dying voice, 'Master Kingston, farewell! My time draweth on fast. Forget not what I have said and charged you withal; for when I am dead ye shall, peradventure, understand my words better!' It was with difficulty he uttered these words; his tongue began to falter, his eyes became fixed—his sight failed him. He breathed his last at the same minute the clock struck eight; and the attendants standing round his bed looked at each other in affright. It was the 29th of November, 1530.

"Thus died the man once so much feared. Power had been his idol; to obtain it in the State he had sacrificed the liberties of England; and to win it, or to preserve it in the Church, he had fought against the Reformation. If he encouraged the nobility in the luxuries and pleasures of life, it was only to render them more subtle and more servile. If he supported learning, it was only that he might have a clergy fitted to keep the laity in their leading-strings. Ambitious, intriguing, and impure of life, he had been as zealous for the sacerdotal prerogative as the austere Becket; and by a singular contrast, a shirt of hair was found on the body of this voluptuous man. The aim of his life had been to raise the Papal power higher than it had ever been before, at the very moment when the Reformation was attempting to bring it down, and to take his seat on the pontifical throne with more than the authority of a Hildebrand.

"Wolsey, as Pope, would have been the man of his age; and in the political world he would have done for the Roman primacy what the celebrated Loyola did for it soon after by his fanaticism. Obliged to renounce this idea, worthy only of the middle ages, he had desired at least to save the Popedom in his own country; but here again he failed. The pilot who had stood in England at the helm of the Romanish Church was thrown overboard, and the ship left to itself was about to founder, and yet, even in death, he did not lose his courage; the last throbs of his heart had called for victims; the last words from his falling lips, the last message to his master, his last testament had been persecution. This testament was to be only too faithfully executed."

During the last eleven years Boston has raised and expended for public school purposes $2,810,862 40. Notwithstanding the excess of population in New York, Boston during the last five years has expended a larger amount for educational purposes than that city.

TEXAS ITEMS.

I learn that a great effort is to be made this year in regard to missionary collections in the two Texas Conferences; and success may be predicted if the question be properly presented to the people. Texas owes much to Methodist missions. What was she when Ruter, and Fowler, and Alexander, crossed the Sabine as her missionaries? What was her moral character abroad? And what her actual moral condition at home? A continental Barrataria, she was so considered, and was really infested with the worst specimens of the worst class of human beings—honorable exceptions, of course, there were many; but they were exceptions, and not the rule.

Now, what is Texas? I have never seen a more moral, I will say religious body of people than Texans now form. The church, the school-house, and the masonic lodge, every where greet the eye; and even our little villages, many of them, would make those of the old States blush if they had any sense of modesty or propriety, when comparing notes on keeping the Sabbath, and general propriety of conduct.

Of general local intelligence I have little that could interest your readers. The railroad fever is cooling down, somewhat, since the dose of cold water administered by our homœpathic Legislature has taken effect—though I shall not be surprised if the patients disavow the practice and dismiss the doctors. The Louisiana and Texas Railroad Act was smothered to death in one learned doctor's breeches pocket after its birth, and its giving pleasant assurance to its friends of a speedy manhood; but I think the feasibility and availibility of railroads in Texas, connecting the principal points of travel and trade in the country, may be considered a truth, and will soon be a fact. The sooner the better. Methodism, refinement, and wealth don't wait for railways in Texas, but they can and will travel upon them when they come.

Truly, yours, R. B. W.

BUNYAN'S SILVER MINE.

In those days of rushing after gold, as a seasonable warning, we copy for a perusal the following passage from Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress:

At the farthest side of the plain, called Ease, was a little hill called Lucre, and in that hill a silver mine, which some of them, that had formerly gone that way because of its rarity, had turned aside to see; but going too near the brim of the pit, the ground being deceitful under them broke, and they were slain. Some also had been maimed there, and could not, to their dying day, be their own men again.

Then I saw in my dream that a little off of the road, over against the silver mine, stood Demas, to call passengers to come and see, who said to Christian and his fellow:

"Ho! turn aside hitherto, and I will show you a thing."

"What thing so deserving as to turn us from the way?" asked Christian.

"Here is a silver mine and some digging in it for treasure. If you will come, with a little pains you may richly provide for yourselves."

Then said Hopeful, "Let us go and see."

"Not I," said Christian, "I have before heard of this place, and how many here have been slain; and besides, that treasure is a snare to those that seek it, for it hindereth them in their pilgrimage."

Then Christian called to Demas, saying, "is not the place dangerous?"

"Not very dangerous, except to those that are careless. But withal he blushed as he spoke.

"Then," said Christian to Hopeful, "let us not stir a step, but still keep on our way."

"I will warrant you when By-ends comes up, if he has the same invitation as we, he will turn in hither to see."

"No doubt thereof," said Christian, "for his principles lead him that way, and a hundred to one he dies there."

EDUCATION IN AMERICA.

It is evident that the United States is progressing at an unexampled rate, partly from the enormous annual increase of its population by emigration and other causes; partly owing to the extent and fertility of its soil, the cheap rate at which all the necessaries and even comforts of life can be procured, and above all from the indomitable energy and enterprise of its inhabitants. The important subject of the education of the people appears to engage the peculiar attention of the States, and the effects of this judicious foresight will no doubt be observable in the still higher social position and status of the rising generation in America. Wherever a few houses are erected the school-house is the most prominent; and although separated from the secular, the religious instruction of the people is equally well attended to. The educational statistics of some of the large cities of America, and the almost nominal rate at which an excellent education can be procured, would put to shame some of the boasted pre-eminence of the Old World in this respect. Whatever the character of the periodical literature may be, the wants of the Americans in this respect are equally well attended to, for they have no less than 2,800 newspapers and periodicals, having an average circulation of about five millions, the entire number of copies published annually amounting to no less 422,000,000. Terms: $1 50 per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

Saturday Morning, May 14.

HARPER, FOR MAY.—Mr. McGinnis, 56 Gravier street, has laid an early copy of this valuable monthly on our table.

NATIONAL MAGAZINE.—The head-piece of John G. Saxe illuminates the May number, with a critical estimate of him, and specimens of his unique poetry. The National ranks high with us.

The first session of the Oregon Annual Conference, of the M. E. Church, was held at Salem, the 17th of March—Bishop Ames presiding. It appeared from the statistics of the several circuits, that there were 767 Church members in all, 225 probationers, and 35 local preachers.

EPISTLES OF CYPRIAN FORGERIES.—The Christian Times states that Mr. Shepherd, a diligent scholar, has succeeded in proving that the Epistles of Cyprian are undoubted forgeries. This will be a heavy blow to the Tractarians, as upon them much of the Oxford doctrine is founded.

ARMINIUS.—The first republication of the complete works of Arminius is now ready from the press of those spirited publishers, Derby & Miller, Auburn, N. Y. Their advertisement will appear next week.

WHAT IS IN A NAME?—There is a Presiding Elder in Michigan, by the name of Sapp. He has a number of Christian Indians in his district, and during a quarterly meeting held with them the Indians prayed for their Elder as follows: "Lord bless the Maple tree, that it may give abundance of sweet water." Quite a pious pun on the name of Brother Sapp.

DR. L. PIERCE.—This eloquent divine, who nobly bears the palm of age and honor, as the "oldest effective itinerant preacher in the M. E. Church, South," has been with us a few days and comforted the Churches with his presence and preaching. Though for fifty years a watchman on Zion's walls, his eye is not dim. With jealous care and far-reaching sweep he takes in the danger and the remedy of "our people," and with voice strong and clear as a trump, sends forth no uncertain sound. On Sabbath he preached two sermons in Felicity Road Church, and again on Thursday night in Carondelet street—sermons characterised by pathos and searching, and power.

We like to hear him say "our people," and in fatherly, but strong rebuke, of the temporising and world-wedding spirit of the day, cause them to remember "the wondere of old—the years of the right hand of the Most High."

For one of three score and eight years his health and strength is good. He left yesterday and will preach in Mobile to-morrow. We shall thankfully accept the Providence that makes him visit us again.

ARCHIVES DU METHODISME.—We are in receipt of the (April) 2 number of this journal religieux, the organ of French Methodism, published in Paris, and edited mainly by "J. P. C.," well known to our readers. There are many Creoles of this city and State who speak the language of the "Archives." They can subscribe by addressing the editor, 8 Rue de Furne. We have several times been written to by persons, elsewhere, to recommend to them papers in this city printed in French, in which they might learn the colloquial language. Such are directed to the fountain head, where the pure Parisian is put forth, and no provincialisms.

One good turn deserves another, as our friend in his first number apprized his readers of the existence of the Christian Advocate la Nouvelle Orleans. Success to him. We wish we could get him a score or two of subscribers from Etat de Unis.

But this paragraph is Frenchy, very:

"Nos amis s'intérresseront d'antant plus sans doute à cette collecte, que la Case de l'oncle Tom est, à notre connaissance, le seul ouvrage de quelque importance dont le héros soit un véritable Méthodiste, plein de foi et du Saint-Esprit."

THE WRONG BOOK.—A pastor told us this week that in looking over his Sabbath School (Methodist) Library, he found a fine supply of the Shorter Catechism! The person who was intrusted with laying in a supply, went to a depository of the American Tract Society, asked for Catechisms, and got these. They were in general use.

This confirms what we have before written on this subject. See the necessity, present and urgent, of raising funds and supplying them to the Book Agent for publishing our Sunday School Books. We advise more pastors to examine their Sunday School Libraries, and find out what the lambs are feeding on. Meantime, for a catalogue of such volumes as are to be had from our own Editor, write to Dr. Summers. And let not the advertisement of the Assistant Agent miss attention.

TEN THOUSAND SUBSCRIBERS!

We have not got them, but we want them, and must have them. This to the AGENTS, FRIENDS and PATRONS, of the Advocate.

Low prices can only be maintained by large circulation. It has been said from the beginning that TEN THOUSAND PAYING SUBSCRIBERS would be required, at, the exceedingly low price of One Dollar and Fifty Cents, in advance, to support the New Orleans Christian Advocate, and enable it to hold its position, and do its work without embarrassment. We cannot stop short of that mark. Are these not to be had? Ought they not be had?

We have been much encouraged and helped by the presence and counsels of the Publishing Committee. Read their report. At their next annual meeting we hope to show them books with ten thousand good names. Each one of the Committee, we are assured will do his best to realize this. We hope also to receive them, or their successors, into a new and well fitted-up office, fronting Camp street, with a comfortable cane-bottomed chair for each—all which will be in agreeable contrast to the republican looking sanctum in which their former meetings have been held.

Brethren often find it a tax on their time and labor to canvass for subscribers and collect accounts, and do the important, but sometimes troublesome part of agents, in extending the influence of the Church Press. And sometimes they may be tempted to think that while they are thus employed the editor has an easy time of it. Let none think so. And if he does of us, he is vastly mistaken. Our chair is not a cushioned, but a hard-bottomed one. The Publishing Committee had before them this fact—that up to January, 1852, the editor received, for his services, the sum of $280 40. And for the year ending January, 1853, $364 00. Put both together and they do not make a second rate clerk's salary for one year.

None of these things move us. But we hope they will move the agents. If they work, and even sacrifice ought for the Church Press, we also. And we are prepared, to the full measure of ability, to continue working with their cooperation. It is for the Church and the world's good. The cause is worth working for. A free and out-spoken organ, maintaining Methodist doctrine and discipline, and devoted to the promotion and defence of our common Protestant Christianity, at this point in the South west, is not to be given up until every proper effort has been made for its support. Brethren, take it in hand resolutely, and it is done.

DEDICATION—COLLECTION.

Last Sabbath, eleven A. M., according to appointment, the New Methodist Church, on Carondelet street, was dedicated to the service of God. Large and attentive audiences filled the sanctuary in the morning and evening. Dr. Parsons, who had been invited from Louisville for the purpose, performed the services of the occasion with striking solemnity and fitness, and inaugurated in "this latter house" a preached gospel, in a pureness and thoroughness of orthodoxy, that we trust may always continue there. The preacher's style was highly scenic. Text: Haggai 2: 9., "The glory of this latter house shall be greater than the former," etc. Appropriate, as there was a former house not destitute of the glory of divine manifestations.

The architectural order of the building is Ionic. Marble-base front, with six columns. Steeple, the lantern of Demosthenes, in which sounds forth one of Meneely's bells. The basement is airy and well arranged, accommodating a large Sabbath School, with three class-rooms. The building of brick—115 by 70 feet. Cost (covering damages by falling of roof) $50,000. Seats free.

The seats are ranged on a circle, each hearer facing the pulpit. Galleries on three sides. Ceiling and pulpit recess frescoed. Taken all in all it is the best church building in Southern Methodism.

But, as Dr. Parsons naively observed on descending from the pulpit before the dedicatory prayer, one glory of "this latter house" above the former was to be this: it was to be dedicated ont of debt! To realize this $19,500 had to be raised then and there! It was done in brief time as follows:

H. R. W. Hill, in his usual princely way, sent up a card to pay all the cost for re-roofing and plastering the house $4,500 00

He then proposed to be one of fifteen to raise $15,000 more 1,000 00

This proposition was responded to as follows:

J. H. Palmer	1,000 00
A. J. Wright & Co	1,500 00
J. P. Harrison, T. K. Price, S. F. Slatter, Jas. Dick Hill, Dr. H. B. Moss, each $500	2,500 00
W. H. Dameron	300 00
Messrs. W. S. Mount, Jas. A. Lusk, D. Tillotson, M. A. Vanhook, H. G. Anderson, P. H. Willard, B. P. Rayne, R. W. Powell, and C. Wilcox, $300 each	1,500 00
Messrs. E. Moth, J. Sutton, H. H. Goodwyn, R. K. Howell, James Sherry, T. H. Jackson, J. J. Jones, R. L. Robertson, P. Nugent, $100 each	900 00
Messrs. A. E. Perkins, William Barrell, J. D. Stewart, A. J. Tully, J. M. Savage, S. Stewart, J. J. McMahon, J. Hully, Thomas Ong, W. J. Grayson, J. O. Goodrich, E. J. Nugent, Thomas N. Beall, W. A. Violett, J. A. Lane, G. W. Goodwyn, $50 each	800 00
S. G. Shropshire	40 00
Messrs. J. H. Oglesby, Wm. Crawford, C. B. S. Harrison, Mrs. Hickey, N. D. Edson, H. T. Lonsdale, J. Drummond, J. M. Daugherty, J. H. Massey, W. C. Lusk, A. N. Baxter, $25 each	275 00
Messrs. J. W. Price, T. B. Winston, John Shryock, Mrs. O. Towns, T. B. Taylor, T. Auzé, $20 each	120 00
A number of others in smaller amounts	126 00
Which with the cash collections made a total on the $15,000 proposition of	10,517 33

Whereupon, Mr. H. R. W. Hill sent up a card to take the balance of the proposition—say $4,500—making the total collection NINETEEN THOUSAND FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS!

It is said that a church is to be built in New York for Father GAVAZZI, and that he will take up his residence in that city.

MISSIONARY ANNIVERSARY.

The Annual Meeting (says the Louisville Advocate) of the Missionary Society, of the M. E. Church, South, took place on the 18th April, in the Brook Street Church, of this city, as provided in the Constitution.

The meeting was called to order by the Vice President, Rev. William Holman, and opened with singing and prayer by Rev. A. H. Redford. A large congregation was in attendance, and much interest seemed to be felt in the occasion.

After an eloquent address from the worthy Secretary, Dr. Schon, in which he set forth the prosperity of the cause of missions, as connected with this Society, the annual election was made of officers, to constitute the Board for the ensuing year. The following was the result:

PRESIDENT.—Bishop Joshua Soule, D. D.

VICE PRESIDENTS.—Bishop James O. Andrew, D. D.; Bishop Wm. Capers, D. D.; Bishop Robert Paine, D. D.; Rev. E. Stevenson, D. D.

SECRETARY.—Rev. E. W. Schon, D. D., elected by the General Conference.

TREASURER.—H. T. Curd, Esq., of Louisville, Ky.

ASSISTANT TREASURERS.—Rev. William Wightman, D. D., Charleston, S. C.; Rev. H. N. McTyeire, New Orleans, La.

MANAGERS.—J. S. Lithgow; S. K. Richardson; J. Mayo; W. Kendrick; C. Daniel; J. Thompson; J. Griffith, M. D.; J. Maguess; T. L. Jefferson; Rev. W. H. Anderson, M. D.; Rev. W. McCallen, M. D.; Rev. F. A. Morris; Rev. A. A. Morrison, Rev. J. W. Cunningham; Rev. A. H. Redford; Rev. C. B. Parsons.

The Secretary states in his address, which is matter of much encouragement to renewed exertion in this noble cause, that the collections of the year now closing, would exceed those of any previous years. How great is the stimulus, then, again to go forth in the name of the Lord, in this mighty field of labor, when the blessings of heaven upon the work, so progressively increase, year after year. Let the next anniversary roll up the report of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars! Who says, Amen?

DONATION OF BOOKS.—Mr. R. G. Latting, President of the Young Men's Christian Association, of New Orleans, acknowledges in a note of graceful correspondence which has been furnished us, the receipt of fifteen volumes of most excellent works—a donation from J. Dick Hill, son of H. R. W. Hill, Esq., to the Library of the Association. We hope to hear of other donations and donors of this sort. Generous citizens may thus easily, and at little cost to themselves, form such a Young Mens' Library here as we hear of elsewhere.

The Association is gaining ground and widening its wholesome influence. Its rooms are at the corner of Camp and Common streets.

THE ODDS.—So it is that two or three theatres, with a circus thrown in, can find full houses, even on week-nights, and men have to pay dearly for entrance—while the Churches, having no door-keeper, can hardly invite themselves full on the Sabbath day!

The passion for gaming, linked of course with the impiety of the times, was illustrated in Bath, England, on the occasion of opening subscription books to provide for the expense of Church service, and for new card-rooms. The epigram has it:

"The books were opened t'other day
At all the shops for Church and play;
The Church got six, Hoyle sixty-seven
How great the odds for hell 'gainst heaven!"

A BISHOP'S CHARGE.

A correspondent of Zion's Herald gives the following, from notes of Bishop Janes's remarks at the late New England Conference:

The candidates for Deacon's orders, seven in number, were examined before the Conference by Bishop Janes.

Having proposed the usual questions, he said that if some member of the Conference would come forward and address to the candidates some suitable counsels, they would confer a favor upon him. No one volunteering to do so, the Bishop proceed to deliver one of the most eloquent and impressive addresses that we ever listened to. It occupied full three quarters of an hour, and seemed to be entirely extempore.

We took full notes, but can give only a very imperfect idea of its real merits. The following is the best that we can give:

The occasion is one of too much importance to pass as a mere business transaction. It is suggestive of profitable reflections. It may be useful to linger a little, and meditate upon the questions we have proposed to you in the name and by the authority of the Church, and in the presence of God and this Conference.

A part of these questions relate to your personal piety. "Have you faith in Christ?" The faith which justifies—which brings pardon, regeneration, and adoption. "Are you going on to perfection?" Are you growing in grace? Are you making attainments in piety? Is your experience a progressive one? "Do you expect to be made perfect in this life?" This question sets forth the nature and attainableness of Christian perfection. Perfectness of love—love to God. Your answer implies a firm belief in its attainableness and preciousness. "Are you groaning after it?" Do you intensely desire it? This is the influence by which God generally leads to the attainment and enjoyment of this grace. We are not impelled by fear, but drawn by "sweet constraint" to seek this blessing. The Holy Spirit inspires the believer to "hunger and thirst"—to "groan after" this attainment. Under this gracious power the aspiring soul pursues this attainment. As soon as sufficiently enlighted, by the mind and spirit of God, to perceive that it is to be realized by faith in Christ, the struggling soul is enabled by the continued assistance of the Divine Spirit to realize this glorious grace.

This deep, improving religious experience, is indispensable to qualify you for the work of the ministry. Nothing else can fully quallfy you to minister to penitents, to visit the sick, to attend the dying, and commend their departing spirits to God, etc. Nothing else can make you happy in the services and sacrifices of itinerant ministers. This is also requisite to secure you the confidence and sympathy of the Church and community for whom you labor.

Some of these questions relate to your purposes: "Are you resolved to devote yourself wholly to God and his work?" "Are you determined to employ all your time in the work of God?" You have answered these questions in the affirmative. Grace has enabled you to form these high and holy resolves. Purposes as noble as were ever formed by human mind or cherished by human heart.

Others of these questions refer to the manner in which you propose to execute these purposes: "Will you diligently instruct the children in every place?" Using the Sabbath School as an auxiliary, and not as a substitute, for pastoral instruction. Also in the family and all other appropriate places giving attention to this duty. Especially using our Church catechism and indoctrinating the rising generation in the great saving truths of Christianity.

"Will you visit from house to house?" As Christian pastors, for religious conversation and prayer, seeking to promote the spiritual interests of the members of the families. By systematizing our labors we can obtain time for essential service. Essential to prepare us to rightly divide the word of God in the pulpit. To enable us to secure the love and sympathy of those to whom we minister. Love to the people, appropriately manifested by the minister, will secure a reciprocity of love from the people to the minister, etc. In illustration of this referred to the example of Father Reeves, as given in his memoir.

"Will you endeavor not to speak too long or too loud?" This question is more significant and important than a casual observer might apprehend. The manner of preaching is a subject of the highest importance. In my opinion no interest of the ministry has been more overlooked and neglected. What gave Whitfield and Summerfield their immense influence? Not their composition or matter. There are scores of men in this Conference who can write as able and eloquent sermons as either of them. What then gave them their pre-eminence in usefulness and reputation? Their manner.

Some make mistakes by cultivating a single gift. One cultivates his reasoning powers, another his imagination, another his powers of declamation. This is an error. The logician should seek to be a rhetorician, and the rhetorician a logician; and both elocutionists. It is necessary therefore that you study not only your theme, but your manner of presenting it. This habit of study must be continued. I know not but that each of you have had the best literary advantages. If so, this will not exonerate you from a life of study. If you have not been favored with these advantages, still studious habits will enable you to attain that knowledge that will enable you to become able ministers of the Lord Jesus Christ. It is not true that a young man without early literary advantages cannot attain to usefulness and respectability in our Conferences. Facts all around us show the contrary. Such sentiment cannot prevail among us without great detriment to the Church. Against such a sentiment I wish to give a word of caution. I wish to encourage preachers and presiding elders to use the same means to bring out young men into the work as were formerly employed. Prayer, without corresponding effort, is like faith without works. Whilst we pray the Lord of the harvest to send forth more laborers into his vineyard, we must use our influence and employ our efforts to bring forward pious and gifted young men into this holy service. Workers together with God in promoting this great and pressing interest of the Kingdom of God. Brethren, be faithful unto death. In the day of the Lord let us hear each of you say, Lord, here am I, and the children thou hast given me.

HONESTY OF THE CONFESSIONAL.

People often stare and admire at such paragraphs as this in editorial columns:

"CASE OF RESTITUTION.—Yesterday one of our leading merchants was waited upon by Rev. Father—— and paid the sum of —— dollars. It was received at the confessional. No questions were asked."

Now, this is intended for capital; and, as capital, often pays well. Not a few are willing to take money and "ask no questions for conscience' sake." The supposition is the confessional worked this; how good a thing it is! With all its faults it does good. It is a much slandered thing, the confessional. And what honest men these priests are to stand between the deceived and the deceiver, the man that has lost and the man that has stolen, and restore to the one his clean conscience, and to the other his lost goods! Honest Fathers! How they are persecuted!

We are glad to see in these cases the evident conviction on priestly minds that the confessional is in such bad odor, and is such a suspicious system it needs these special efforts to redeem its character. Indeed, it has been surmised that "flash cases" are sometimes got up. Five or ten dollars invested in that way pays very well. The restitution does not seek to be done in a corner, though anonymously. It is done with ostentation, and manages to get into the newspapers. This is a pretty cheap way of buying character for honesty and advertising it. The editors puff it, and the multitude are gulled by it.

The question arises, why are these persons not dealt with like others found in possession of stolen goods? Do our laws recognize the confessional, or the priest that presides over that reeking sty of sin, and grant them immunities not granted to other places and other persons? Are thieves protected and covered there, and that so inviolably, that no search can go beyond?

A man in a laborer's blouse is found with a stolen watch or bank bill. He is arrested and made to account for it. Delivering up the property is not enough; he must designate the guilty or stand guilty himself. A man in long coat, with shaven crown, is found in the same fix. He gets thanks and a newspaper puff for honesty, and no questions asked. Is there any reason or right in such distinction? Only mention it, and people of common sense see and feel its absurdity. If a plain man, a citizen, is found in possession of stolen goods, and cannot or will not tell how he came by them, or who stole them, legal presumption implicates him in the theft. And why should not Roman Catholic priests and bishops fall under this presumption? Where is the law exempting them, and making an exception in their favor, so that what is prima facie evidence that others are thieves, is proof of their superlative honesty?

It may conciliate an avaricious man to get ten or twenty dollars (we have never heard of any very large sums) that he did not know he had ever lost, "and no questions asked." But it is questionable whether commercial honesty, and the safety of property, or reputation, is benefitted by such a transaction. Suspicion may fall widely about, and very unjustly; or perhaps the party that lost the money was not the party that got it back. Or, even if he should get back some by this mysterious restitution, it may not be all that has mysteriously disappeared. Where is the balance? Who is most likely to have it, or to know who has it? If not the principal, at least the accessory is now known. Here is a clue to the deed,—why not follow it up? Yes, we say, follow it up, in the person of a long coat, just as if he wore a short coat, or no coat at all!

Society has seen enough of this miserable gammon, and paid dearly enough for it. We are glad to see one of the "cases" has been properly estimated. The Chicago Tribune gives the following, and heads it:

"WAS THIS RESTITUTION?"

"One of our prominent lawyers was waited upon yesterday by Bishop Vandeveldo and Father McElhern, of the Catholic Church, and presented with eight dollars, which the Bishop said was a restitution made to the lawyer by one of Father McElhern's flock for a wrong done to him to that amount. What was the nature of the wrong, or by whom was it done? The Bishop and Priest refused of course to divulge—as the knowledge of it had been obtained through the confessional. The lawyer refused to take the money, offered as it was, as payment in full for a wrong done, on the ground that a wrong could not be made right by money. The person who did the wrong must confess the deed to the injured party, that unjust suspicions of innocent persons, which might have been aroused, could be removed; that the real offender could be forgiven, and the whole account squared between the parties. The taking of eight dollars from some unknown person, for some unrevealed wrong, was no righting of the matter at all. So the lawyer argued; to which the Priests replied by leaving the money on the lawyer's desk, and politely and quietly retiring."

It would be a sight to see these gentlemen "picked up" in the act, and such a lawyer as that allowed to "ask questions" before a jury, and no dodging. The boasted honesty of the confessional would stand a chance to suffer. It would not do then to say that these stolen goods were got at the confessional. Just as well say they were got at the cross roads, and the person they can identify, but don't feel at liberty, beg to be excused, etc. The law knows no place above another.

To this arrest and detection some may object that fewer stolen goods would be restored. We answer: fewer goods would be stolen.

METHODIST PRESS.

BILL AGAINST AN EDITOR.—The Western Christian Advocate, of the 20th ult., contained an interesting editorial on the Congregationalists and English Methodist Reformers, showing how the former had "sown to the wind and reaped the whirlwind," and the latter were in a bad way. It was prefaced thus:

"From our London Correspondent, whose article will appear next week, we learn that considerable confusion now exists in the ranks of the English Methodist Reformers."

A friend, who had read the letter of our London Correspondent of the 2d ult., was struck with the agreement between it and said editorial—not only in material, but a good deal of it, verbatim agreement: and advised that a bill be made out against the editor for materials of an editorial!

In the Western Advocate of the 27th ult. the promised "article" appears,—in which we fail to find any famulation, or matter for the editorial professed to be based upon it. Among all our exchanges it is not found.

Now, this seems a small matter. And so it is: rather too small! We pay for those letters, and if the editor of the Western uses them he ought to know they should be credited. We notice this, because it is not the first trespass of the sort in that quarter. We shall not render any bill against the Western for past dues, but advise him not do so any more. "X. Y." might not like it!

A PREACHER DROWNED.—The California Advocate, of the 13th April, contains the news of the death of Rev. Mr. Bennem, late of Brooklyn, N. Y., who joined the Conference, North, in February, and was appointed to Cache Creek Circuit. He was a young man of promise and piety:

"It occured on the 28th March, about eight in the morning. He crossed the stream the afternoon of the day previous, without having to swim his horse, and probably not aware that it had risen three feet during the night supposed he could do so again. This may account for his apparent want of coolness and deliberation. The persons on the shore say that the horse seemed to swim well, but that the first plunge he made in the deep water carried Brother B. behind the saddle; in this condition he dropped the bridle, and held himself steady by grasping the saddle. That when the horse was close to the opposite shore Brother B. regained his hold of the bridle, but unfortunately pulled so as to turn the horse round. The persons on shore seeing this, and believing that the horse would get out, if let alone, called to him to let go the bridle; which he did. At this moment he was swept from the horse by the current, and disappeared. Shortly after he rose to the surface, was seen for a moment, and then sunk to rise no more."

METHODISM IN THE WORLD.—Zion's Herald so cyphers up. Alas! how vain is numerical boast if there be not piety, and a sense of duty corresponding to strength. We are afraid of this "numbering the people." It may lead to pride, and to ease, and vain confidence. Without vitality, the greater the mass the sooner it falls to pieces, and the greater the fall:

"The statistics of all the various branches of Methodism, in Europe and America, show a total of ten thousand four hundred and nine traveling, and thirty-three thousand local preachers, who minister to two millions thirty-six thousand one hundred and sixty-two communicants. This is only a part of the result of one hundred and ten years labor; for during that period tens of thousands of our people have gone to their reward. What hath God wrought?"

NEW HEADS.—We have been quite entertained, and "hold in surprise" by the capital metamorphoses of the Nashville Advocate. Unrolling the good sheet one day, lo and behold, the meek man that had been holding forth from the high pulpit, these two years, was gone! Another, with less gown and severe aspect, and marked cerebral development, had succeeded. We have always heard of Brother McFerrin as a mighty champion for good old Methodism. Reckon he thought it against discipline for that preacher to occupy the same pulpit more than two years. The second one did not have so long a run, but soon came down, and the whole high head, with the stairs to get up to it, came toppling down after, waking no doubt that sleepy-looking congregation and scattering them. In fair, neat letters, loomed up CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE! Wonder if Brother McFerrin got scared at the approach of General Conference, lest the rule about "high heads" should be enforced!

THE MISSOURI COLLEGE.—The St. Louis Advocate details the proceedings of a joint Convention, on education, of delegates from St. Louis and Missouri Conferences. St. Charles (where a literary institution already exists) and Fayette, Mo., were nominated as the site of the College, which the Methodists of those growing Conferences propose to make the centre of their operations. The editor says:

"Many, very many, no doubt, would have preferred some other place, but in a matter of this kind it is impossible that the wishes and feelings of all should be accommodated; then, we must all learn to bear and forbear, and when we cannot get all we desire, let us take what we can get, and be content. A majority of the Convention said it should be at Fayette—at Fayetto, then, let it be!"

We regret there was not more unanimity in the Convention about the "ways and means."

DEATH.—The Memphis (5th instant) reports the death of Dr. Wesley Warren, on the 5th April, a minister of lovely spirit. Also has this obituary paragraph, which we hope will not be confirmed:

"Rev. Dr. B. H. Hubbard died on the 24 instant of pneumonia. We have just learned the fact, but have not time to say more before the closing of the mail."

REVIVAL.—Rev. R. M. Saunders, pastor of the Macon, (Mi.) Station, Alabama Conference, writes this good news, on the 6th inst:

"We have had an old-fashioned, shouting, Methodist revival, in our new brick church. The Church was much refreshed. Over twenty conversions, and several accessions. To God be all the glory!"

NEW BISHOP.—The Rev. Thomas F. Davis, of Grace Church, Camden, South Carolina, was elected Bishop of South Carolina on the 6th instant, on the twelfth ballot, by the Episcopal Convention, now in session at Charleston. The election was made to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Bishop Gadsden.

WIDOW OF THE LATE RICHARD WATSON.—Mrs. Mary Watson, the widow of the great theologian, died on the 29th of March, in Birmingham, at the residence of Rev. Doctor Dixon, her son-in-law. She was seventy-five years of age, and is thus described by the London Watchman:

"Mrs. Watson was a calm, judicious, well informed and devout Christian. As the wife of the eminent man, whose name she bore, she was admirably adapted to his character—the delicacy and soundness of her judgment, the elevated tone of her piety, inspired him with the utmost confidence. For the past six years she had been reduced to great weakness without the endurance of pain. The change from extreme debility to dissolution was gradual and easy, and she departed this life in peace."

"SUMMERS ON BAPTISM."

MR. EDITOR:—Allow me to say again to the members of the Alabama Conference, that in pursuance to their action at our last session, a large supply of "Summers on Baptism" has been forwarded to Mobile, to the care of Carver & Ryland; and, by mistake some three hundred copies have been forwarded to me. Brethren can have their orders filled from either point, and it is to be hoped they will send them in.

AMERICAN CHURCH CUSTOMS.—An English traveler in this country thus describes in his "book" some of the "queer things" he met with in his wanderings:

"Now, to tell you of some of the queer things one sees and hears in this queer country. One of the most foreign-looking sights to a stranger is the appearance which the churches present during service, especially if the day be hot. Every lady has her fan, which she brings with her, or more generally keeps lying in her pew. What a funny sight! There they sit, young girls and young ladies, newly married and old married ladies, black ladies and white ladies, fanning away as if their lives depended on their never ceasing. In front of the minister, on this side and on that, up in the front of the galleries, and back in the galleries, there they go, fan, fan, fan, fan. There are fans of paper, fans of grass, fans of ivory, fans of feathers, fans of everything. There they go, those who have no fans using their prayer-books or Bibles, fan, fan, fan. Arms moving and heads keeping time, flutter, flutter, flutter—one fan, two fans, three fans—fans innumerable. Oh! dear! It surely is hot.

"Another peculiarity connected with their churches, is that of the gentlemen always rising up and leaving the pew to let a lady enter. A lady, indeed, when she reaches her pew, never thinks of going in till all the gentlemen first step out. In she goes, and in go the obsequious gentlemen after, only to repeat the performance in three minutes, when another lady comes in. I have often seen five gentlemen have to get up and go out. I was myself a victim to this practice. Last Sabbath I went over to New York to hear Dr. Spring preach. I could not find the door-keeper to show me to a seat, so I entered a vacant pew on chance, and sat at the head of it, as we do in Scotland. Presently the church door opened, and in walked a lady marshalled by my friend the door-keeper. Up they marched till they came to my pew, when he, opening the door, beckoned to me with his finger to come out.

"Unfortunately for me, I was reading a hymn at the time, and was so engaged that I did not at first see the telegraphic signal; so there sat I, composedly reading, and there stood my friend, the door-keeper, impatiently beckoning; beside him stood the minister's wife, (for it was no less a personage whom I was keeping standing there,) while round about sat the congregation, curiously looking. At last I caught his eye, or rather his finger—had to get up, and to the right-about march let this free-born lady enter her pew—possession, in this case, not proving nine points of the law. I got well punished for my lack of politeness, or, as I will call it, for my ignorance, by feeling the tell-tale blood mount up to the crown of my head. One thing I felt strongly inclined to do, was to give the fellow a word in season."

THE NEW ENGLAND METHODIST CONFERENCE.—At the session of the Methodist Conference at Ipswich, May 2, the Committee on Slavery reported the following series of resolutions, which after considerable discussion, were adopted:

1. That as a Conference we are as fully and deeply convinced as ever that all voluntary slaveholding, or the holding of slaves in bondage for the sake of gain, under any circumstances, is a flagrant sin against God and humanity.

2. That it is our deliberate and settled opinion, that no more persons guilty of the sin of slaveholding, should be admitted as members into our Church.

3. That we are fully persuaded that if a proper discipline were duly administered, or if the spirit even of our present discipline were fully carried out, all voluntary slaveholders would soon be either brought to repentance and reformation of life, or for the sin of slaveholding expelled from the Church.

4. That as there is a difference of opinion as to whether our discipline, as it now reads, would exclude such persons from our communion, it is the sense of this Conference that the difference should be so altered and amended as to include a well defined and clearly expressed rule prohibiting their reception into the communion of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

The Convention, after passing resolutions in favor of the Maine Law, resolved to send five delegates to represent the Conference at the World's Temperance Convention.

OBITUARY:

Died—On the 5th of April, 1853, in Noxubee, Miss., MRS. HARRIET A. SMITH, consort of Wade Smith.

She was born in 1826, and had been a consistent member of the Methodist Church six years; was at her place at the Lord's table four weeks before death, where her tearful eye and radiant countenance indicated that communion which is the privilege of God's people only.

She was calm and sane on Sunday morning, told her husband very frankly told her she must soon die. The announcement did not seem to alarm her; she only expressed a desire for a brighter manifestation of God's favor to light her path through the dark valley. Soon, however, reason was dethroned and so continued until night, when she sweetly smiled and the spirit fled.

LATHER GREAT PROJECT.—It is now a certained ascertained fact that Mobile will immediately build a railroad to Pascagoula. If those whose great interests require it, and whose by means can command it, have resolved on it, and with those great property holders, where is to do.

COMPLIMENT TO SUNDAY.—Do our readers generally know the reason why the 4th of March was chosen as the day of the inauguration of the President of the United States? It was selected because the 4th of March in every four years, commencing from the first inauguration, would come on Sunday for at least three hundred years.

Mr. Bryaal, editor of the New York Evening Post, who is traveling in the East, writes that the ancient bigotry of the Moslems is fast receding. Not only do the Turks get drunk like Christians, of which I was sorry to see some examples on board the Austrian steamer that brought me hither from Beyrout, but they submit to contact with the Christians, and do not think themselves as once they did, contaminated by it; and they suffer our presence in their holy places."

LEXINGTON NATIONAL MONUMENT.—The contributions in aid of this monument, during April, amounted to $2192 43, including $50 from W. W. Corcoran, of Washington; $5 from Hon. U. S. Senate," a literary society at Pottsville, Montgomery county, Md.; $100 from J. Kelett, of Mobile; $38 from Evansville, Henderson county, Va.; $5 from H. L. Morfit, of Washington, and $171 from visitors to Monument Place. The expenditures of the month were $250 95.

VOICE FROM THE QUARTER DECK.—At the late supper on board the ship Queen of the Clippers, at New York, Captain Eldridge made an excellent speech. In alluding to the difficulties which ship-masters are compelled to encounter, which are not incident to the professions practiced on shore, the astuts and ready skipper said:

"If the merchant's clerk is delinquent in his duties, if he is not up in his books, accurate in his accounts, attentive to his duties, he has only to pay him his wages, dismiss him civilly, without the sacrifice of dignity, and employ another; but on board ship the master's word must be law; the least neglect of duty or disobedience of orders may involve a sacrifice of the interests of owners and passengers, and possibly the loss of the ship. If we could take him by the nape of the neck and the back of his overalls, and pitch him into the sea, and draw out another in his place, the community would never blame shipmasters for a tyrannical exercise of authority. But we must content ourselves with the material we have, and train and discipline the worst of them to the condition of good and able seamen. We have no interest in misusing them: on the contrary, our object is to make them not only competent but willing, and we are as anxious to conciliate their respect, as to secure their obedience."

MOVEMENT FOR THE PROMOTION OF TEMPERANCE.—A number of citizens of NewYork have signed petitions to the authorities, praying that licenses to sell liquors may hereafter be refused to all groceries, and granted only to hotels and to saloons where nothing but liquors are sold, and that the charge for licenses in such cases may be raised to fifty dollars instead of ten.

DEATH OF JUDGE BURNET.—Hon. Jacob Burnet died at his residence in Cincinnati, on the 9th inst., aged about 82 years. He was a native of Newark, N. J., a son of the late Dr. Wm. Burnet, who served throughout the war of the Revolution. He graduated at Nassau Hall, Princeton, completed his legal studies with the late Judge Boudinot of Newark, and was admitted to the bar in 1796. He immediately proceeded to Cincinnati.

We have stated in an eastern paper that boss carpenters, ship builders, and other master mechanics, insert now in their contracts for heavy work, a clause by which they are to be protected from "strikes;" that is, if they make a contract to build a house or ship, they will not be required to proceed in case a "strike" occurs, by which they will be compelled to pay higher wages to their workmen.

Mr. Robert Gardner, of Lowell, called at a drug store for some pulverized rhubarb, and what he supposed was rhubarb was put up by a boy in attendance. He took the medicine just before going to bed, and about 11 o'clock was awakened to be in great distress, and died in a short time. From the boy it was learned that Mr. Gardner had taken forty grains of pulverized opium instead of rhubarb—the boy understanding him to call for opium.

MRS. HARRIET BEECHER STOWE'S CHARITY.—There was recently a family of thirty slaves in Virginia which the owner offered to sell into Carolina at a very small price, and some benevolent parties in Philadelphia undertook to raise the amount by subscription. The facts were communicated by letter to Mrs. Sigourney, who immediately enclosed twenty-five dollars for the object. Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe was also written to, and of course she responded by sending a very large sum of money for the "glorious purpose." She had just realized an immense sum by her abolitionism; she was on the eve of starting for England, to be feted by the Duchess of Sutherland, and caressed by the hand of nobility, and of course she gave a very large sum to purchase these thirty slaves. No, good soul, she gave not one cent. She sent back a letter full of sweet sympathy, abounding with the charity of advice and approval, but as empty of money as her own face is of shame at the contemptible part she is now playing in England of helping a State's evidence against her country. She had no money for "the poor slave." Her dear eminent friend and co-laboror, Mr. Amistad Black, would say, "it is not in our way." Such is mission", is to make money out of negro philanthropy, and not for it.—[N. Y. National Democrat.

By the arrival of the steamship Perseverance we have been placed in possession of Galveston papers to the 3d inst., and from the Interior as late due.

The city of Galveston was visited with a terrible storm on the afternoon of the 2d inst. We copy the following account of it, and the damage done, from the Civilian of the 3d:

Yesterday afternoon Galveston was visited with the most severe storm that we have witnessed for many years. The wind blew, for some two hours, from the West and North, with a force little short of a hurricane. Fortunately, but little damage was done to property on shore.

The prostration of a number of shade-trees, and some slight damage to a few buildings, constitute the principal loss, with the exception of that sustained by Mr. St. Cyr, which resulted from the unroofing of his large store, and the damage to his goods from the rain. His loss is very considerable—probably some thousands of dollars.

The store of Albert Ball, on the margin of the bay, also sustained some damage from the schooner Foam being driven against it by the wind. The Columbia Hotel was somewhat injured, having a gable end blown off.

The shipping suffered greatly. It is impossible, at this moment, to give a complete statement of the loss, as it will take some time to ascertain the entire extent of the injury.

Burning of the Ocean Wave.—Twenty-Eight Lives Lost.

A few days ago we had a brief dispatch stating that the steamboat Ocean Wave had been destroyed by fire on Friday night, six miles west of the "Ducks." She is reported to have had fifty persons on board, twenty-two of whom only were saved, including Capt. Wright, the mate, and the purser. The Ocean Wave was owned at this place by the Northern Railroad Company, and has been running between this port and Hamilton for freight and passengers. She was on her downward trip. She was insured in different States and in the Canadas.

ODDENSBURGH, May 1.

We have further particulars of the loss of the Ocean Wave from one of the crew, Stephen Blackmau. The Ocean Wave took fire from her furnace on her downward trip off the "Ducks," about forty miles above Kingston, on Saturday morning, about 2 o'clock. When the fire was first discovered she was about a mile and a half from the shore, which she was immediately headed for, but so intense was the heat that the machinery gave out and she drifted to sea. The upper cabin was consumed in about fifteen minutes, and in about two hours the hull went down. Those saved were taken off by the schooner Georgiana.

The Ocean Wave had on board fourteen cabin and nine deck passengers, beside four children and the crew, who swelled the number to about fifty, of whom twenty-two were saved. Among the saved were Capt. Wright and both mates; Thomas Oliver, the purser; both wheel-men, the second engineer, Mr. Blackman, and a number of deck-hands. Among the passengers saved were Mr. Francis Kiah and wife, both of whom were burned, but not dangerously; Mrs. French, of Cornwall, and the wife of Mr Moore, of the Gore Bank, Hamilton. These three were all the females saved. A small vessel, on her way downward, sent a boat to the assistance of the ill-fated steamer, but the men being frightened, pulled away again.

The schooner Georgiana then hove in sight, lowered a boat which was manned with her mate and two sailors, and succeeded in picking up eighteen persons. In two minutes after their rescue the wreck went down. She had drifted eight miles from the shore before she sunk. The captain, first mate and one passenger reached the shore near the disaster, and the two brought the rest to Kingston. Among those lost are Mr. Turnbull, first engineer, Julius Saunders, bar-keeper; the cook; Mrs. Donald; a nurse and three children of the Cashier of the Gore Bank, Hamilton; three ladies, names unknown; Mr. Lyman B. Fisko, of the firm of H. S. Humphrey, of Ogdensburg—whole number lost at least twenty-eight. The progress of the flames was so rapid that it was impossible to launch any of the boats which were on board.

This is a sad disaster, and the most melancholy one that has occurred on Lake Ontario. If our memory is correct, the Ocean Wave was built last summer at Montreal, by Mr. Molson, and was intended for the trade on the north side of the lake, between Montreal and Hamilton. She was, however, sold to some gentlemen at Ogdensburg, and put on the line between that port and the head waters of Lake Ontario.

Either on her trial trip, or very soon after, she took fire and had to throw overboard a portion of her cargo. Among those who were lost are the nurse and three children of Andrew Stevens, Esq., Cashier of the Gore Bank, at Hamilton.

FROM CORNHILL TO CANTON BY WIRE.—It appears that a company of Englishmen have under contract a proposed telegraphic line from London to the East Indies and China. According to a Genoa correspondent of the Newark Daily, the work is already commenced, and the line has been actually made from London to Genoa. The government of Sardinia has also just entered into a contract with Mr. John Brett, who represents a large number of British capitalists—the same which carried the line across the British Channel—for carrying it on from the main land at Spezzia to the further extremity of the Island of Sardinia, in the midst of the Mediterranean; and France will see that it is continued thence to the province of Algiers, on the coast of Africa. The interest that England has in its continuance to her rich possessions in the East, is obvious enough without specification.

The company has engaged to have the line from Spezzia to the Island completed within eighteen months, at its own risk and expense, and the government gives it a monopoly for fifty years, when it will become the property of the State. The cost is estimated at $600,000. It is provided, among the details of the contract, that the government shall have the free use of the line for its dispatches, and a certain small interest in the income of the business, for which it guarantees to the company an interest of five per cent. on the capital or cost of the work. The price of all dispatches is fixed at fifty cents for forty words.

The whole line from Spezzia, the nearest point of the main land, to the termination on the Island, (port of Cagliari) will be 414 miles, of which 83 will be under water, and 331 over land, (including the intermediate French Island of Corsica,) thus:

From Spezzia to Corsica	76 miles.
Across Corsica	128 "
Across the Straits of Boulfacio	7 "
Across Island of Serdinia	203 "
Total	414

Thus we see that within eighteen months there will be a telegraphic line from London to the very bosom of the Mediterranean. France, it is understood, will bear her share in the work on the Island of Corsica. The distance between Constantinople, Algiers, Egypt, the Islands of the sea, distant India and China, and the seats of European civilization and commerce, for all purposes of correspondence, will thus be greatly diminished. [N. Y. Evening Post.

CALIFORNIA FREIGHTS.—The Boston papers say that the recent news from California has sensibly affected freight at that port, and ships are with difficulty filled up. Even the first class ships can obtain now but sixty-five cents per foot in place of eighty-five and ninety obtained some weeks since.

ARTICLES FOR THE CRYSTAL PALACE EXHIBITION.—A letter from Genoa to the New York Advertiser states that Sardinia, and in fact all Italy, will be better represented in the Crystal Palace Exhibition in New York than in London. The fine Sardinian bark Maria Eugenie, Capt. Colombino, has sailed from Genoa with some 60 tons of the finest specimens of Sardinian art and industry, and another vessel is now receiving a large quantity for the same destination, valued at some 600,000 francs.

LATER FROM CALIFORNIA.

Arrival of the Steamship DANIEL WEBSTER.

By the arrival of the steamship Daniel Webster yesterday afternoon, we are placed in possession of dates from California to the 17th of April.

The Webster, Grafham commanding, left San Juan on the morning of the 4th inst., with passengers from California of the 16th ult. The ship Prometheus sailed the same day with 400 passengers for NewYork. Left in port U. S. sloop Cyane, Lt. M. S. ship Albon, brig Townsend Jones, which latter was to sail for NewYork with full cargo, on the 5th inst. On the 8th

[From the San Francisco Times.]

EXPLOSION OF THE STEAMER JENNY LIND—Fifteen Killed—Thirty-six Wounded.—Our city was yesterday thrown into consternation by the intelligence received from San Mateo by express of a dreadful disaster which occurred in our bay opposite the Pulgas ranch. Yesterday morning the steamer Jenny Lind took about one hundred and twenty-five passengers on board at Alviso, and started on her trip to this city. About half-past 12 o'clock, when nearly opposite the Pulgas ranch, the company on board were just about being seated to dinner in the after cabin, the steamer proceeding at moderate speed, when the back portion of the connecting pipe was blown asunder, and the steam swept into the crowded cabin, dealing death and destruction around.

Those in the forward part of the boat, with the exception of a fireman, who was standing in front of the furnace door, escaped; the latter, a powerful, fine looking man, was struck in the head by the flying open of the furnace door, so that the skull was laid open and the brain exposed; persons came to his assistance, but he motioned them away, saying, "No, I'm a dead man, go help others," and soon after breathed his last.

Immediately upon the occurrence of the disaster, the anchor was let go, and Mr. Peter Smith, a passenger on board, swam ashore in the marsh and gave information of the calamity. Shortly afterwards a schooner and one or two small craft came out from Pulgas Ranch; but before use could be made of them, the steamer Union, Capt. James Mastern, came out from Alameda Creek, and observing a steamer anchored with the flag set union down in signal of distress, made for her and took off the passengers. Immediately upon receiving intelligence of the disaster, his Honor, Mayor Brenham, set about making preparations for the relief of the sufferers. He was on the point of chartering the steamer Georgina, or any other that might be procured, but was not put to the necessity, as Capt. Young, the owner of the Jenny Lind, immediately proceeded to make arrangements, chartering the steamer Kate Kearny. However, Capt. Johnson, of the latter boat, insisted upon proceeding with her to the wreck on his own responsibility, and with most commendable kindness and activity, made every preparation for getting immediately under way, with such articles as could be procured that might be of service to the wounded.

At about half-past nine P. M. the Kate Kearny started. A great many persons had assembled on board with the intention of proceeding to the wreck, to render what assistance might be in their power, or to relieve or confirm their apprehensions for the safety of friends; but at the request of Coroner Gray, who represented the annoyance that would result from lack of room, the greater portion returned on shore.

It was not without many a shudder that we made our way through those groups of dead and dying that lay stiff and cold or in silent agony along the entire length of the deck, so that at each step the gaze would meet either the glazed eye of death or the disfigured countenance of some tortured wretch, whose glance would be upturned to ours with a painful and piteous expression. The atmosphere below was but to suffocation with steam and the heated furnaces; and the peculiar odor of scalded flesh told such a tale of suffering as made one faint and sick at heart. Yet there (and where has it not been so where suffering is?) the first sight that peculiarly moved us was the presence of several females, bending over the sick and administering to their wants, familiarizing their gentle natures with the ghastliness of death for the sake of yielding their blessed solace and relief.

It was a difficult task to do aught but attempt to alleviate the pangs of those around, yet, knowing the anxiety of many on shore, we made every effort to ascertain the names of the dead and wounded. It appeared, however, that no list of passengers had been taken at Alviso, and we had no means of obtaining the desired information, except from questioning those who were acquainted with the parties. Till now, we have only ascertained the following names, forming, we fear, but a small proportion of those who suffered:

Mr. Noah Ripley, dying; Mrs. Noah Ripley, dying; the three children of the above, two girls and a little boy, dead; Mrs. Emerson, badly scalded; Mrs. David Page, dying; her daughter, dead; Mrs. Kimball, dead; Franklyn Hosworth, badly scalded; Mr. Bain, badly scalded; the little boy of the above, dead; Bryan Murphy, badly scalded; his nephew, scalded; G. Simmonds, of San Jose, scalded; negro cook, scalded; F. F. Collier, scalded; R. A. Wyman, scalded; Mrs. Winlac, dead; F. Gregg, badly scalded; Thomas J. Kell, badly scalded; Thos. Golden, badly scalded; Jacob D. Hoppe, badly scalded; L. F. Drake, dead; Edward Bain, badly scalded; the wife of A. Loraine, 18 Clay street, badly scalded; A. Goldsmith, slightly scalded; the steward and two firemen, dead; two waiters, scalded; several Mexican ladies and children, badly scalded. One man was badly scalded that was wrecked on the Independence.

The above are all the particulars we could learn in relation to the sufferers. We have heard the number of dead, exclusive of those drowned, rated as high as twenty. Several died after the Union was hailed by the Kearny.

The owners of the Jenny Lind had built a few days before expended the sum of $100 upon the boiler; the boat was new, and considered safe in every respect. The captain, mate and one of the crew remained on the wreck.

The Steamship S. S. Lewis Ashore.

PASSENGERS SAVED—Total Loss of the Ship. We are again called upon to chronicle the loss of one of the ocean steamers plying upon this coast. The steamship S. S. Lewis, Capt. Spurrow, belonging to the Nicaragua Line, went ashore about half-past three o'clock Saturday morning, in the vicinity of Bolinas Bay, about 15 miles north of the Heads. A dense fog prevailed at the time, and the ship was kept standing off and on until the mist should rise, and show the position of the coast. Sweeny & Baugh's Fog Bell was ringing out its notes of warning, but the ship had stood so far to the northward, that the bell was not heard on board. The Purser, who came overland to Saucelito, and thence by boat to the city, has not furnished us with an official report of the disaster, and we are in consequence compelled to give the story as it reached us, without vouching for its accuracy in minor details.

The ship was under easy headway; all hands literally in the fog as to where they were, when she struck upon a reef that ran out some distance from the shore, about six miles north of Bolinas Bay. Every effort was made to back her and get her off, but without avail. The sea was high and striking her violently, threw her broadside on to the reef, where she now lies, keeled over.

A scene of the greatest confusion and terror ensued, but order was partially restored, and the boats were lowered. In these the ladies and children were first placed, and although the surf was high between the ship and the shore, a distance of about 400 yards, they were safely landed, and the boats returned for the rest of the passengers. By eight o'clock in the morning these were all landed in safety, and by dint of great exertions, the greatest part of the baggage also. The Purser then started overland for this city to obtain assistance. There were in all 385 persons on board, about twenty of whom reached the city last evening on board of a schooner that was lying in the Bay at the time of the wreck. At last accounts, the sea had stove in her bottom, and was making a clean sweep over her, with 16 feet water in her hold. She was fast going to pieces. When the Purser left, the water had reached the cabin, and the safe, containing the papers, etc., had not been saved.

The passengere walked overland to the rancheria at Bolinas Bay, where tents have been erected, and every effort made to render their position as comfortable as possible until assistance reached them.

We learn that Capt Garrison, the agent of the Company, will dispatch the Goliah at daylight this morning to the scene of the disaster, and bring off the passengers who may still remain upon the beach. The wreck can be seen with a glass from the outer Telegraph Station.

BREAKING UP OF THE S. S. LEWIS.—Captain Alden, of the U. S. steamer Active, repaired at an early hour yesterday morning to the spot where the wreck of the S. S. Lewis had occurred, to render all the assistance in his power to the unfortunate passengers who had been cast ashore and compelled to spend the night at so inhospitable a place. Scarcely a vestige of the ill-fated ship could be seen, except pieces of her timbers floating here and there on the waters. She had been dashed to pieces by the violence of the waves before daylight yesterday morning. The Goliah, sent by Capt. Garrison, was also on the spot at an early hour. The passengers were found all well, but anxious enough to leave their uncomfortable quarters. It is not true that all the baggage was saved. We have heard of several who lost all they had on board. Little or none of the furniture and valuables about the ship were saved, owing to the fury of the waves, which soon held undisputed sway over the wreck. The Active arrived at her berth about half-past one o'clock yesterday afternoon, bringing up about two-thirds of the passengers from the beach. The Goliah would bring the rest.

MINING INTELLIGENCE.—The supply of water, from the late rains, is almost exhausted in this locality, but while it lasted every advantage was taken of it. Where it is still available miners are doing well, and in various parts we have heard, during the week, of new diggings having been struck. Such circumstances are so common that they are scarcely thought worthy of notice, but we think them important, when so many are found leaving this country in search of a better, and more especially when we hear people speak of the mines of California being exhausted. Let energetic measures be adopted to secure a constant supply of water, and discoveries of gold will be found in California equal to any ever made.

The citizens of this town are of the progressive order. Quite a neat little church, belonging to the Methodist Episcopal Church, North, has been recently erected, where the Rev. Mr. Pettit officiates nearly every Sabbath. His house is not, however, I learn, as largely attended as that of the Rev. Mr. Bingham of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, who preaches in the Masonic Hall.

FROM PANAMA — GORGONA DESTROYED BY FIRE.—We have Panama papers to the 3d inst., by the Philadelphia.

The town of Gorgona was almost entirely destroyed by a fire which broke out about three o'clock on the morning of the 23th ult., in the transportation store of Willacey & Co.

Colonel Tocornal, by whose coolness and intrepidity the citizens of Valparaiso were saved from pillage and outrage during the insurrection at that place on the 28th October, 1851, had arrived at Panama, and was received with marked attentions. The object of his visit is not stated.

FROM SOUTH AMERICA.—By the British steamship Bogota, the Panama papers have advices from Valparaiso to the 31st of March, Callao the 12th of April, and Paita the 15th. The Bogota arrived at Panama on the 19th ult. She had thirty-five passengers and $300,000 in specie. The Star gives the following summary of her news:

Bolivia and Peru.—It is feared that these two Republics were about to commence hostilities with each other. We learn that the Peruvian Minister has been driven from the former Republic. War had not yet been declared, but it was feared that the expulsion of the Peruvian agent would accelerate the act.

Buenos Ayres.—An express arrived at Lima on the 9th, announcing that peace was declared, a treaty signed, and Gen. Urquiza had entered the capital.

Chili.—Nothing new or interesting had transpired; tranquility reigned throughout the Republic. President Moatt was received at Valparaiso with great enthusiasm and eclat.

A heavy norther set in on the 30th ult., causing considerable damage among the shipping in port. The following is a list of vessels sunk, and more or less damaged:

Chilian ship California, Lavando, lost; Chilian brig Lord Cochrane, lost; American clipper Warner, damaged; Chilian brig Dos Amigos, damaged; Chilian schooner Elvira, damaged. Several launches upset and sunk.

Details of the Baltic's News.

The steamer Baltic, which arrived at New York on the 1st inst., left Liverpool on the afternoon of the 20th April. We copy some details of news by her, either not given at all by telegraph, or very meagerly:

ITALY.

The Sardinian Government publishes in the official journal, a memorandum of the differences with Austria on the subject of the sequestrations. The application of this measure to Sardinian subjects is declared to be a serious violation of rights, on which the Sardinian Government appeals to the conscience of the Vienna cabinet when better informed, and invokes the good offices of friendly and allied sovereigns.

The Tuscan loan is for a million of two per cent. rentes, at the price of 66.

From Vienna it is reported by telegraph that Count Revel the Piedmontese Embassador, has quitted that capital en congé; an act which, less grave than a formal withdrawal, marks distinctly the unfriendly relations of the two governments. The Marquis de Cantato directs the affairs of the Sardinian Legation at Vienna.

The following is given as semi-official, in explanation of the course pursued by the Piedmontese Embassador:

The Cabinet of Turin had directed Count de Revel to delay his departure as long as possible, and to ascertain exactly if the Imperial Cabinet were disposed, even in the lightest degree, to listen to his representations. The Count waited to the very last moment, and acted in accordance with the British and French Ministers. But it appeared to him evident that, in spite of the moderate language used by Count de Beul, there was no hope that Austria would revoke the measure which she had taken. He, in consequence, withdrew. The Sardinian Government thought that this proceeding was required by the respect due its own dignity. It certainly has no intention of aggression, but it has proved that in the legitimate defence of its subjects prosecuted by Austria, it does not want courage to repel an unjust attack.

HOLLAND.

The Second Chamber of the States General of Holland reassembled yesterday afternoon, (April 18.) at the Hague. All the members of the Cabinet were present. In the course of the sitting, Herr VanDorn asked and obtained permission of the Chamber to put a question to the Government respecting the regulating of the Roman Catholic community in the Netherlands. The question gave rise, as anticipated, to a long and somewhat stormy discussion, in which seven members, including three Cabinet Ministers, took part. The latter stated that the Dutch Government had acted on the constitutional principle that each religious community was at liberty to regulate, as it pleased, its own internal affairs, subject, of course, to the obedience due to the laws of the country.

All the document relating to the question of the establishing of a Roman Catholic hierarchy in Holland would be laid before the Chamber. Two members declared they would refrain from expressing any opinion respecting the matter until they had perused all the documents. Another member (Herr Van Hall) asked whether the Bishops had been nominated by the Pope, and the reply on the part of the Government was in the affirmative. The House then adjourned. Numerously signed petitions are still being forwarded to the King, praying his Majesty not to recognize the Bishops appointed by the Pope. The Amsterdam petition was signed by not less than 51,000 Protestants.

Another account says that the Ministry had announced to the Chambers that not only had strong remonstrances been made to the people, but that the Dutch Embassador had been withdrawn from Rome. The announcement was received with marked satisfaction.

SPAIN.

The new Cabinet of Spain is thus formed: President of the Council and Minister of War, General Lorsundi; Foreign Affairs, M. Ayllon; Justice, M. Govantes; Finance, M. Bermudez de Castro; Interior, M. Egana; and Marine, M. Doral. M. Ayllan is representing his sovereign at Vienna, and as he cannot have been consulted on the crisis, he may refuse to take a ministerial office, as he did on a former similar occasion. M. Doral is a young officer and nephew of General Cordera.

GREAT BRITAIN.

Kossuth's alleged participation in the collection of ammunition of war, is, next to the budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the main topic of newspaper discussion. The London Times does not admit that Kossuth is exonerated from a breach of faith with the Government that had given him shelter and safety in his extremity.

It denies that the house where the munitions were found was an ordinance and legal manufactory. "Thousands of rockets of war packed up in chests for transport," it says, "can hardly be a legitimate object of private commerce between man and man," while if they were about to be shipped to properly constituted and recognized States, it would have been easy for the maker or contractor to have satisfied Lord Palmerston on that point; but no such satisfaction had been given. Indeed such an order could scarcely have been given, been received and executed without information on the subject having been given to the Government for obvious reasons of convenience to the contractors; and it adds:

"We have asserted nothing of M. Kossuth which he has not repeatedly declared of himself. In this country and in the United States he made the strongest appeals to popular sympathy, and endeavored to raise money by public subscription for the avowed object of waging eternal war upon the 'perjured House of Austria.' We believe his friends have never alleged that the money thus collected was devoted by him to his personal use, but was to be employed by himself and his agents in the purchase and manufacture of arms. Contracts of this nature were understood to have been entered into by him in the United States, if not in this country, and in his last written addresses he has expressed his conviction that the time for action is near at hand.

"It will be for a jury to determine whether he has or has not been implicated in these proceedings, and whether the exertions he has endeavored to make are consistent with the laws of this country. If these rockets of war and other missiles have been collected by him for purposes hostile to the States of the Continent, he will have rendered himself liable to prosecution under the acts which prohibit hostile armaments against any foreign power. But the agents or the motives who or what they may, the law can tolerate no such thing as private war, and the persons most open to suspicion are those who have publicly announced their intention to wage it."

"It is evident, from what we have already said, that, in taking the vigorous measures to which we have already referred, the British Government has acted solely with a view to the safety of the metropolis, and the vindication of the law, and not upon the suggestion or demand of any foreign power. There seems to be a class of legislators in the House of Commons who imagine that any offence may be committed with impunity, provided it is only intended to shake the authority and destroy the troops of some Government abroad. Our Government is, in fact, called upon to do what the American Government was loudly condemned for not doing, when it permitted Lopez's expedition to sail against Cuba.

"There may be 'Fillibusters' in this country as well as in the United States, and it matters not a rush to us for what illicit purpose these thousands of war rockets were prepared. When a seizure of crowbars and picklocks are made, we do not inquire whose house was to be broken open; the mere possession of such articles is a crime. If Mr. Bright had as much regard for the real interests of peace as he seems to have for the cause of political incendiarism, he would not rise in the House of Commons to complain of the disclosure we have made, when that disclosure is supported by the most positive evidence—the corpus delicti itself. There are the rockets, the shells, and the gunpowder to an amount which would equip an army, and it will not be long before the world knows something more of their history."

A Letter of the 19th of April, says of the budget:

The budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was brought forward last evening, and has proved to be a highly comprehensive measure. It has been followed by a slight degree of flatness in the funds, because he chiefly deals with the surplus, by reducing commercial burdens, and there will, therefore, be no large amount applicable for investment; but the relief he proposes to the nation is very great, and such as cannot fail to have the effect of largely increasing the general prosperity.

These estimates for the present year show an expenditure of £55,005,900, and a revenue of £52,184,000; and the surplus under these circumstances would be only £807,000. But the Chancellor proposes to increase the produce of the income tax by applying it to incomes between £100 and £150 a year, (hitherto exempt) and by extending its operations to Ireland, while he will also obtain a large sum by making landed property liable to the legacy duties, and by an increase of the tax upon spirits. By these means the revenue will ultimately gain £3,139,000 per annum, and an immense reduction of the taxes which press upon trade can thus be achieved. The excise on soap (yielding £1,111,000) is totally abolished, the stamp duties are to be greatly reduced, the tax on advertisements is to be lowered from one shilling and six-pence to six-pence, the ten duties are to undergo a gradual reduction from their present rate of 2s. 2½d. per pound to 1s., and the imposts upon about two hundred and seventy other articles of food, which, although small in individual amount, interfere with the progress of commerce, and the general comforts of the people, are either to be removed or simplified. These reductions will ultimately reach a total of £4,104,000. At the same time provision is made for a gradual diminution of the income tax on its complete enquiry in 1860. On the whole, this scheme is regarded with great satisfaction, and although desperate attempts will probably be made to assail it, there seems to be no doubt about its success.

About two thousand persons met at a public meeting in the City Hall, Glasgow, on the 15th ult. to see Mrs. Stowe. The Rev. Dr. Wardlaw made a complimentary address, to which Prof. Stowe responded. The subject of both the address and response was, of course, slavery. The Rev. Dr. King, who recently visited this country, also participated in the speech-making. He spoke very complimentarily of the United States. The resolution to which he spoke had sound sense in it, in that it declared "that instead of the two countries wasting words in crimination and recrimination, it would be incomparably wiser and better for each to set itself in earnest to the rectification of its own wrongs, the cure of its own moral and physical maladies, and the removal of its own sources of danger." The resolution was "cordially agreed to," although the intermeddlers present thereby very emphatically condemned themselves.

Hackett and Noonan, convicted of the murder of Mr. O'Callighan Ryan, of Clonmel, Ireland, were executed in Waterford. It is stated that one of them made a confession of his guilt, alleging, as the cause of the crime, that he had held a farm of Mr. Ryan at £3 per acre, and that being unable to pay that rent, he offered £2 per acre, but was ejected, and the land given to another for what he had offered to pay.

NEGROES IN DELAWARE.—The convention for revising the constitution, at Dover, has passed the following section of the new constitution, by a vote of 19 yeas to 8 nays:

"No free negro or mulatto, not now an inhabitant of the State, or who shall leave the State with intent to change his residence, shall, after the adoption of this constitution, settle in this State, or come into and remain within the State more than ten days. All contracts made with any free negro or mulatto, coming into the State contrary to the provisions of this section, shall be void; and any person who shall employ such free negro or mulatto, or otherwise encourage him to remain in the State, shall be fined in a sum not less than twenty nor more than five hundred dollars."

The Hon. Mr. Bayard, in his speech supporting this amendment, stated that there are 18,000 free negroes in the State of Delaware, making about one-third of the whole population.

A Submarine Telegraph, from the port of Genoa across the Mediterranean, via the Islands of Corsica and Sardinia, will be speedily executed, and the British Government has just issued orders for a branch from Cape Bon, on the African coast, to Malta.

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE OFFICE,
Saturday Morning, May 14 1853.

We have still but little activity to report in the business at our market, except in the articles of Tobacco and Corn, both of which have been in good demand throughout the week. Flour has been in limited supply, and prices have been firm. Provisions are without much change, though Bacon Shoulders have generally sold at rather better prices, and Lard in kegs has been held for an advance. Pork continues dull. On Thursday morning we published the accounts of the Bremen steamer Hermann, embracing Liverpool dates to the 26th April, received from New York by telegraph. They reported the Liverpool Cotton market as quiet, with sales for the three days preceding the Hermann's departure of barely 10,000 bales, including 3000 for speculation and export together. Prices were stated to have been in favor of buyers, but without quotable change since the Asia left. The quotations were: Fair Orleans 6¼, Middling Orleans 5¾, Fair Uplands 6¼, and Middling Uplands 5⅝d ₱ lb. The Cambria's advices to the 30th April were received on Thursday, and published in the evening papers of that day. They represent an improved demand in the Cotton market at Liverpool, and state the sales of the entire week, ending April 29, at 42,000 bales, of which 3000 had been taken for speculation and 5000 for export. Prices, which had been heavy early in the week, appeared to be steadier in the latter part, a better feeling having prevailed, owing to a reduction of 63,000 bales in the stock, which, as found by actual count, amounted to 776,000 bales. The quotations were, however, without any change of moment, the only difference from those reported by the Hermann being for Fair Orleans, which the Cambria's dispatch states at 6¾d.

COTTON—We left the Cotton market, at the close of our last weekly review, with an inanimated appearance, prices having fallen off ⅛@¼c after the receipt of the Baltic's advices, and very few parties showing a disposition to operate at this reduction. There was rather more steadiness observable on Saturday, but still the inquiry was limited, and the sales reached barely 3000 bales. On Monday factors made further concessions on the middling and lower grades, but with the effect of bringing forward buyers for only about 3000 bales. The reduction was extended on Tuesday to the qualities above Middling, when purchasers were found for about 6500 bales. On Wednesday, however, the decline again fell off, and barely 3000 bales were sold at irregular prices, but without quotable change, and on Thursday 4000 bales changed hands at about the same rates, the accounts by the Hermann and the Cambria having produced no perceptible effect. Yesterday there was a better demand and the sales reached 7000 bales, making a total for the week of 26,500 bales. Prices were more regular, but without any quotable change.

The receipts of the week are 14,555 bales, against 22,250 bales for the corresponding period last year, and in the total receipts at this port the increase, compared with last year, is 258,902 bales.

The New Orleans Christian Advocate.

The following beautiful poem was a contribution of the late Willis Gaylord Clark, to one of the earlier numbers of the Knickerbocker. Happy are they who, not wanting in sensibility, can read it without emotions of inexpressible sadness. We learn from the New York Tribune that the sixth edition of the "Literary Remains" of its gifted author are about being published:

THE SONG OF MAY.

The Spring's sweet beds all around me are swelling—
There are songs in the stream, there is health in the gale;
A sense of delight in each bosom is dwelling,
As first the pure day beams o'er mountain and vale;
The desolate reign of Old Winter is broken—
The verdure is fresh upon every tree;
Of Nature's revival the charm, and a token
Of love, oh thou Spirit of Beauty! is thee.

The sun looketh forth from the halls of the morning,
And flushes the clouds that begirt his career;
He welcomes the gladness and glory returning
To rouse up the promise and hope of the year;
He dips with rich light all the balm-breathing flowers—
He mounts to the zenith, and laughs on the wave;
He wakes into music the green forest-bowers,
And gilds the gay plains which the broad rivers lave.

The young bird is out on his delicate pinion—
He timidly sails in the infinite sky;
A greeting to May, and her fairy dominion,
His pure on the west-wind's fragrant sigh;
Around, above, there are peace and pleasure—
The woodlands are singing—the heaven is bright;
The fields are unfolding their emerald treasure,
And man's genial spirit is soaring in light.

Alas, for my weary and care-haunted bosom!
The spells of the spring-time arouse it no more;
The song in the wild-wood—the sheen of the blossom—
The fresh-welling fountain—their magic is o'er!
When I list to the streams—when I look on the flowers,
They tell of the Past, with so mournful a tone,
That I call up the throngs of my long-vanished hours,
And sigh that their transports are over and gone.

From the wide-spreading earth—from the limitless heavens,
There have vanished an eloquent glory and gleam;
To my world's mind no more, in the influence given,
Which enkreath life with the hues of a dream;
The bland-purpled landscape its loveliness keepeth—
I deem that a light, as of old, gilds the wave;
But the eye of my spirit in heaviness sleepeth,
Or sees but my youth, and the visions it gave.

Yet it is not that age on my years hath descended—
'Tis not that its snow-wreaths encircle my brow;
But the newness and sweetness of Being are ended—
I feel not their love kindling witchery now!
The shadows of Death o'er my path have been weeping—
There are those who have lored me, debarred from the day;
The grass isn't so bright, where in peace they are sleeping,
And on wings of remembrance my soul is away.

It is that to the glow of this present existence—
It hears, from the Past, a funeral strain;
And it eagerly turns to the high-seeming distance,
Where those it has known of earth will be garner-ed again!
Where no milder is than soft damask-rose to the nightingale's heart,
Where Grief bears no longer the poisonous sting;
Where pitiless Death no dark sceptre can flourish,
Or stain with his blight the luxuriant strear.s.

It is thus that the hopes which to others are given,
Fall cold on my heart in this rich month of May;
I hear the sweet anthems that ring through the heaven;
I drink the bland airs that anliven the day;
And if gentle Nature, her festival keeping,
Delights not my bosom, ah! do not condemn,
O'er the lost and the lovely my spirit is weeping,
For my heart's fondest raptures are buried with them.

Correspondence of the New York Herald.

The Leading of the Authoress of Uncle Tom's Cabin in Liverpool.

LIVERPOOL, April 14, 1853.

The other Sabbath morning, while leaving my hotel, in Liverpool, I heard three distinct, extra, well-defined coups de canon, proceeding, I was informed by James, the waiter, from the guns of the steamship Canada. James added that Miss Harriet Beechum Sto' was expected on the steamer, and then there would be "a mush to do."

Leaving the hotel, I had time, while sauntering towards the docks, to observe the crowds of church-going citizens, and to listen to the hallowed tones of the church-going bell. Need it be said, to those who have heard Liverpool chimes, that this fintinnabulation carried me back in remembrance to the woods of Maine, made musical at eventide by the bells of home-going kine? So striking was the similitude of sounds that my feelings overpowered me. I drew forth my handkerchief and—blew my nose; it would have been unmanly to have wept.

On arriving at a floating platform called the landing stage, of which the Liverpuddlians are justly proud, I found myself in a crowd of six or seven hundred people, mostly, by their appearance, clerks in Cotton offices, and all gazing towards the river. The oyncsure of all eyes and eyeglasses was the Satellite river steamer, bringing the mails and Mrs. H. B. Stowe from the Canada. Suddenly the Satellite changed her course to another landing place; and then began a race of the crowd such as "our insane artist" might picture from the rear of the retreat of the ten thousand Greeks—

"coat tails and hair,
Streamed like twin meteors on the troubled air."

Eh bien! soon the Satellite makes fast to the stairs—every body stands on tiptoe—every body else's toes, and all necks are elongated to look over every body else's hat. Being, as you know, rather short and squobby, I was under the necessity of climbing up a passive individual in front to obtain a view of the ceremony. Then burst on my enraptured vision [see Petrarch] an apparition of the closely veiled bonnet of a lady's head, which we took to be Mrs. Stowe, buried among a pile of mail bags. Attending on the lady's bonnet was a gentleman of strikingly intellectual aspect, who was, of course, hneband of the lady in the bonnet, although the crowd insisted that he was Sam Slick, of Blnenosian celebrity, who was known to be Mrs. Stowe's fellow passenger. In course of time the balance of the lady and gentleman was extricated, and proceeded arm in arm along a lane obligingly opened by the people to a fly—Jacob's one horse, two wheeled, drab lining, copy of regulations inside, fare one chilling a mile from the stand, horse brown, and off leg with white stocking. We mention these particulars for the use of the future historien. Mrs. Stowe having been carefully put inside by the driver, the attention of the British public was next directed to her "plun.ler," which duly appeared in the shape of a trunk, with the inscription H. B. S. Thus assured that the "veiled ladye" was no other than the authoress of Uncle Tom and owner of the trunk, what a shont rent the air! It was a true John Bull "Illp, hip hnr!" with the "rah" cut off, being Sunday. Indeed, some warm-hearted individuals, forgetful of the sacred day, thurst their hands through the door and windows of the fly to give the illustrione strangers the grasp of hospitable welcome to that shore where no Uncle Tom can live, (a fact that); and had time permitted I have no doubt the more hospitable would have treated the Rev Beecher with beer. Bnt before any one had presence of mind to make the proposal, the jarvey hit the horse with the white stocking a lick on the side of the head, the animal kicked ont behind, and the Stowe family departed for the hospitable mansion of Mr. Crnpper. Another cheer split the Sabbath atmosphere, and the multitude dispersed to their devotions.

As it had been extensively announced in the papers that the illustrious autheress would be received, on landing, by the Earls of Shaftesbury and Carlisle, a bright look-ont was kept for those nobles. For myself, I saw no one at all answering their description, excepting a respectable colored man, black all over, except his eyes and gloves, which were yellow. I once had the honor of dining with one of the nobiemen in question, on a public occasion, at Stratford-upon-Avon, but was placed so far below the salt it was impossible to say whether his lordship were white or black.

Full of the pleasing reflections which Mrs. Stowe's warm welcome to the soil of England had inspired, I wended my steps homewards. On the way I found a genuine wooly-head, seated on the stoop of a "wipe-vault"—translated "beer kitchen"—smoking his pipe. "Sam," said I.

Remember, Mr. Editor, that on British ground no derogatory epithet must be used in addressing the colored subject, the equal of the white. "Sam-bo" is inadmissible, and the more degrading title of "Doctor" not to be thought of. "Sam," however, is a recognized initial and may be applied with importunity to the lower orders.

"Sam," said I, figuratively, "hang no more your banjo on the willows, nor weep to think of Old Virginney?"

Sam's eyes shone through the fog like two copies of the star Sirius. "W'at 'ave you to say, sir?" This colored Briton already omitted to haspirate his haitches.

"Samuel," repeated I, with solemnity, "is this a time to indulge in the vile weed of Kentuck, when the fair benefactress of your race is stepping on these shores? I mean, of course, Samuel, Mrs. Stowe."

"Missus a w'at?"

"Mrs. Stowe."

"Missy's too! Lor' gor'-amitey, what' he?"

I was humiliated, paralysed by this heredi-tary boondman—this ungrateful slave.

"Man and brother," said I, "your ignorance disgusts me"—so I left. Thine, HALEY.

A GEORGIA WEDDING.

The preacher was prevented from taking his part in the ceremony, and a newly created justice of the peace, who chanced to be present, was called upon to officiate in his place. The good man's knees began to tremble, for he had never tied the knot, and did nat know where to begin. He had no "Georgia Justice," or any other book from which to read the marriage service. The company was arranged in a semi-circle, each one bearing a tallow candle. He thought over every thing he had ever learned, even to—

"Thirty days hath September, April, June, and November,"

but all in vain; he could recollect nothing that suited the occasion. A snppressed titter all over the room admonished him that he must proceed with something, and in an agony of desperation he began—

"Know all men by these presents, that I"—here he paused, and looked up to the ceiling, while a voice in the corner of the room was heard to esy—

"He is drawing a deed for a trect of lend," and they all leughed.

"In the name of God, amen!" he began again, only to hear another voice in a loud whisper say—

"He is making his will; I thought he couldn't live long, he looks so powerfully bnd."

"Now I lay me down to sleep,
I pmy——"

was the next essey, when some erndite gentleman remnrked—

"He is not dead, but sleepoth."

"Oh yes! oh yes!" continued the Squire.

A voice replied: "Oh no! oh no! don't let's."

Some person out of doors sung out, "Coms into court!" and the laughter was general.

The hride was near fainting—the Squire was not far from it; but beleg an iedefatigable man, he began again—

"To all and singular, the ehor——"

"Let's run, he's going to levy on us," said twn or three nt once.

Here a gleam of light fleshed across the Squire's faes; he ordered the bride and groom to hold up their hands, end in a solsmn voice, said—

"You, and each of you, do solemnly swear in the presence of the present company, that you will perform towards each other, all, singuler, the functions of husband and wife, as the case may be, to the best of your knowledge and nbility, so help you God."

"Good as when!" exclaimed the father of the bride.

The Interests of Woman.

We make the following extract from a well written article, entitled as nbove, in ths Philadelphia Gazette, suggested by the employment of females in varlous eltuations vecated by men under the operation of the recent "strike" movement. Fortunately, we at the South have little experimental knowledge of the destitution and wretchedness to which women in Northern and Europesn cities are reduced, and we trust such many long continue to ho our happy condition! It is interesting to observe, however, thet public opinion at the North, where, like a sentimental school girl over a mawkish novel, people have wept so much over imaginary evils that they cannot see real suffering at their own doorways, has at last found a legitimete object upon which to vent its sympathies and for which to tax its powers of relisf. We copy from the Gazette:

One of the snbjects which have engeged the attention of the enlightened and practical philanthropists of the day, is the limited opportunity of the female population of every large city to earn an independent living. The herd condition to which they are reduced has been for a long time, and is yet, compelling thousands of them to toil with stinted rest and refreshment, at tasks which speedily wear out the health of the strongest end yield nothing in return but a bare subsistence. With tnlants thnt are capable of varione applioation in the useful arts, they are crowded out of employmente for which they are, in some instances, even better adepted than men, and obliged nlmost to starve on the poor wages of a few overstocked callings.

This le a grievous wrong, which is daily crushing hope out of the heerts of tha young women of the land, hurying faculties which might be converted, by cultivation and exercise, to the great benefit of the public, nnd causing an amonnt of physioal and moral suffering which, could it be computed, would amaze and sadden the community. There is a plain nnd easy remedy for this evil, and the obligation to correct it rests upon society. Wherever the labor of females can be substtnted for that of males, it should be invariably preferred; nnd we believe that, were the policy once pnt in praotice, nnd carried out to the farthest limits of which the capacity of the sex would admit, it would be the most benevolent, and, perhaps, important reform that it is possible to introdnce into the industrial economy of every civilized State.

We provide asylums for the deaf and dumb, for the lame and the blind—we erect schools of reform for the abandoned and deprnved—we cover the land with homes for paupors and vagrants, and boast perpetually of the vast sum of charitable effort we are making to ameliornte the lot of the wrotched and unfortunate of every class. But while self-complacent philanthropy is doing all this really valuable good, does it not nnthinkingly close upon the orphan girl and the helpless widow access to that happy and proud independence which willing hands and intelligent minds would win in many a sphere of industry which the prejudice of habit and the scruples of a false deliency exclude them? Whnt oomfort should we take to ourselves for placing a starving wretch in a poor house, or sending a broken-hearted sister to some senctuary from the sneere of the world, while we afford no enfficient opportunity of exertion for contented and honorable livelihood to hundreds of frail and friendless creatures, who grow blind, and sick, end famished, in dark and noisome cellars, sewing their fingers to the bone for ten and twenty cents a day?

There is a giant sin at our doore in this drendful shutting out of self-dependent women from the occupations for which they ere no less fit, if net better qualified, that their usurping and monepolizing brothers. Providence is not unmindful of the injnstice, and is already, by His indirect and slow, but eventnally effectual interposition, working bnt a reformation. Much auspicions progress in the change is even now evident among us. Women nre gradaally gaining admission into places of employment from which they had been rigorously kept out; and the better taste and skill, the superior steadiness and diligence they are bringing to tasks in which they have supplanted male labor, are fast opening to them other and higher departments of industry.

COMPULSORY EDUCATION.—In many of the European Stntes parents nre compelled to send their children to school. In Prussie absentees ara liable to full school fees, and a fine or a day's labor in compeesation. In Saxony nothing ie an excuse for absence from school but sickness, and attendence is compelled by fines and imprisonment. In Hanover the ecclesiasticel nutboritiesnro charged with the inspection of schools, where every child from the age of six ie required to nttend, unless sufficiently instructed elsewhere. In Bavarla no child is allowed to leave echool till it has arrlved nt the age of twelve years, and then not without an examinntion nnd a certificate, which is necessary to apprenticeship and marriage. In Austria all the children, from the ege of six years, must go to school till they nre twelve years of age. A commissioner from the French Government, who had been examining the school systeme of Germany, urged the necessity of compulsory instruction—of some system which shall compel the attendance upon instruction of some kind of all the children of the State. If it is wise in the State taking authority out of parental hands, it is in such a case as this. Education makes the citizen, and the evils of ignorance, or a misdirected education, do not fall simply upon individuals, but are entailed upon society.

ESCAPING THE COW-CATCHER.—As the express train was coming up on Friday, a woman was discovered on the bridge at Berlin. The alarm was given and the breaks put on, but the train was running at the speed of nearly a mile a minnte, and in an instant it passed the bridge. It was supposed that the woman was killed. But on stopping the train it was found that she had dropped through the timbers into the water, just before the engine reached her, and that she was scambling up the bank, a little wet and muddy only. [Hartford Times, May 2.

ONLY A CHILD.—"Who is to be buried here?" said I to the Sexton. "Only a child ma'am."

Only a child? Oh! had you ever been a mother—had you nightly pillowed that little golden head—had you slept the sweeter for that little velvet head upon your breast—had you waited for the first intelligent glance from those blue eyes—had you watched its slumbers, traoing the features of him who stole your girlish heart away—had you wept a widow's tears over its unconscious head—had your desolate, timid heart gained courage from that little piping voice to wrestle with the jostling crowd for daily bread—had its loving smiles and prnlling words been sweet recompense for such sad exposure—had the lonely future been brightened by the hope of that young arm to lean upon, that bright eye for your guiding star—had you never framed a plan or known a hope or fear, at which that child was not a part. If there was naught else on earth left for you to love—if disease came, and its eye grew dim; and food, and rest, and sleep, were forgotten in your anxious fears—if you pace the floor hour by hour, with that fragile burden, when your very touch seemed to give comfort and heeling to that little quivering frame—had the star of hope set at last—then, had you hung over its dying pillow, when the strong brenst you should have wept on was in the grave, where your child was hastening—had you caught alone its last faint cry for the "help" you could not give—had its last fluttering sigh breathed out on your breast—Oh! could you have said—"'Tis only a child?"

Are they! Suppose you and a certain pair of blue eyes, that you would give half your patrimony to win, were joint proprietors of that baby! I shouldn't dare to stnnd very near you and call it "a nuisauce." It's all very well for bachelors to turn up their single blessed noses at these little dimpled Cupids, but just wait till their time comes! See 'em, the minute their name is written "papa," pull up their dickies, and strut off down street, as if the Commonwealth owed them a pension! When they enter the office, see their old merried partner (to whom babies have long since ceased to be a novelty) laugh in his sleeves at the now-fledged dignity with which that baby's advent is announced! How perfectly astonished they feel that they should have been so infatuated as not to perceive that a man is a perfect cypher till he is at the head of a family! How frequently one may see them now, looking in at the shop windows, with interest, at little hats, coral beads and bells, and baby-jumpers. Now they love to come home to dinner, and press that little velvet cheek to their business faces! Was there ever any music half so sweet to their ear as its first lisped "papa?" Oh, how closely nnd imperceptibly, one by one, that little plant winds its tendrils round the parent stem! How anxiously they hang over its oradle when the cheek flushes and the lip is fever parched; and how wide and deep, nnd long a shadow in their happy home its little grave would cast!

My dear sir, depend upon it, one's own baby is never "a nuisance." Love heralds its birth!

FANNY FERN.

The following statement of the extraordinary degree of ignorance prevailing in England is made in Dicken's "Household Words." It might well challenge belief were it not founded on official and authentic sources:

"It has been calculated that there nre in England nnd Wales 6,000,000 persons who can neither read nor write—tint is to say, about one-third of the population, including, of course, infants; bnt of all the children between five and fourteen, more than one-half attend no plnce of public instruction. These statements—compiled by Mr. Kay from official and other authentic sources, for his work on the social condition of eduction of the poor in England and Europe—would be hard to believe, if we had not to encounter in our every-day life degrees of illiteracy which would be startling if we were not thoroughly used to it. Wherever we turn, ignorance, not always allied to poverty, stares us in the face. If we look in the Gazette at the list of partnerships dissolved, not a month passes but some unhappy man, rolling perhaps in wealth, but wallowing in ignorance, is put to the experimentum crucis of 'his mark.' The number of petty jurors—in rnral districts espolally—who cnn only sign with a cross is enormous. It is not unusual to see parish documents of great local importance defaced with the same humiliating symbol of persons whose office not only shows them to be 'men of mark,' but men of substance. We have printed already specimens of the partial ignornnce which passes nnder the pen of the postoffice authorities, and we may venture to assert that such specimens of panmanship and orthography are not to be matched in any other country in Europo. A housewife in humble life need only turn to the file of her husband's bille to discover hieroglyphics which render them so many arithmetical puzzics. Ie short, the practical evidences of the low ebb to which the plnicst rudiments of education in this country has fallen, are too common to bear repetition. We cannot pass through the streets, we cannot enter a place of public assembly, or romble in the fields, without the gloomy shadow of ignorance sweeping ever us. The rural population is indeed in a worse plight than the other classes."

A STOPPER FOR THE BOTTLE.—The Senate and General Assembly for the State of New Jorscy have just passed rather n stringent act, having for its object the deprivation of habitual drunkards of certain social and legal rights, and operating to the same extent as the act entitled "An act concerning idiots and lunatics." By this enactment it is permissible for the Court of Chancery, on receiving n representation from parties interested that a citizen is incapable of mansging his temporal effairs from habitual drunkenuess, to issue a writ similar in power and action to a writ "de lunatico inquirendo," appointing a commission for the purpose of ascertaining the truth of the allegation. If the commission decide on the inespacity and habitual drunkenness of the individual, he is immediately deprived of all power over his real and personal estate; guardians are appointed by law to manage his affairs; a will executed by him after or pending such decision of the committee, is of no effect. While every innkeeper, distiller or grocer who shall sell liquor to any individual under such restriction is liable to a fine of ten dollars each time the offence is committed. In short, the habitual drunkard in New Jersey henceforward may he treated as an innecile or lunatic on the strength of proper representntions. [N. Y. Times.

NEW YORK CRYSTAL PALACE.—The Crystal Palnce, New York, is deferred to the 1st of June, in consequence of delays attending upon a new undertaking, the difficultice of getting the required work performed in time at the ordinary machine shops, and the loss of time during the recent severe winter. The delay, however, will only serve to admit of less hurry and confusion when the opening occurs, and allow more time for the reception and disposal of valuable articles from abroad; so that the month's delay will prove in the end beuticinl. The President has partially promised to be present, to participate in the opening ceromonies. The building, we learn, is rapidly progressing, and will be, when completed, fully equal to the wishes nnd expectations of its friends. It is nearly all completed, except the dome, which is finished, and on the ground, ready for raising. A part of it is roofed in, and a portion of the floor laid. Of the glass work, the sashes are all fitted and ready to go in, and a large part of the glass set. It would seem that no reason can be entertained why the palnce may not open on the 1st of June. The management of the whole buciness is entrusted to very competent hands, whose names afford a guarantee for faithfulness of execution. The general superintendence is confided to Captain Dupont, U. S. N., of Delaware, assisted by Captain C. H. Davis, of Cambridge; the agricultural department is under the charge of Colonel B. P. Johnson, Secretary of the New York State Agricultural Society, and Commissioner for New York State at the London Exhibition; the machinery is entrusted to Mr. Joseph E. Holmes, of Hadley Falls, and the mineralogicel branch to Prof. B. Silliman, Jr., of New Haven.

NAVAL FORCES AVAILABLE FOR THE BOSPHORUS.—The London correspondent of the Intelligencer, under dote of March 31, gives the following list of the naval forces of the various powers, which could be concentrated in the Bosphorns, in a few days, viz: English, 5 shipe of the line, 5 frigates, 12 steamers; French, 8 ships of the line, 8 steamers; Turkish, 4 shipe of the line, 11 frigates, 6 steemere; Egyptian, 4 shipe of the line, 9 frigates, 3 steamere; Russian, 18 ships of the line, and 8 frigates.

A TEN THOUSAND DOLLAR PRIZE.

Among the items of news from California, is the announcement of the fact that Mr. Henry S. Fitch, of San Francisco, has offered a prize of ten thousand dollars for the best treatise on the Pacific and Atlantic Railway. As the matter is likely to excite some attention, we give Mr. Fitch's offer in full:

"The undersigned, being extremely desirous of lending his aid and assistance to extend and strengthen the influence and position of the federal Union, to increase her wealth, importance, and prosperity; to enlarge the sphere of her natural resources, and facilitate their development; to increase the aggregate amount of her internal trade and international commerce; to open up every available source of profit and wealth within her limits, and to increase her productiveness to the extremest extent; and being also anxious to promote and advance the interests of his adopted State and her people, to have her peculiar and unsurpassed advantages fully known, and her incalculable wealth appreciated and fully developed, and to bring her and the other integral portions of the Union, into the most fraternal and sympathetic relations; and being fully persuaded that a railway between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts would bring us nearer the practical realization of these results than any known method, offers the sum of $10,000, as a premium for the most comprehensive, thorough and convincing treatise upon this project, and collateral subjects. The work to be written in simple and lucid style, and to embrace the most thorough and exact treatment of the following topics:

1. The Great Atlantic and Pacific Railway, and its immediate and prospective benefits to the whole American Union, including impartial comparisons of the routes already proposed, the means and plans upon which they nre proposed to be constructed, together with an exact estimate of its probable cost, and a recommendation of the most feasible and easy way to ensure its completion within the shortest possible time; the exposition of its benefits to the Union, socially, politically, and financially, to be exhaustive of this part of the subject.

2. THE FUTURE TRADE OF THE PACIFIC AND EAST INDIES.—To set forth in a clear and concise form the natural resources of Russian America, Oregon, Lower Californin, New Mexico, and the whole coast southward to Cape Horn. Also, the various island groups between the parallel of 160 degrees of longitude and this coast, New Guina, Australia, Borneo, Sumatra, Malacca, Madagascar, and the east coast of Africa and Asia, with an estimate of the number of inhabitants of the same, so far as the state of these lands and these facts has any direct bearing upon the future trade of the United States—together with their importing and exporting commerce, including considerations of the extent of a market obtainable for the produce and manufactures of the American Union, the probable increased demand growing out of the establishment of direct and speedy intercourse with the same, including a reference to the importance of the whale fishery and seal trade, directly and intimately connected with the establishment of the great commercial depot at San Francisco, with the establishment of clipper, steam, hot air, or other more speedy mediums of communication with the points above named.

3. WEALTH OF CALIFORNIA.—To embrace as full and as reliable information concerning the natural resources of the State of Californin as it is possible to obtain, with candid and just allusions to its mineral, agriculturnl and commercial advantages, based upon statistical or other authentic information; the salubrity of its climate, and the immense benefit and importance to the whole Union, of developing and facilitating the acquisition of its wealth and varied advantages.

Maps and charts at the author's option. Manuscript of the work to be forwarded prior to November 1, 1853, to S. P. Andrews, New York city. Merits of the presented works and choice to be determined by a committee, who will meet at Washington on the 15th day of November next, to consist of the following persons: Two members of the press of this State; one delegate from the merchants of the State; one from the agricultural and mining districts; the Governor of California, or his deputy, or appointee; President of the Chamber of Commerce, New York; one delegate from the press of New York city, Boston, St. Louis, Baltimore and Philadelphia; Lieut. Maury, Washington; Secretary Henry, of Smithsonian Institute.

The whole premium to be awarded for a complete work on the three topics named, treated under distinct and separate heads. For the first alone $5000, for the second and third $2500 each. All communications relative to the subject, to be directed to R. K. Brown, editor San Francisco Evening Journal, in whose hands a bond for twice the amount of the premium has been placed. HENRY S. FITCH.

Railroad Route to the Pacific—Letter from Kit Carson.

We find in the St. Louis Intelligencer, of the 29th ult., the following communication from the well known mountain traveler, Kit Carson, in reference to the most practicnble route to the Pacific. Carson's opinions are, doubtless, worthy of consideration, yet it will be seen that he differs in many material points to others whose observations entitle their views to equal consideration:

SANTA FE, March 27, 1853.

SIR: I find the following sentence in a letter addressed by you to the Santa Fe Gazette:

"I see a writer in the New York Tribune, who professes to have visited Fort Laramie in 1849, and then and there saw Mr. Kit Carson, quotes that gentleman as in favor of the South Pass. I have ventured to doubt the statement that Mr. Carson prefers the route through Utah, and have claimed him as a friend to the New Mexican route. I wish he would write to me as soon as may be, and give me his opinion, with all the testimony which his valuable experience and sagacity on such subjects can supply."

You are perfectly right in claiming me as a friend to the route through New Mexico. I consider it as far, far preferable to the route through Utah Territory. I know but one route across the continent which can be traveled winter and summer, and over a remarkably level country, and that one must cross the Rio Grande del Norte within fifty or sixty miles of Santa Fe, and from thence as direct to the California Mountains as the nature of the country will allow. The pass known as "Walker's Pass" through the mountains is a good one and has no very abrupt ascents or descents. There is another pass higher up, which is nearly, if not quite, as good as "Walker's." That comes in somewhere about one of the "Four Creeks," and Dr. Nunglo, of Santa Fe, has mentioned to me the fact that a roliable and intelligent man, an old mountaineer, and whose statements I know are to be depended upon, having passed from the Vegas of Santa Clara and after making his course due west, reached the Tulare Valley, passing over country which, to use his own words, you could drive a ten mule team through anywhere.

There is no manner of doubt that the trail from Albuquerque by Zuni, along the head waters of the streams that run into the Gila, and then crossing the big river about the "Molave," and so on, is the easiest road that can be found. The only objection that I know of, is, that a great part of the country along there is very barren, in fact, so bad that the wolves can't make a living; and then it comes into the Tulare Valley at its very southern extremity, and you have to run up three or four hundred miles to strike the Bay of San Francisco—so that, if you could make a little more northing it would be better. Mr. Fremont had always expressed a wish to me to examine the country along the Southern limit of the basin, and if his explorations had not been stopped, that would have been his next onterprise.

On the other hand, I consider the road by the South Pass as almost impracticable. I have no faith in it. The snows lie early and late in both the "Rocky" and "Snowy" mountain countries. It is easy enough the ascent of the Snowy mountains going up from the eastern side, but on the west it falls right off, and its like going up a ladder to get out of the California valley to the top of the mountains any where that I know of so far north. As to the snows, you folks that live in the States know nothing about them. Why, sir, it snows harder and longer, and faster and more of it, in the Californie mountains than perhaps any other place in God's world. I am not alone in my opinions upon the subject about which you have written to me. Any old mountaineer that knows any thing about it, will say that the Southern route through New Mexico is the best.

I am, sir, yours very truly, C. CARSON.

THE LAST GOOD NIGHT.

Close her eye-lids—press them gently
O'er the dim and leaden eyes,
For the soul that made the lovely
Hath returned unto the skies;
Wipe the death-drops from her forehead.
Sever one dear golden tress,
Fold her icy hands all meekly,
Smooth the little snowy dress;
Scatter flowers o'er her pillow—
Gentle flowers, so pure and white—
Lay this bud upon her bosom;
There—now softly say, Good night!

Though our tears flow fast and faster,
Yet we would not call her back,
We are glad her feet no longer
Tread life's rough and stormy track;
We are glad our Heavenly Father
Took her while her heart was pure,
We are glad he did not leave her
All life's trials to endure;
We are glad—and yet the tear-drop
Falleth; for, alas! we know
That our fireside will be lonely,
We shall miss our darling so.

While the twilight shadows gather,
We shall wait in vain to feel
Little arms, all white and dimpled,
Round our necks so softly steal;
Our wet cheeks will miss the pressure
Of sweet lips so warm and red,
And our bosoms sadly, sadly
Miss that darling little head,
Which was wont to rest there sweetly;
And those gentle eyes, so bright,
We shall miss their loving glances,
We shall miss their soft Good night.

When the morrow's sun is shining,
They will take this cherished form,
They will bear it to the church-yard,
And consign it to the worm;
Well—what matter? It is only
The clay dress our darling wore;
God hath robed her as an angel,
She hath need of this no more;
Fold her hands, and o'er her pillow
Scatter flowers, all pure and white,
Kiss that marble brow, and whisper,
Once again, a last Good night.

SPLENDID PREACHERS.

The very name of a splendid preacher in a community often excites great attention, and calls forth to the field of his labor a large assembly. Now, we are not generally an admirer of splendid preachers, for we have so often observed that they manage to obtain more glory for themselves than God. They make the pulpit a theatre for displaying their powers of oratory. Here they manufacture the most gorgeous figures, interspersed with every thing beautiful from the vast field of literature. This would be certainly unobjectionable on occasions of a literary character; but for the pulpit it is not only inappropriate, but sinful. Does God call men into the ministry to teach rhetoric and elocution or to entertain people with fine specimens of style and composition? The commission is to "preach the gospel," and a man is at liberty to preach anything else, otherwise he is transcending his commission, and proves recreant to duty. Such an one attempts to make up his sermons so as to have as little of the Bible in them as possible, and as much of learning, and poetry, and self, as he can stuff in them, may perhaps succeed in captivating many of those who listen to him, but if any are converted it will be a miracle. It would be a new thing under the sun. The instrument, himself, would be astonished at such a result, for he never anticipated it. He never prayed for it, nor preached for it. Well, can such a ministry, by which nobody is saved from sin, be acceptable to God, or be tolerated by the Church? That the world should approve of it is not surprising. Sinners wish to be dealt as gently with as possible. They would have smooth things prophesied unto them. Ahab could not endure the prophet Micaiah; said he, "I hate him for he doth not prophesy good concerning me, but evil." This spirit of hatred to the truth is still in the world.

"Men love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil." But in the splendid sermons which we sometimes hear, there is so little of celestial light, so little of Bible truth, that there is no disquieting of guilty conscience. Sin holds up its head and maintains its placidity of countenance, because it feels that no attack is made upon it. It is permitted to work on unmolested. That preaching which fails to make the devil mad, or which keeps his servants good humored, deserves to be suspected as spurious and unscriptural.

The great object of the minister should be not to make the people admire him, but to make them hate sin and fly to Christ. He should carry with him into his labors a soul full of the Holy Ghost, and then people will be moved upon, and be made to bow before the majesty of truth. Let Christ be present to direct the casting of the Gospel net, and multitudes of souls shall be entangled and brought to the shore of salvation. Where Christ is absent it is all toil and no success. It is a much greater recommendation to a minister to say of him that he is a useful preacher than to say he is a splendid one. The first conveys to the mind the impression that such a man is self-forgetful and God-honoring. That he believes the Bible, and that he is earnest about prevailing on others to believe it. The second conveys a contrary impression. We have no objection to a minister bringing into requisition learning and other accomplishments, if he will but have them baptized with the Holy Spirit, and make them serve a subordinate part in setting forth the Gospel Gifts as well as graces are valuable, but the former without the latter is like painted fire, with neither warmth nor power.

Isaac Taylor believes that a more scriptural style of preaching is called for. That religion cannot revive and flourish without it. In this sentiment all sensible Christians must agree. Young men in entering upon the work of the ministry should seek their models of preaching from the New Testament. Learn of Christ and His Apostles. Let them do this and they, as well as those whom they serve, will have a deeper and a sounder piety. He who wishes to bring many souls into the fold of Christ must study to be useful rather than splendid.

ANXIOUS INQUIRER DIRECTED.

How shall I come to God, for I am a sinful creature?

"Jesus said, I am the way; no man cometh unto the Father but by me." John 14: 6.

But how can I feel sure that Jesus will receive me?

"He that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." John 6: 37.

I have nothing that I can bring to him.

"I will give unto him that is athirst of the fountain of the water of life freely." Revelations 21: 6.

But should I not first endeavor to purify my soul from sin?

"Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? Not one." Job 15: 5.

How, then, shall I come?

"By a new and living way, which he hath consecrated for us through the veil, that is to say his flesh." Heb. 10: 20.

Is God sure to receive me? can He love me?

"I will receive you, and will be a Father unto you; and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty." 2 Cor. 6: 18.

What should be the object of my life?

"Ye are bought with a price; therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's." 1 Cor. 6: 20.

Can my unimportant actions in any way glorify the everlasting God?

"Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit." John 15: 8.

What do you mean by fruit?

"The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance." Gal. 5: 22, 23.

Does God, then, take notice of my daily conduct?

"I know the things that come into your mind, every one of them." Ezek. 11: 5.

"He that planted the ear, shall he not hear? He that formed the eye, shall he not see? He that teacheth man knowledge, shall he not know?" Psa. 94: 9, 10.

I am very ignorant, who shall instruct me?

"Search the Scriptures." John 4: 39. "The Holy Scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation through faith, which is in Christ Jesus." 2 Tim. 3: 15.

But I have so many evil habits to combat; what shall I do?

"Gird up the loins of your mind." 1 Pet. 1: 13. "Fight the good fight of faith," 1 Tim. 6; 12. "For he hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee." Heb. 13: 5.

But there are trials and temptations in my way which others have not.

"There hath no temptation taken you, but God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will, with the temptation, also make a way to escape that ye may be able to bear it." 1 Cor. 10: 13.

I wish I had some friend who could understand all the trials of my spirit.

"We have not an High Priest which cannot be touched with a feeling of our infirmities, but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin." Heb. 4: 15.

It is my desire to walk uprightly, but I feel I have no strength.

"He giveth power to the faint; and to them that have no might he increaseth strength." Isa. 40; 29th.

May I go and ask him, then?

"If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him." James 1: 5.

How will God give me wisdom?

"I will put my Spirit within you, and cause you to walk in my statutes, and ye shall keep my judgments and do them." Ezek. 36: 27.

When trouble comes, what shall I do?

"Call upon me in the day of trouble, I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me." Psa. 1: 15.

In the hour of death!

"When thou passeth through the waters, I will be with thee." Isa. 43: 2.

And in the day of judgment?

"Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect! It is God that justifieth. Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died," Rom. 8: 33, 34.

I will cast in my lot with God's people, for they only are happy.

"We are journeying unto the place of which the Lord said, I will give it you; come thou with us, and we will do thee good." Numb. 10: 29.

"The Lord bless thee and keep thee; the Lord make his face shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee; the Lord lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace." Numb. 5: 24, 26. [Quiet Thoughts for Quiet Hours.

"Father is coming!" and little round faces grow long, and merry voices are hushed, and toys are hustled into the closet, and mmmm glances nervously at the door, and baby is bribed with a lump of sugar to keep the a muscle; and the little group huddle like timid sheep in a corner, and tea is dispatched as silently as if speaking were prohibited by the statute-book, and the children creep like onlprits to bed marveling that baby dare crow so loud, now that "Father has come!"

"Father is coming!" and bright eyes sparkle for joy, and tiny feet dance with glee, and eager faces press against the window-

the door, and picture-books lie unrebuked on the table, and tops, and balls, and dolls, and kites, are discussed, and little Susy lays her jubilee has arrived, and "Father has come!"

COMING DOOM OF POPERY.

The Endingburgh Witness speaks thus forcibly of the influence of the revolutionary spirit in Europe, on the coming doom of Popery:

"When the outbreak of 1848 took place, we intimated very plainly what we believed to be the character of these events. They formed, we said, the beginning of the end, as regarded a power which had dominated in Europe for twelve centuries. They were the knell of doom to the Papacy, though that doom might be a few years in being consummated. In that opinion we abide unchangeably. Nothing has occurred since that day to give real strength to Rome, though fictitious support she has received. The great military empires of France and Austria have united to set her up again, and are doing their best to keep her going.

But has she by a single act striven to conciliate the people, or to bring back the Continental Nations, which the events of 1848 discovered to be in a state of mental revolt, to allegiance to her spiritual sway? On the contrary, presuming on the support of her armed neighbors, has she not set the people at defiance! Has she not betrayed them—oppressed them—sent them by thousands to the galleys and to death? And now her condition is more desperate, her catastrophe more inevitable and irremediable, than when Mazzini issued his decrees from the capitol, and the Pope wrote lachrymose epistles from Gaeta. Her existence hangs by a single thread—the continuance of a good understanding among the Continental Powers. Any day or any hour may bring that good understanding to an end; and when that ends Rome must bid farewell, an eternal farewell to her ghostly dominion!

And Rome comprehends her position. She sees the battle closing in all around her. In the past century she could regard with a benignant eye, and speak a with a lamb-like voice, to the Protestant world, because Protestantism lay locked in sleep: but now every where spiritual agencies are starting up. Neology is dying in Germany; Socinianism is giving way in Geneva; the Protestantism of Britain has once more become a living power, and is scattering Bibles in millions over the earth. Beneath the feet of Rome a raging fire has burnt the ground to a crust; and in front, and on all sides, Protestantism confronts her with an open Bible.

Rome cannot stand where is. She must advance, and she does advance, supported by the Jesuit on one side, and the gendarme on the other. And, even at this hour, when perdition is written on her forehead, it is no puny antagonist that bestrides the path of an advancing Protestantism and liberty! Let Britain beware of the desperation of such a foe! Let her be doubly armed—armed against the wiles of the Jesuit, and the violence of the gendarme! The one is already amongst us plying his arts with an assiduity we would do well to imitate; the other may yet visit us. It will not be the fault of Rome, if those vast armaments with which the Continent is now burdened be not directed against our shores. They are at present wielded by Jesuitism; and the almost avowed object of Jesuitism is to employ them for the extirpation of British Protestantism, now the only barrier in its way to the spiritual dominion of the world. If ever there was a conflict fitted to rouse all the energies of nation, it is this. We fight for our national independence and our religious liberties; we fight for the present and for the future: we fight not for ourselves only, but for all the nations of the earth; the battle is with the arch-enemy of the human race; and let that man who would turn his back to the foe go down to posterity as the betrayer of the world's liberties."

An Army of Prisoners.—The Edinburgh Witness, in speaking of the insults and causes for war which Austria has been giving to Sardinia and Switzerland, says:

"But the most serious aspect of the affair to Austria is the fact that the first blow struck in this quarrel would be felt from the Alps to the Sicilian Sea as a call to arms. Why, a mighty army might be furnished from even the prisons of Italy. In Naples there are not fewer than thirty thousand prisoners; in the Pontifical States there are as many; and if we assign the same number for the Lombardo-Venetian States, we have at once an army of ninety thousand men, simply by opening the prison doors. All these men have fathers, or brothers, or sons, which would augment indefinitely the avenging host. It assuredly requires little sagacity to foresee, but a vast deal of courage to contemplate the future of Italy; and though the present matter will probably blow over, that future will one day come upon Italy sudden as the thunder-storm upon its Appennines, terrible as the tempest upon its seas."

The Sandwich Islands.—A recent census of the Sandwich Islands exhibits some facts of startling interest, and which illustrate in the most unmistakable manner the vital law that the inferior race must give way to the stronger. The present population of the seven islands forming the group is 80,641. The deaths during the last year were 7,043, while the births were only 1,478—an average of six deaths to one birth. The foreigners number only 1,787. This is an extraordinary state of things, and we doubt whether its parallel can be found in the history of the world. In the time of Cook, the people numbered 400,000; thus, in seventy years, they have decreased 320,000. In 1830 they numbered 108,579—decrease in seventeen years nearly 28,000. Such a rapid decrease of native population is a deeply melancholy spectacle. At the present rate of decrease, another generation will hardly have passed away ere this people will be blotted from the face of the earth. [Boston Journal.

TRUE SELF-DENIAL.

The journey of life has been often compared to the passage of a caravan over the desert: and a Persian poet complained that there was no time for repose and enjoyment, since the bell was continually summoning the travelers to bind on their burdens. The image is beautiful and appropriate. But although there is no leisure for idle mirth and festivity, abundant seasons of rest and refreshment are afforded to every pilgrim. We may soothe our fatigue with music and fancy; we may sleep after the heat of the day, so that a watch be kept about our camp. The Eastern warrior fixes his spear at the door of his tent; and the Christian soldier will never be unmindful of his spiritual weapons of protection and defence. His shield and sword are always by his side. It is this wakefulness of heart which distinguishes the disciple of Christ; he is always waiting for his coming, and ready to follow him wheresoever he leads; hence, he denies himself with alacrity, and regards the riches and honors of the world only as incumbrances upon the journey—burdens upon the neck of virtue.

It was a bold, but a wise saying of Augustine, that we should not transfer into our own practice every habit we may find recommended in the history of good men. There is no chapter in the volume of Christian life which requires to be studied with a more cautious, or a more prayerful disposition, than the pages of self-denial; a word which comprises within itself much that is essential to the Christian profession; and which requires, at the same time, so to be expanded as not to reject any active duty; and so to be contracted as not to permit the entrance of any disguised passion; a word which, if interpreted by the teaching of the Gospel, means happiness and peace; which, if paraphrased by bigotry, means austerity and pride. It was remarked by Fuller, with equal felicity and truth, that if the moral frame be too much tightened and pressed upon one side, it will grow out on the other. The mind is often deformed by the anxiety to shape it.

Fasting and mortification, for their own sake, are only false "indulgences," purchased by self-love; piety with a sad countenance is not the piety of the Gospel. Daniel refused to partake of the costly wine and food of Babylon, because he would not defile himself with the luxuries of Nebuchadnezzar—eating only pulse, and drinking only water, he increased every day in beauty and vigor. It is our duty, like him, to abstain from the table of sin; but even our abstinence may become a snare to our feet. To please ourselves is often a very dangerous performance. To shine before men is the glory and privilege of the Christian, but He who placed the lamp upon its stand, and gave it light, is to be glorified. "The sanctifying spirit," says Hammond, "that beautifies the soul, is an humbling spirit also, to make it unbeauteous in its own eyes." Self-denial sometimes throws an illumination upon the countenance, which the inward eye takes a perilous pleasure in beholding.

True self-denial—that self-denial which can alone be pleasing in the sight of God—must be born out of a hearty and complete surrender of all our desires and all our appetites to the Divine will. It is not a restraint from this or that pleasure—not a mortification by this or that penance; it does not consist in fasting to-day, or in abstaining from any innocent occupation to-morrow; but in the uniform and constant tendency of our hopes and feelings—in our thoughts when we wake in the morning, and when we close our eyes in the gloom of night.

That self-denial—it cannot be repeated too often—alone deserves the name which acts in every desire of our minds, which closes the eager eye, and opens the grasping hand, and quickens the lingering footstep. The self-denial of the nominal Christian is ineffectual, because it is incomplete. Christian self-denial is always cheerful.

When Pleasure, or Ambition, or Fame, come to tempt as with their beautiful prospects, let us answer them in the spirit, if not in the words, of an eloquent and good man:* "We of this academy, let us say, are not at leisure to mind such mean things as you propose; we have something else to employ our time, than to talk with you. We have the image before our eyes of this passing and vanishing world, and of the other, with the everlasting affairs of it, even now advancing to fill up all the stage of this darkening theatre: we can represent to ourselves—not with melancholy madness, but by the beams of gospel day—the vision of the universe dissolving, kingdoms breaking up, sceptres lying broken. We have a telescope through which we can behold the glorious appearance of the descending Judge, the solemn state of his majestic person, the splendid pomp of his magnificent retinue; the face of Heaven darkened by the shadows of rushing wings; the dead rising; the books opened; the heavens rolled up, and nature expiring, in her last agony, upon the funeral pile of a flaming universe. We read the duty of self-denial by that blaze; we hear the voice of warning in that overthrow of a world." [R. A. Willmott.

A Little Church in the House.—I wish that there may be a church in my house, and all the persons in it, both morning and evening, at least, employed in those holy performances which my God requireth. My house should be a resemblance of heaven above. In His greatest and most glorious house, my God is served without ceasing, and without sinning. O that in His lower and lesser house He might be worshipped both constantly and perfectly, in a Gospel and Evangelical sense! I have read that among the worst of Turks it is a just exception against any witness by their law, that he hath not prayed four times in every natural day. I wish that none in my family may be worse than Turks. Daniel would pray three times a day, though he were cast to the lions for it; and shall my family neglect prayer, when the omission of it will make a prey to roaring lions? It is the honor and happiness of my house to exalt the worship of my God in it: His service is the greatest freedom; His work is a reward to itself. Why should we be our own enemies, in banishing our best friends out of our family? The mercies of my God are renewed upon me and mine every morning. His care and love are continued to us all the day long. The dews and showers of compassion fall down upon us every evening. Shall we be forgetful of Him who is every moment so mindful of us? [George Swinnock, M. A., 1662.

THE TRUE ANTIQUITY.

Ours, my dear friends, (says Sir George Sinclair, with whom all evangelical Protestants, in the main, agree,) is the most ancient and most apostolic of communions; our doctrines and practices are all derived from the fountain-head of Scripture. The first century comprises all the authorities on which we rely; so that, at all events, in point of antiquity, we may be said to carry everything before us. We are too tenacious of the good old paths to go one step beyond the precincts of revelation in regard either to doctrine or practice. We think no more, nay, we think much less, of Jerome or of Justin, than of Matthew Henry, or of Thomas Boston; the memorials of the former are locked up in a dead language, accessible to few, and by many of these few seldom read, and little valued: the evangelical writings of the latter not only enlightened their contemporary generation, but are found throughout Scotland, not only in many a manse, but in many a cottage.

In truth, the writings of authors so little known to the general reader as Gregory of Nyssa, Basil of Cæsarea, or Ephrem the Syrian, may be compared to the coins of Ptolemy Philadelphus, Louis the Stammerer, or Edward the Confessor, which are much more curious than useful, and are only met with in the cabinets of a few numismatic virtuosi, who are fond of hoarding up treasures which none of their neighbors either covet or possess, and which they themselves hardly look upon half-a-dozen times in the year. But our own Catechisms and other standards, (which I believe contain more sound and Scriptural divinity, unalloyed by dreamy subtleties, and unencumbered by fantastic speculations, than all the Greek and Latin Fathers put together,) or the plain and practical writings of Boston, Ralph Erskine, Henry, Flavel, Baxter, Scott, and John Newton, (however little prized by learned critics of the High-Church school,) are like the current coins which are constantly passing from hand to hand, influencing all the daily transactions of life, and familiarly known amongst the humbler classes throughout the length and breadth of the land.

I remember, about fifteen years ago, reading through the scanty remains of the "Apostolic Fathers" of the first century; and I must admit that the most important lesson which I derived from the perusal, was to prize more highly the canonical Scriptures, and become, if possible, more convinced than ever (from the immense disparity discernible between the epistles of Paul and John, and those of Barnabas and Ignatius,) that the Apostles wrote under the dictation of the Holy Spirit. I found nothing in the incubrations of their successors which might not have emanated from authors of very ordinary abilities or superficial acquirements. But no one, I think, can attentively ponder the Gospel of the beloved Disciple without arriving at the conclusion, that the composition of so sublime a work by an "unlearned and ignorant" fisherman, involves at least as great a miracle as the alternative, that he was guided and influenced by "the interpreter among a thousand." Believers might be pardoned for saying,

"What is Chrysostom to us, or we to Chrysostom?"

but the more frequently they feed upon the wholesome words of the inspired penman, the more intense will be the gratitude and earnestness with which they will exclaim, "Lord, evermore give us of this bread!"

QUARRELS.

One of the most easy, and most common, most perfectly foolish things in the world, is to quarrel, no matter with whom—man, woman, or child, or upon what pretence, provocation, or occasion whatsoever. There is no kind of necessity in it, and no species or degree of benefit to be gained by it, and yet, strange as the fact may be, theologians quarrel, politicians, lawyers, doctors and princes quarrel; the Church quarrels, and the State quarrels, nations and tribes and corporations, men, women and children, dogs and cats, birds and beasts quarrel about all manner of things, and on all manner of occasions. If there is any thing in the world that will make a man feel bad, except pinching his finger in the crack of a door, it is unquestionably a quarrel. No man ever fails to think less of himself after than he did before one; it degrades him in his own eye, and in the eyes of all others; and what is worse, blunts his sensibility to disgrace on one hand, and increases the power of passionate irritability on the other. The truth is the more quietly and peaceably we all get on, the better for our neighbors. In nine cases out of ten, the wisest course; if a man cheats you, quit dealing with him; if he is abusive, quit his company; if he slanders you, take care to live so that no man will believe him. No matter who he is, or how he misuses you, the wisest way is just to let him alone; for there is nothing better than this cool, calm quiet way of doing with the wrongs we meet with.

PEACE.

"Great peace have they that love Thy law, and nothing shall offend them."

What, not the shaft of slander, pointed with unerring aim? Not the mockery of the fiend who has turned joy into gall and bitterness? Not that black ingratitude that has changed life's Eden to a howling wilderness? Not the hot breath of hate that has dried up the one only spring of the desert? Not the malice that would strike you, through the beloved of your soul?

No, no; not all these, for great peace have they that love Thy law, and nothing shall offend them."

But is that possible? When the strong arm that was held forth as we fondly hoped to guide our boat into the calm waters, pushes it over the roaring rapids, where singly we must fight with death, shall that not offend? You father bowed with grief has but now closed the eyes of his only son. How many fond hopes he lavished on that boy. He has poured out his gold like water, sparing in nothing that he might be made strong for the life-battle. And now death has hushed his eloquent voice, chained the quick pulses of his heart in fetters of ice—frozen the warm smile, struck the harp from the daughters of music, folded the hands forever, and given unto corruption the keeping of that fair body.

And how does the Christian? Is he offended because the Giver hath taken away the gift? Does he rebel, feeling that all his toils and struggles, the prize just won is rudely torn from his grasp!

Never! "Great peace have they who love the law of God, and nothing shall offend them." Strip them of home and friends—of every pleasure under the sun; cover their reputation with plague spots—set them away in dark corners of the earth—fill their lips with bitterness; heap misfortune upon misfortune—still nothing shall offend them—secure in the belief that they are God's little ones, whose every hair is numbered, every tear remembered—every sigh registered, and that they, like the blood of Abel, will cry unto Him for vengeance.

Who would not love His law if thus it may enable us to smile while earthly hopes fade and die? Who would not cherish the peace of heaven that never falleth? [Olive Branch.

A Young Lady's Reason for Not Dancing.

First, Dancing would lead me into crowded rooms and late hours, which are injurious to health and usefulness.

Second, Dancing would lead me into very close contact with very promiscuous company, and evil communications corrupt good manners.

Third, Dancing would require me to use and permit freedoms with the other sex, of which I should be heartily ashamed, and which I believe to be wrong.

Fourth, My parents and friends would be anxious about me if I were out late, keeping company with they know not whom.

Fifth, Ministers and good people in general disapprove of dancing, and I think it is not safe to set myself against them. If a thing be even doubtful, I wish to be on the safe side.

Sixth, Dancing has a bad name, and I mean to study things that are pure and lovely and of good report.

Seventh, Dancing is generally accompanied with drinking, and I see drinking produces a great deal of evil.

Eighth, I am told dancing is a great temptation and snare to young men, and I do not wish to have anything to do with leading them astray.

Ninth, Dancing unfits the mind for serious reflection and prayer, and I mean to do nothing that will estrange me from my God and Savior.

Tenth, There are plenty of graceful exercises and cheerful amusements, which have none of the objections connected with them that lie against dancing.

Trifling with a Conviction of Sin.

"Mrs. A., when a young lady, received the addresses of a gentleman who was intelligent, moral, and friendly to religion, but she was then light, worldly, and even hostile to the subject. At a time when many were inquiring what they must do to be saved, her suitor became interested. His distress of mind was great, so that he was forced to divulge his feelings to his friends, and attend the meeting for religious inquiry. When his betrothed became acquainted with the fact, she determined to banish his serious impressions. She deliberately set herself to scoff, ridicule, and shame him back to the world, and she finally succeeded. His convictions left him, and he became more worldly than ever.

They were united in marriage and lived happily together. Years rolled by, and at length Mrs. A. herself became deeply anxious for her soul, and she found no peace until she embraced Christ. Her husband looked on in silence. He remembered the ridicule that banished his own convictions, and he uttered none in return. But she was intensely concerned for him, and for a long time dared not unbosom her feelings. By and by, however, a sense of duty led her to make a personal appeal, but she was sharply repulsed with the answer, "I was once serious, but I grieved the Spirit for ever for you."

He yet lives with no regard to religious ordinances, never visiting the house of God, never participating in any enterprise that savors of the moral or religious. And she lives, dejected and melancholy, charging herself with the destruction of his soul, repulsed whenever she dares approach him with religious appeal, by the words, "I was once serious, but I grieved the Spirit for ever for you." A SABBATH DAY'S JOURNEY.

We sometimes hear people speak of "a Sabbath day's journey towards heaven." But those who repeat that often repeated sentence have not been reminded that if it is employed figuratively at all it should be to express the very opposite of considerable progress. The Sabbath day was not a day for traveling. The Sabbath day's journey, of which St. Luke speaks (Acts 1, 12) was no more than two thousand paces, or the greater mile, also called "the bond of the Sabbath," the utmost distance lawful for a journey on that day. This limitation was not imposed by God, on the institution of the Sabbath, nor when the law was confirmed at the giving of the Decalogue, but was afterward admitted by the Jews on a decision of their Rabbies. In the time of our Lord's incarnation, then, "Sabbath day's journey" was the measure of two English miles; and so it occurs once in the inspired volume. If, therefore, any mystical signification belongs to the phrase, it must be altogether different from the meaning and wishes of those who use it. And be it remembered that the inaccuracy of conception as to spiritual truths, and as a prolific source of error, cannot be too carefully avoided. [London Christian Miscellany.

UNTHANKFULNESS IN AFFLICTION.

We should have blessed God for his rod, as well as for his staff, for both are mercies; but how unthankful are we even for sufferings for righteousness sake? God expects that "in everything we give thanks." How little have we imitated the ancient Christians, whose mouths were always full of "Thanks be unto God!" They saluted one another with Deo gratias, and when they heard tidings of persecution or protection, of crosses and comforts, still they cried out, "God be thanked." How unlike are we to the famous Bradford? "If, (said he,) the queen will release me, I will thank her; if she will keep me in prison, I will thank her; if she will burn me, I will thank her." Thou shouldst say from thy very heart, "though sick, though scorned, though threatened, though 'all the day long counted as sheep for the slaughter,' yet blessed be God that I am 'counted worthy' to suffer for his name: blessed be God that he 'counts me for a son,' and 'chasteneth me for my profit that I may be made partaker of his holiness.' Blessed be God that I am chastened, that I may not be condemned." But how few "give thanks always, in all things, unto God?" But God knows how far from praises we have been when the storms have been high, and threatened our tabernacles. [Stuckley.

Long Sermons.—A few years since, at the convocation of the General Assembly of the Kirk of Scotland, commissioners were appointed by William IV, as usual, to open it. The Earl of Airly, one of these, having made the acquaintance of the clergyman appointed to preach the opening sermon, thought it would be a capital joke to make him so drunk as to incapacitate him for that employment. Accordingly, on the next day before the sermon was to be preached, his lordship invited the divine to dinner and plied the bottle freely. Notwithstanding the entreaties of the preacher, he could not get away till long past midnight. When he reminded the Earl that he was to preach next day, and had not composed one word of his sermon, the answer constantly was, "Well, another glass and then." Being, however, such a divine as the one described by Thompson, he at length laid the noble lord under the table, and walked off. The next day he appeared in his church. Lord Airly was there. The text was, "The wicked shall be punished, and that right early." The clergyman had a slight defect in his palatial organs, and purposely or involuntarily pronounced the last clause "and that wight airly." It was then, as it still is in the Scotch churches, a custom for the clerk or precentor, as he is there called, to set up a half hour sand-glass, to warn the preacher when it was time to give over. Our doctor was no more sparing of his eratory than Lord Airly had, on the previous evening, been of his wine. Whenever the precentor looked up to admonish him that the glass was near out, the clergyman coolly told him, loud enough for Lord Airly to hear—"Another glass, and then."

Rest of the Soul.—Tell me when you are most at rest? Is it when you are rich? No. Many possessions, many cares. We cannot sleep gently on them. Is it when you have attained to posts of high honor? No. As the body draws its shadow after it, so posts of high honor draw after them envy, cares, and disquietude. Is it when you seem to enjoy quiet slumber on a soft bed? Ah, no. How many dreams, how many frights in the night, disturb your repose! I am never better at peace with myself than when I enjoy a conscious sense of the grace of God. For where my desires end, there my rest begins. There is now nothing in heaven or on earth, which can meet my desires, but the grace of God. With it alone can I be satisfied. Where I find God with His grace, there do I find everything; there do I rest; and there am I well content. In Jesus I find the grace of God; in Him I find rest. How willingly does His divine heart profess no rest; how willingly does He invite us to Him: "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Take my yoke upon you and learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest unto your souls." Matthew 11, 28, 29. Yes, dear Jesus, thy heart shall be to me a place of repose, and my own heart will I seek in thy wounds. [illegible] I live; therein will I die. I will [illegible] and I shall die rejoicing. To this end, [illegible] thou me, from whom alone my help [illegible] come! [German Reformed Messenger.

The New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Christian Advocate.

Terms: $1 50 per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

Saturday Morning, May 21.

TEN THOUSAND SUBSCRIBERS!

An esteemed friend in Texas writes us strongly, and we thank him for his good words and works. If every friend were such a friend, in deed, the Advocate would soon have the ten thousand:

"The New Orleans Christian Advocate is read and appreciated in Texas. It is a Methodist—a Protestant seventy-four placed precisely where it ought to be:—a point the most important in the whole line of battle. Who, that has a pound of powder or lead, will withhold it? Who, that can ram home a cartridge, or sling a match, will withhold his arm?"

That cartridge idea is good and suggestive. Fold up this week's paper as soon as you have done reading it, and go among the people and make up a cartridge of $5 or $20. Send on the cartridges. Beware of blank cartridges. They kill nothing—but the printer.

FRENCH PROTESTANTS.—Doctor Kidder, writing from Europe for the Sunday School Advocate, corroborates the account of much that is called Protestantism in France. How unfortunate and corrupting this alliance of State and Church! Unholy wedlock:

"Turning from the Catholic to the nominally Protestant people of France, who are sometimes estimated at six millions, it is to be feared that large numbers of them are infidel but Protestants in name. Some have fallen into the habits of thought and action of those around them, and are practically indifferent to religion; while others have imbibed Rationalistic views, and are more disposed to hinder than to help the spread of evangelical truth.

"Two branches of the Protestant Church are recognised by the Government of France. The first is called the Reformed Church; the second, that of the Confession of Augsburg. The terms Presbyterian and Lutheran would appropriately designate them. Of the first, five hundred and eleven, and of the second, two hundred forty-nine pastors, are supported by the Government. Besides these there are several Independent and Wesleyan Churches, which to the extent of their ability and of the liberty granted them, are actively engaged in trying to maintain and spread the truth."

THE SLAIN.—In reference to Romish leaves, at present working so powerfully, the Episcopal Recorder says:

"The Church which Bishop Ives has abandoned has other questions to consider than those which are chiefly personal to himself. His case, apart from its individual features, must be taken in connection with the perversions of Baker, Forbes, Huntingdon, White, and others in this country, and the one or two hundred in England, who have glided into Romanism under the influence of Trachrian doctrines, and looking to the whole we must ask, who slew all these?"

The New York Churchman says a paper has come to them, wherein the Romanists lamentingly parade, in the form of an advertisement, a list of one hundred and seventy clergymen who have been perverted from the English and American Episcopal Churches to Romanism since 1842.

CANADA, (ASIA.)—Reverend D. Carmichael, pastor, writes 11th instant:

"Nothing of special interest from my work. There has been a manifest improvement in the spirituality of the Church, and a decided improvement in the attendance on all the means of grace. We have had two conversions among the whites, and five accessions to the Church. Among the colored there have been four or five conversions. Revival clouds are passing round us; and we are hoping and praying that one may gather over us at Calabo, and break in blessings."

THE ABDUCTION CASE.

Such is the heading of last week's editorial of the Catholic Messenger, (Romish organ of this city.) Notice of its forthcoming was thus given a week before:

"A KIDNAPPING CASE.—When we were denouncing, some weeks ago, the case of abduction which occurred lately in Boston, we did not expect that at the very same time some Methodists were preparing against a poor Irish lady, and her daughter, the same trick which was made use of in Boston against Mrs. Falvey and her daughter. Nevertheless we are compelled to say that it is a fact that in the good city of New Orleans, where a prevailing Catholic spirit had checked until this day Protestant bigotry, some fanatical Methodists have been found, who, regardless of their own, honor, and trampling under foot parental rights, endeavored to seduce into their damnable heresy, a young Catholic girl of thirteen, and to shades her from the lawful influence and authority of her mother.

"But in Louisiana justice is not bliadfolded by sectarian prejudices as in Puritan Massachusetts, and the girl has been restored by order of the Court to her mother.

"As our city papers have said nothing, or very little about that affair, we will give the particulars in our next number."

That was for Romanists to read who could believe it. But the "full particulars" before us will crack the capacious credulousness even of "good Catholics." The editor did well to prepare them beforehand by publishing the story of the "Holy House of Loretto." The facts are these:

Mrs. Bridget Liddy, an Irish widow, three or four years in this country, lives in Algiers, a small village on the other side of the river from New Orleans. Mary, her daughter, went to service, a year ago, as house-helper in the neighboring family of Mr. Notlee. Mary does well—likes the place; and her mother, with whom the daughter shares the wages, is pleased that she has got such a good situation.

Mr. Notlee is a Methodist; he goes to Sabbath School and Church—takes his family. Mary, without any constraint, gets to going, too,—likes the School, and LEARNS SOME THINGS! Meantime, she visits her mother freely, and no fuss. A religious meeting is held in Algiers, at the Methodist Church, and Mary is interested; asks, with others, the prayers of the Church,—declares with gladness that God, for Christ's sake, has pardoned her sins, and is admitted a member.

But this was in the midst of a Papist community. Advisers were not wanting to appeal to Mrs. Bridget Liddy's bigotry, and by one means and another there was no small stir. The Catholic Messenger says:

"Mrs Liddy was not aware for a while of the perversion of her child, but finally having been told that the girl was going every Sunday to the Methodist meeting-house, she went one Sunday in April to that place, and saw her daughter who had joined the Methodists in their prayers and ceremonies. Every true Catholic will easily guess what the heart of a Catholic mother must have felt at that moment."

"Having been told!" She hardly needed information of the fact. But the calm reader will not fail to see special efforts to get up high and bad blood.

A bitter persecution against her begins. And who can blame Mary, now old enough to assume her own spiritual responsibility, and enlightened as to the errors she had left behind for clinging to her faith of joy and peace! She did cling to it with meek firmness. The victim of coarse insult and violent abuse,—interrupted in Church, beat and blackguarded out of it, who could blame her for removing from the neighborhood, and taking refuge with a quiet and pious family till this rage subsided? This Mary did.

Raw-head and bloody-bones! Where is she? Gone! Abducted! Yes, a clear case of abduction! Now, here is a fine offset to the Charlestown abduction case. New Orleans against Boston! No doubt she's in a nunnery! No, the Methodists have no nunneries. In a prison! The Methodists haven't any of them, either. Kidnapped—abducted! The words sound large; pass them round and make out a case!

And the Messenger has tried hard and right ingeniously, too, to make out a case. But the reflecting reader of the Archbishop's organ must see that the persecution is all on one side. It is the Protestant that suffers. it is the Methodist that has been beat for conscience's sake. It is the Methodist "meeting-house" that has been invaded, its services interrupted, and a row raised at the door. The Papists are the offenders, and yet they put on a long face, and hang a drooping lip!

The opportunity of making some capital is too good to be lost. The Catholic Church now takes it up openly. The Messenger lets it out thus:

"Our friends of the Society of Saint Vincent of Paul, being apprized of the facts, and of the situation of the mother, raised among themselves a subscription to enable her to bring the case before the Court, and to meet the expenses of the trial. This is a good example which will not be lost."

A suit of habeas corpus was instituted in Mrs. Bridget's name, in the First District Court, against Mr. Notlee. Of course there was no trouble in finding what was not lost. Mary appeared in Court with her friends. Her mother was eager to get her into her hands. Mary, aware of her fury, and the spirit of her accomplices, dreaded nothing so much. What could she want with her—to put her in the nunnery, as was threatened? To wear her out by domestic torment? Why assert so strenuously her right of parent now—for tenderness or wrath? It was not to protect the daughter; she had protected herself. Nor to support her; she had supported herself. Reasonably enough she would resist such guardianship! Its purpose was too evident. She had already had a specimen of it before the "abduction" came off. Her friends understood this. Was it not a plain case of Romanism against Protestantism! Liberty of conscience was to be protected from persecution, and even irreligious men crowded the Court every time to which the trial was continued (several days) and evinced a deep concern for Mary. She asked another guardian, if a guardianship must be asserted over her at this particular time, and declared she would rather go to prison and stay there, than fall into her mother's power with such a temper and cruel purpose as was manifested. And when once it appeared that the Judge would deliver her to this mother, fierce and furious in her bigotry, she could not restrain tears, but wept aloud in the court-room, touching every heart.

The case in behalf of the Protestant was ably conducted by Messrs. Ogden & Chilton: the former of whom is now on the Bench of the Supreme Court of the State. We are glad of this, at least,—the court-room was crowded. Those who heard cannot forget their arguments and the testimony. We wish, too, we could here spread out the whole of it given in Court. But the Messenger affects to sneer at those arguments, and thus gives the decision:

"But those splendid arguments were set at naught by his Honor, Judge Larue, to whom Catholics must feel thankful for his prompt administration of justice in this case, and who restored the girl to her mother. In Puritan Massachusetts the Catholic mother would have been very likely fined or imprisoned, and her daughter lost; but fortunately we are not yet so far advanced in Louisiana."

What would they have done in Tuscany with Mr. Notlee and wife—in Tuscany where Popery has full sway? The Madiai were imprisoned for a like offence—charged with converting Catholics to Protestantism. And there is no habeas corpus there. "But fortunately" for Mr. Notlee and his good Christian wife, "we are not yet so far advanced in Louisiana." Things are different here.

Thanks to Puritan principles. There are no "comfortable prisons" for Mr. Notlee and his wife, for putting an open Bible in Mary Liddy's hands. "Fortunately we are not yet so far advanced in Louisiana."

Sorry are we to say it, and it may not surprise many to hear it. Our neighbor of the Catholic Messenger has not been as accurate in dealing with facts, which he must be supposed to know, as might be. We have marked seven instances in his editorial; but have space to expose only two or three of them.

He is unfair in stating the age of Mary: "Thirteen years old." Yes, and more. She is in her fifteenth year, according to the evidence before the Court. No child: but looking, speaking, and bearing herself, and supporting herself, like a woman. So matured is she that the Judge advised her to get married—advised her so from his bench. Is this a "girl of thirteen?" Note here a falsification material to the issue.

Again, certain gentlemen whom the Church as above seen was interrupted, as gently as possible restored order. Not, however, without having first invited her to "take a seat." The Messenger asserts that they "abused and beat her," and afterwards "bruised her brutally." We know from their characters, and from their statements to us, that the charge of the Messenger is utterly false. Throughout they have acted as Christians and gentlemen. Rudely interrupted in a religious meeting—a row raised at the church door—the private house of one of them grossly insulted within—and without brickbatted, and a mob gathered around it, which only dispersed before the Police—their forbearance has been remarkable.

Finally, the Judge is said to have restored the girl to her mother. Here the Messenger is guilty of a suppressio veri—mutilates the truth by not telling the whole of it. The sentence of the Judge is boasted as a Catholic triumph! The Messenger conceals this important fact that a bond of a thousand dollars was exacted for good treatment.

A thousand dollar bond is a pretty large one for a "poor Irish widow." Does that not show that there was a cause, and a strong legal restraint was judged necessary? The decision as given by the Catholic Messenger does his Honor grave injustice, and misrepresents the case.

We pity this woman. Her ignorance and superstition have been wrought upon maliciously by those around her. The congregation of St. Vincent is at the bottom of this movement, with the whole staff of priests. It was the duty of Protestants to see to it, that this Protestant be protected from their attempts to get at a victim, through the pretext of "parental rights," and punish "damnable heresy." And they have seen to it, and will.

We are informed that Mary still goes to the Methodist "meeting-house" regularly as before, and joins with the Methodists "in their ceremonies," and makes a good member. Whatever liberty of conscience, and freedom from violence she enjoys, is due to the bond. It cannot be broken with impunity. We further advise the instigators of this persecution that the eyes of Protestants are open, and they will continue to look after it. And if Mary should be shut up in that female prison, a nunnery, against her will, or otherwise spirited away, a habeas corpus will bring her to light and liberty.

SPIRIT RAPPINGS AND NECROMANCY.—One of the Churches in the Presbytery of Chillicothe, Ohio, has suspended two of its members who had been engaged in spirit rapping. The Presbytery adopted the following resolution as to the rappings:

Resolved, That the practice of Spirit Rapping, (so called), as it prevails in many parts, is, in view of this Presbytery, a revival of the old abomination of necromancy, so decidedly condemned in the word of God.

A QUESTION AND AN "OPINION."

A young itinerant, who has not long been in charge of a circuit, sends us the following:

"Has a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, the right to distill or vend spiritous liquors?

"My reason for propounding this question is that I was present, not long since, at a Quarterly Conference where the question came up by inquiry. The preacher reported that two members of our Church, within his jurisdiction, were engaged in making whiskey; that he had expostulated with them, and that they contended that they had a right to do so under the rules of our Church. The Conference were divided in opinion—a majority denying the right."

The letter is prefaced with an apology for "troubling the editor about questions, etc." The trouble of reading or answering questions of that sort is nothing: but the jurisdiction is! Our interrogating friends are informed that certain officers in the Church are set for those things, whose expositions and decisions are authoritative, and they are not editors.

But it is convenient for us to answer here: Not long ago we were conversing with an aged pastor on discipline, when he mentioned a case, just like this, that occurred under his jurisdiction while Presiding Elder in .... Conference. One or two members had gone into the manufacture of whiskey, and the Church was scandalized, but could not get at them. The distillers avowed there was no law in the Discipline against them, and they could not be deprived of membership. He advised that disciplinary action be instituted against them under the General Rules, and made to hinge on "doing no harm." A committee of Christian men found no difficulty in sustaining the charge so brought, according to the evidence, and the "old leaven was purged out."

As our correspondent wanted an "opinion" we give him one—another's, which being predicated upon large wisdom and experience will doubtless give more satisfaction than our own. As it cost us nothing, we make no charge.

CHURCHES IN DEBT.

That the house of God should be in debt is a calamity. Wesley and the early Methodists entertained the greatest abhorence of debt, as is evident from the early minutes. The Discipline expressly guards against it. The words and intention are so explicit we copy them here:

"In order more effectually to prevent our people from contracting debts [in building churches] which they are not able to discharge, it shall be the duty of the Quarterly Conference, of every circuit and station, where it is contemplated to build a house of worship, to secure the ground or lot, on which such house is to be built, according to our deed of settlement, and also said Quarterly Conference shall appoint a judicious committee of at least three members of our Church, who shall form an estimate of the amount necessary to build; and three-fourths of the money, according to such estimate, shall be secured or subscribed before any such building is commenced.

"In all cases where debts for building houses of worship have been, or may be incurred, contrary to or in disregard of the above recommendation, our members and friends are requested to discountenance, by declining pecuniary aid, all agents who shall travel abroad, beyond their own circuits or districts, for the collection of funds for the discharge of such debts—except in such peculiar cases as may be approved by an Annual Conference, or such agents as may be appointed by their authority."

Such language holds the Discipline on the temporal economy of the Church. And flippantly as some discourse about mending our rules, that is one it were better to keep. If, when the enterprise of our members and friends begun to move toward extension and new chapels, the presiding elders and preachers would, in limine, turn to this rule, and keep it steadily in view, much annoyance, failure, and scandal, might be saved the Church. This would not restrain, but direct and conserve Christian enterprise. It would save it from serious reaction into indifference or disgust. Many warm hearts, starting off with preparations half made, and sanguinely calculating on what is never to be realized, have been soured in the end. A litigious spirit has been bred in the bosom of the Church. Burdens of embarrassing weight have fallen unequally, and obase the bearers.

The custom of not dedicating a church in debt has a show of reason. We cannot give what is not ours. A debt is an incubus that restrains prayer: we are ready to say a sin if it can be paid by the people worshipping there and is not. How can you, people of God, sit and sing and rejoice in your privileges of grace when the mason and carpenter, the lumber merchant, and the hod-carrier, are not paid? How can you expect the large blessings of God when their wages are held back by you? Make an effort; get out of this debt at once, if possible. If not at once, rest not till you are out. Then, a free breath, and a conscience without offence toward man, will be yours. Blessings, these, worth an effort.

The Church should be an example of her own doctrine. Any discrepancy is quickly marked and widely quoted. And how sounds the text, "Owe no man anything" from a pulpit not paid for, and to people on seats not paid for, and a roof is above them, and a floor under them, and walls round them, not paid for? Such a fact is demoralizing upon a whole community. Think what the Gospel has done for you—what you owe to it; and make an effort to pay that debt.

From an exchange paper we add a closing paragraph. It is to our mind entirely:

"If persons are in debt, and are so circumstanced that they cannot help themselves, they are to be pitied; if they can help themselves, but won't, they are to be blamed. In the first case it is a calamity: in the second it is wrong:—wrong in any case, be the parties implicated who they may; but much more so, when the parties so acting are professors of religion, and the cause of God, and the House of God, are involved in the discredit. Is not the moral tendency of such a system most mischievous?

"If public bodies may contract debts without ever making any effort to discharge them, why may not private individuals do the same? But would that be right? Would it be scriptural? Would it be Methodistical? Besides, is there not something revolting to every pious and honorable feeling to dedicate a house to Almighty God, with solemn religious service one day, and the next day, perhaps, to put what we have given to God into the hands of a money-lender—to put God's house in pawn? We in vain look for any precept or precedent for any thing of the kind in the Word of God. Nor shall we find it in ecclesiastical history till within the last century."

TAKING THE RIGHT ROAD.

The Watchman and Reflector (Boston) draws an affecting incident. We commend the experience and words of an old and honored pastor to some who are halting between two opinions. Two roads are open before them—a call to the ministry, and a call to wealth—ease—honor. The worldly prospects of the Christian minister never appeared so promising as the moment he gave up all to follow Christ:

"Doctor Sharp left the city last week, for a climate more southern and genial, with the hope and prayer of friends that his absence may prove restorative to his physical energies, and that he may have added months and years to his useful life. On the Sabbath afternoon previous the congregation failed of having the supply for which provision (it was supposed) had been made. As it was known that the Doctor, who was in the house, would be ready to make good the failure, consultation was had, and it was agreed, (knowing that his strength was unequal to the delivery of a sermon) that should he insist, as he would, on performing the service, he should speak fifteen minutes, and that only. The sequel proved that a sermon of great power can be compressed within a quarter of an hour. He commenced by stating how it was that he came before the congregation, expressing gratitude that it had so happened, as otherwise the kindness of his friends might have denied him what, in the circumstances, he felt to be a privilege, that of addressing his people once more.

"More than forty years ago, he said, two roads were opened before him—the pursuit of mercantile life, and study for the Gospel ministry. He took the latter, and in the long review he had no regret at the decision then made to preach Christ to his fellow men; no regret even though the other road, had he taken it, should have conducted him to the position of a millionaire. God, he trusted, had blessed him, had owned his endeavors; and in looking back, he felt truly grateful that he had ever been put into the ministry. The people he thanked for their many acts of kindness, and all of them, from the oldest to the youngest, he commended to God's grace and blessing. The scene, as described to us by a friend who was present, was one of the most tender interest. Eyes moistened and tears flowed freely. The discourse was short, but its words were as 'goads fastened by the Master of assemblies,' never to be forgotten while memory does its office."

LAYING ANOTHER STONE.

The example of the English Wesleyan Methodists cannot be too often referred to, and commended by us in this—they are an educating people, and Wesley started them in this. With energy and zeal, large hearted benevolence, and large minded schemes, they are taking hold on the public mind, and intrenching themselves in educational fortresses. To be sure, this may degenerate into a wordly policy as opposed to an eminently spiritual one. But the watchful jealousy of true piety will prevent this.

They have built their Westminster Schools, and Schools at Richmond and Didsbury. They have provided for the education of the prophets at Richmond and Didsbury—for the sons of the prophets at Kingswood and Woodhouse Grove, and for the Schoolmasters at Westminster.

The Watchman, of the 20th ult., gives an account of their laying another stone in the grand enterprise of religious education. An additional wing was begun on the 11th, to give increased accommodation to the great number of boys now educated at Woodhouse Grove. The foundation stone was laid by W. Atherton, Esq., M. P., with a silver trowel prepared for the occasion. This Mr. A., now a legislator of the British Realm, was one of the early students, and son of a Wesleyan preacher who died a few years ago in the plenitude of connexional honors. On the occasion he remarked what may be of worth to us as well as interest:

"It was almost impossible for him to exaggerate in the expression of his feelings, when stating to them his sense of the value of the benefits he had derived on that spot. Great were the advantages of Woodhouse Grove boys, and with their privileges they ought to make their way in the world. It was not for him to institute any comparison between the old system of education, and any new system which might have been introduced, but he might be allowed to say a few words on the system which prevailed when he was a scholar, and which prevails now. The education given in that seminary was adequate to the objects designed by the institution. The doctrines inculcated were precisely those which their fathers preached in the various Circuits of the Connexion. The religious education communicated to these boys was thoroughly sound and evangelical. (Hear, hear.) The literary education they received was sufficient to fit them for any position in life in which they might in future be placed. Of the physical training he received at that institution he had a very high opinion; and he attributed much of the benefits of sound health which he enjoyed to the physical discipline which he underwent at that school. (Hear, hear.) The great question was, had it answered? It had. (Hear, hear.) He might say for that school that it had produced many eloquent and useful preachers. Many missionaries had gone from that institution, and carried the truth into distant lands, prepared to suffer martyrdom in its cause. Men of science and letters had been the fruits of its labors, and among the trading classes there were many who for boldness and energy, principle and honor, reflected alike credit upon themselves, the classes among whom they mingled, and the institution from whence they sprang. Being much of an itinerant himself, (a laugh,) and passing a good deal up and down the country, he frequently met with scholars from Woodhouse Grove in the middle walks of life, and he must say that without an exception, he had found them manifesting intelligence, activity, and a boldness and energy of character which caused them to stand out from the class to which they belonged. This was because the institution where they were brought up was thoroughly Wesleyan, because its education partook much of the character of Wesley himself—simple, manly, honest and straight-forward. (Hear, hear, hear.) He could not help adverting to the changes that had taken place since the day, in 1821, when he bid farewell to the governor, turned his back on Woodhouse Grove, and was wending his way to Bradford. George III. was then King—the Bourbons reigned in France—Buonnparte was a prisoner in the Island of St. Helena—the Reform Bill was not then dreamed of—the Test and Corporation Acts were unrepealed, and the Catholics, whether for good or for evil, were excluded from the ports of the Constitution."

The dining-room affairs were well done up, with one exception, which was apologized for. The chairman remarked that a circumstance occurred that day which had never occurred at Woodhouse before—they had wine on the table. He thought it necessary to say this as it was presented by a few friends.

Among the contributors to the new erection appeared the noble mites of young men who had been brought up at the School. One who had as yet obtained only a small salary sent up £20. Another the first half-sovereign he ever possessed after leaving school. A third his first quarter's salary. Verily that is the way to train up boys for the demands of the Church and age—trained to make and give.

The speeches were racy: well-spiced with loyalty and religious sentiment. Specimen:

"S. Highfield, Esq., of Chester, said he felt himself under peculiar circumstances in being called upon to address them on that occasion, but there might be reasons why he should not be silent, as he was the first scholar taught in that school—being the first boy of the first twelve who entered it. There was not a preacher living who was then connected with the school, and he believed but one beside himself of the twelve boys. The Romans used to say, who would not be a Roman? They had a patriotism it is true, but they thought of none else. The Jews had a patriotism, and had a worthy object for it, for they loved Jerusalem. They might say who would not be a Briton? They loved their country, and it was an object worthy of their attachment. They had a beloved Sovereign; the mildness of their laws, the extent of their commerce, the prowess of their arms, and the learning of Britain, all tended to render her an object worthy of their patriotism. But there was yet another—her Christianity. Briton loved the world. Christianity was a leading feature in her laws and constitution. Britain was a religious country, and Wesleyan Methodism was an integral part of the religion of this land. Whatever the Church by law established might do, it was the Church established by grace that must convert the world. (Hear, hear.) They all knew that education was good when it was founded on the Bible, and it was a peculiar feature of Woodhouse Grove School that the education given to the boys was decidedly religious. As to the classics they were hammered into them. (A laugh.) This was right, and when Mr. Crowther was at the head they could not keep it out. (Renewed laughter.) That was a glorious apostrophe of Mr. Farmer's—'Methodism is wanted, and Methodism will be wanted.' Yes, and while Methodism is wanted she will be found. She had not yet accomplished her mission, and was not going to be annihilated from the face of the earth. With all their great advantages, preachers' sons had their disadvantages—one of them formerly was when they left the school they had no home. But he would mention a great advantage. The Freemasons boasted of their secrets, but he thought they were not such great secrets after all, for he once spent an hour and a half in company with a Freemason, who took him to be one too. But there was a secret in Methodism, and a good one too; for he never was in any place in his life where he could not get a good dinner and a bed. He was once in Exeter, where his father had never been, and he inquired for a Methodist, who received him with the kindness of a friend and brother, because he knew the name of his father, and he was a preacher's son. He never saw the gentleman before, and had never seen him since. When he first came to the school it was large and commodious enough, for there were but twelve of them for six or seven weeks—then they rose to seventeen; from that they got up to sixty, and then to seventy—a number beyond which it was then supposed impossible to go. He must be excused dwelling on personal recollections. When he was in London he was a sort of ambulatory Missionary Secretary. There was then no Missionary House, no Centenary Hall. His father's house was at Spitalfields, and a poor miserable affair it was, yet all the missionaries who came to London, came to his father's house, and slept how they could. He went round with them to show them London, and was their guide from place to place. Dr. Coke came among others, and although he knew London, yet to save his time, he went with him to show where the parties he wished to call upon resided. He always thought him the handsomest man he ever saw in his life. He could not remember much of his sermons, but he should never forget his interjection, 'Ah!' The resolution spoke of success; for his part he never thought of success until the thing was done. He had not seen Mr. Atherton since he left the school, and during a period of forty years he had not met with more than twenty of his school-fellows. He had hoped to have met many there that day, and to have proposed to them to complete this wing by the Grove boys. He thought they ought to do it. When any thing went wrong about the premises in former times, and the governor came to inquire who has done this! The answer invariably was, 'The lads did it!' And when they come to look at this wing, and ask who has done this? Let the answer be, 'The lads did it.' He should be glad to do his share."

E-CA-NA-CHA HAH.

OCEANIC AND OSSIANIC.—Messrs. Austin & Martin, proprietors, have laid on our table a pamphlet, on the locality and quality of the Chalybeate waters, known as Ocean Springs, now attracting much attention on our Gulf Coast. It presents numerous and strong certificates from the cured. Mr. Everett, now of the Veranda, has leased the new hotel there for the accommodation of visitors. It seems this is not a discovery, but a re-discovery. The following is a curious relic. Hiatuhhee must have been a distant kinsman of Ossian:

"Of the traditional history and efficacy of these Springs we find remarkable confirmation in Col. Claiborne's 'Notes,' being an extract from the official proceedings of the United States Commissioners, who sat at the Yazoo Old Town, once the central village of the Choctaws. The testimony taken by the Commissioners was extremely minute, and embraces all the traditions of the Indians, their ideas of religion, customs, origin, former state of existence, knowledge of medicine, etc. It constitutes a curious record, and is now on file in the War Department.

EXTRACT FROM THE RECORD.

Hin-tubbe, sworn by Ellis, interpreter. "Am very old—the largest pine is not older than I. See, my limbs shake like the leaves when the wind blows.

Question. How old are you?

Answer. Count the circles in the big timber; the wrinkles in my face; the white hairs upon my head; the deer that I have slain; the scalps in my father's lodge.

Question. Were you born in this village?

Answer. My father's fire was where the water looked like the grass of the prairie, and our venison needed no salt.

Question. Can you name the place where the lodge of your father stood?

Answer. Where the pale warriors first came on the backs of big black-birds, with white wings (ships).

Question. Did you see them?

Answer. They were gone. I saw the graves; and the fire of their camps, and the pale pappooses, (half-breed children,) and spenking weapons (guns) that they left among the Choctaws.

Question. Do you visit the big, great waters of your youth?

Answer. The squawe and pappooses go there.

Question. Why do they go there?

Answer. In search of the E-ca-na-cha-hah, the Holy Drink of the Great Spirit.

The Indian warrior bore pain and disease without complaint, but the women of the tribe with their children, were, it appears, the habit of visiting the sea-shore, in the vicinity of the French fort, Biloxi Bay, for the benefit of the Holy Drink, as the Springs were then called."

AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY.—The anniversary of the American Tract Society was celebrated at Metropolitan Hall on the evening of the 11th inst. The annual report states that there were circulated during the year 9,178,640 publications, embracing 268,902,315 pages; value over $48,000. The distribution since the formation of the society, 8,416,830 volumes. Gratuitous distribution for the year, 63,989,976 pages. Receipts for the year, including donations, $147,347 04; for sales, including periodicals, $237,252 21. Total, $385,286 68. Expenditures, for books and periodicals, $232 211 20; for colporterage, $79,711 20; cash remitted to foreign lands, $20,000. Total, $385,075 07.

The society's colporteurs during the year have visited 3,252,089 persons. There are 150 colporteurs in the field altogether. Of these the greater number are in the South and South-west.

VIRGINIA COLONIZATION BOARD.—The Virginia Legislature, at its late session, passed a bill appropriating thirty thousand dollars per annum for five years, and placing under the control of the Board, in addition, the amount raised by the tax upon free colored persons, and the sum received for issuing their registers, both of which sums, it is computed, will equal ten thousand dollars annually. And the board is authorized to receive donations. The money at the disposal of the board is to be employed to aid the Colonization Society in transporting free persons of color to Africa, and subsisting them there for a limited time. The Governor has lately appointed, as the members of the Board, Peachy R. Grattan, Thomas H. Ellis, John C. Steger and John Howard, Esq.

LOUISIANA.—The St. Landry Whig of the 7th inst. says:

"We passed through the largest, and most extensive planting sections, and everywhere we found crops unusually backward, and suffering very perceptibly for want of rain. There will generally an inferior stand of stubble, and not a good one of plant cane. Young corn is quite small, and of a sickly color, and cotton was only here and there shooting out of the earth.

"The plantations on both sides of the Bayou Boeuf, as far up as Holmesville, were in fine order, and only awaiting the falling of rain. The largest corn we saw on our visit to Marksville was in Avoyelles Prairie.

"During a few days just passed we have been favored with genial showers, which we are certain will give a new impetus to all kinds of vegetation."

HYMENEAL.

MARRIED—By the Rev. B. H. Whittington, on the 10th May, Rev. WILLIS H. GERMANY, to Miss MARTHA E. GATLIN, of Pike county, Mississippi.

OBITUARY.

DIED—On the 27th April, Brother JOHN W. HENLEY, in Demopolis, Alabama.

He was born in Georgia, in 1811. He was a worthy citizen, wielding the influence of a remarkably vigorous mind, and a warm, honest heart. He was a member of the bar, and his success testifies to his legal ability. But far above all this, he was a devoted and consistent member of the Church of Christ. He made a profession of religion sometime during the year 1843, and joined the Methodist E. Church. Seldom in the performance of his duty, he filled acceptably at various times the offices of class-leader and steward; and as long as health permitted, led the singing of the congregation.

He was confined to his chamber in a state of complete helplessness for more than six months. He bore it, we will not say as a philosopher, but as a Christian. He rarely enjoyed the ecstacy of religion; yet he always possessed its peace. He had that strength to live so naturally to all, but he was willing to die when the Lord chose. Those of us who visited him often, have learned a lesson of Christian fortitude, which will not soon be forgotten. It was indeed a privilege to see him, and witness how faith in God can alleviate the severest affliction.

On the evening before his death, when he was sinking into that stupor from which he never awoke, I asked him if he still trusted in God. Summoning all his strength, as if for a last effort, he faintly answer, "Yes." He needed nothing but this, and his previous professions and Christian life, to assure us that all was well.

We mourn his loss in Church. We shall miss him from his seat; we shall miss his voice in the councils of the Church, and in the praises of the sanctuary. A wife, who clung to him with all the devotion of a woman's heart, and seven interesting children, will miss him from the family board and fireside. But we and they rejoice in the prospect of a re-union in the Kingdom of Glory.

THOMAS H. FOSTER.

DIED—On the 6th April, 1853, Miss ELIZABETH DUNWOODY, in the Parish of Rapides, Louisiana.

She was born in Aberdeen, Scotland, in 1812. Her parents landing at New Orleans, in 1820, moved to Opelousas, Louisiana, where Elizabeth embraced religion at the age of fourteen, and was with the first (Seth Lewis and family) to unite with the M. E. Church in that place.

The last four years of her life were full of unbroken affliction. Worn and wasted with a cancer, of which she died, her patience and faith were tried as by fire.

During the last four or six months of her life she passed through much heaviness of spirit, and some doubt in her own mind in regard to her acceptance with God. But this was evidently the bewildering effect of the disease in its last stage; for when asked by the writer, "Do you not love God?" the quick response was, "More than all beside." She was then asked if she was not mistaken about her love for God? In turn she asked, "How can I?" Thus she entertained the faith. And though a degree of heaviness pressed her to the last, she went to God in this faith and love.

Her example in life as a wife and a Christian is worthy of her sex. At her house, with her husband whose heart beat in unison with her own, the servant of God found a home, and the hungry were always fed. May we not conclude that inasmuch as she did these things to the least of these, she did them unto Christ.

T. J. LACY.

There are seven distinguished characters of voice in man and women. In men they are termed bass, baritone, tenor, robusto or full-tenor, and tenor-leggiardro, or counter-tenor. Those of women are termed contralto, mezzo-soprano and soprano. The compass will be found to vary according to the length of the vocal chords and windpipe, the longest possessing the power of producing the greatest number of notes. Thus, one voice may comprise a range of twelve notes, and another of sixteen, yet both may be of the same character. The change which occurs in the voice in the decline of life, is the result of the ossification of the cartilages of the larynx, and the hardening of its tiganents, which produce a hard and cracked sound.

FEMALE SHINGLE-MAKERS.—A Hanover county (Va.) correspondent of the Richmond Despatch says that there are in that county two girls who are engaged in felling trees and getting out shingles. They get out six thousand per week, by their own hands, at four dollars and a half per thousand. They supply the whole demand in that region of county, and many are sold in the Richmond market. They have, by dint of industry, purchased an excellent piano. They are most excellent performers. Their task is six thousand per week. They shorten their task by working at night in the fishing season, thereby gaining Saturday, which they devote to pleasure.

EXTRAORDINARY LONGEVITY.—Died on Saturday, the 30th ultimo, at the advanced age of 120 years, Monica, a servant woman of Mrs. Eliza Lancaster, of Cobb Neck, Charles county, Maryland. Incidents which she frequently related furnished data from which her age could be nearly ascertained. She was a servant of the most uncommon industry and fidelity. Though for many years left to her own pleasure and under no restraint, she would, until within a few months of her death, try to render services to her mistress, to whom she was devotedly attached. Such longevity, kindness and attachment speak well for our county. [Port Tobacco Times.

FAST GOING.—The clipper ship Sovereign of the Seas, Capt. McKay, arrived at New York within eighty-two days from Honolulu, Sandwich Islands. The run from Honolulu to Cape Horn, a distance of 8084 miles, was accomplished in 37 days; in 26 of these days, consecutively, the ship ran 6489 miles; one of these days was distinguished by an extraordinary run of 430 miles. This is the greatest sailing recorded; the nearest approach to it being that of the Flying Cloud, which ran in 24 consecutive days an average of 227 miles per day; while the daily average of the Sovereign of the Seas, for the same time, was 249 11-13 miles, or 22 miles a day more than the Flying Cloud.

Dr. Casper, of Berlin, Germany, has calculated that the mortality among bachelors, from the age of thirty to forty-five years, is twenty-seven per cent, while among married men of the same age, it is only eighteen per cent. Out of a number given, forty-one bachelors only reach the age of forty years; seventy-eight married men reach that age.

Foreign advices mention that a company of publishers has been formed to buy up the copyright of the works of Lamartine. The capital is to be 450,000 francs, in 500 shares, most probably with a view to relieve the necessities of the unfortunate poet.

General Intelligence.

Mobile Items.

We find the following items in the Mobile Register of Saturday:

MAIL ARRANGEMENTS.—On the 1st of June the summer schedule comes into operation, when one of the present mail boats goes into the Lake trade. Up to this day three boats have been employed, and this is to a later date than usual. Yesterday the Oregon dropped down to the dry dock for the purpose of finding and stopping a slight leak just discovered. A brief time will suffice for this, and then the California will be docked and overhauled, prior to her resumption of the Lake trade.

MOSQUITOES.—These pests and plagues of each man's home are now in operation as gratuitous phlebotomists. Blood-letting, by their operation, is far more torturing, and as far less satisfactory, than that of the cupper and bleeder.

THE CONCRETE LIMESTONE.—Our citizens have now a full opportunity of carefully examining this new mineral product of our State, and form a well grounded opinion of its applicability to building purposes in general, and for the construction of our new Custom-house in general. Some twenty-five large blocks were yesterday brought down by the steamer Sam Dale from Gainestown, Clarke county, about a hundred miles above the city. They are now lodged at the convenient and long vacant lot at the north-west corner of Dauphin and Water streets. Mr. Timothy Lloyd, an enterprising stone mason, has recently opened the quarry at the above named location, and is about to dress and work this material at this spot where the specimens now lay.

The new number of the London Quarterly Review gives the following as the present state of the search for Sir John Franklin:

Sir E. Belcher is engaged in a survey of Wellington, while Capt. Kellett is probably safely anchored in Winter Harbor, the old quarters of Parry. Each has a well stored ship, with an attendant steamer, while the North Star, within reach, no doubt, of parties from either vessel, remains in Franklin's harborage at Beechy Island. On the Pacific side, the Plover, we may presume, has advanced to Point Barrow. We have no intelligence of McClure, since, under a press of canvas, he stood for the pack ice off Icy Cape, in August, 1850, nor from Collinson, since he passed Behring's Straits in July of the following year. Our Consul at Panama indeed writes that Collinson had been spoken by some whalers, but without details: we know not what credit is to be attached to the report. McClure supposed he should be able to reach England by way of Barrow's Straits, some time in this year, either by navigating his vessel through the unknown sea which stretches north of the American continent, or by quitting his ships and making for Melville Island or some point nearer home. Stirring tidings, of some kind will, most likely, reach us in the course of a few months.

MEXICAN INTELLIGENCE.—By late private advices from Mexico, we learn that none but the most gloomy apprehensions prevail there in regard to the future of that unhappy country. Nothing is really expected from Santa Anna's return by way of removing the existing disorders. Indeed, it is anticipated that treason lurks in the bosom of the very men who have professedly encouraged his return, and that he is more likely to be the speedy victim of assassination than to achieve any honors in his new career. Being the ablest man of the country, and the richest, outside the priesthood, he is more feared and hated than any other. It is known that he has harbored the idea of confiscating the landed property of the church, and using the proceeds to discharge the public debt, to reassure the public credit, and build a foundation upon which to plant some hopes of the future. He is thus suspected by the only real power in Mexico—that of the priesthood. The difficulties of his position are so great, let him take what course he will, that no faith is any where manifested in his ability to retrieve the fallen fortunes of the nation. The expectations of all are vague, and no hope seems to animate any bosom but that the country may fall under the dominion of some foreign power. [N. Y. Tribune.

WESTERN RAILROADS.—"Ion," writing from the Capital to the Baltimore Sun, under date of the 11th, says:

The great Central Illinois Railroad Company appear to be in full tide of practical success. The grant of public land transferred to them will build the road for the whole distance of 700 miles, and the stockholders will own the road, without paying a cent for their stock. It is a donation to them from the Government of seventeen millions of dollars—the estimated cost of the road—for their personal benefit. The land is already estimated to be worth that sum, and the loans for carrying on the work are based upon the value of those lands at that rate. Loans in the amount of some seven or eight millions have already been effected, and a new loan of three millions has now been called for, and will be readily filled.

The stockholders of the Southwestern branch of the Missouri and Pacific Railroad Company will never be obliged to pay a dollar for that road, of 310 miles in length. The lands granted to the State by the Government, during the late session, were transferred by the State to the Company, and will sell for enough to build the road. A loan will be soon proposed for the purpose of completing this road, and it will be based, in a great measure, on the value of the bonds. All these Western railroads will undoubtedly give dividends of ten per cent. on their cost, and, besides, are made at the expense of the public treasury.

THE CHINESE MISSION.—The New York Express says that statements have reached there, through the medium of private letters from Hong Kong, which, if they be true, would seem to indicate the partial miscarriage of the Chinese mission.

Hon. Humphrey Marshall, the new Minister, it seems, in the latter part of January proceeded to Whampoa, in the Saratoga, and thence to Canton, where he opened communication with the Chinese Commissioner, Sue, preparatory to his delivering the autograph letter from the President of the United States to the Emperor of China. Some days after, however, and before an answer had been received from the Chinaman, Commodore Aulick returned from Manilla, and upon finding the Saratoga absent from Hong Kong, immediately ordered her to join him, and at the same time severely took her commander to task for having, unauthorized, carried the Minister to Canton. The Sarntoga then, so runs the story, returned to Hong Kong, where a court martial was held upon the Captain for disobedience of orders, but it resulted in his honorable acquittal. Meanwhile, it is further said that the authorities at Canton, hearing of the withdrawal of the Saratoga, and seeing the unpleasant position in which it was placing Mr. Marshall, sent word to that gentleman that he could not be received at Canton, on sundry pretexts, which showed that the American Envoy was far from welcome. One of these pretexts was that Sue was absent in the interior, and that no officer of the Kuang Tsang provinces was of a grade high enough to receive him. Mr. Marshall then desired to leave Canton, but could not; the Saratoga having gone, and there being no vessel to convey him thence. At last dates (February 20) he was at Macao waiting for a conveyance to take him north, when one would come along. The whole trouble seems to have grown out of the extra officiousness of Com. Aulick, in calling off the Saratoga, leaving Mr. Marshall to get on as well as he could with the Chinese, which turns out to have been just no way at all. We are also informed that the Commodore intended to return to the United States by the next overland mail. He has, probably, the "other side of the story" to tell.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE.—The New York Legislature, the day before its adjournment, passed a bill incorporating the New York State Agricultural College. The plan of Instruction embraces practical and scientific agriculture, chemistry, mechanics, mathematics, surveying, engineering, geology, botany, the practical management of the farm, of the dairy, and farm stock.

THE SOCIALISTS.—Albert Brisbane and Victor Considerant, two of the most eminent living socialists of the Fourier school, are now in Cincinnati. They are on their way to Northern Texas and the Red River country, for the purpose of selecting from twelve to fifteen thousand acres of good land, with a view to the importation of a colony of French and American Socialists.

INTERVENTION.—Le Republicain, the new organ of the French republicans at New York, contains an address to the American people, signed by three distinguished French socialists at London, Felix Pyat, Cansidière and Boichot, in the course of which they say:

"The peoples are not made to grow isolated in their egotism like the oyster and terrapin in their shells. It is neither their mission, nor their destiny, nor their right, nor their duty. The peoples owe themselves to one another—the great to the small, the strong to the weak. The same duty, the same advantage which induces a man to help a man in a city, should induce a people to assist a people in the universe. Your Senate, like our Convention, has said 'all men are free, equal, and brothers.' We add, they are solidaires, (persons joined in a common duty and responsibility.) All ought to be fellow-citizens of the great republic of humanity.

"Therefore, at this solemn hour, all eyes are turned towards America. The hopes, the wishes, the hearts, the hands of all the oppressed are turned towards this future President, whose name signifies Solidarité, (joint and several responsibility.)

"Intervene, then! The New World ought to assist the Old. Young America ought to lift up again Old Europe, its mother. Respect for parents has always been honorable and useful for children.

"Intervene, then, immediately, spontaneously. Time presses. Take the initiative. Do not wait for official action, which will only be more powerful after your sympathies. Let us shake hands. Monarchs have alliances; why not democracies? Kings themselves have taught us the holy alliance of the peoples. The alliance of France and America is the freedom of the world. It is invincible liberty making the tour of the two hemispheres—enlightening, warming up, fructifying and vivifying like the sun, the entire globe; it is la Republique, democratique et-sociale universelle!"

AUSTRALIA AND CALIFORNIA.—Having been put in possession, by recent arrivals, of the yield and shipment of gold from Australia and California, during the past year, we are enabled to deduce therefrom a comparison between the gold fields of the two districts. The actual shipments of gold dust from San Francisco, by steamer, according to the manifests, in 1852, were to the value of 42½ millions of dollars. We will assume that one-fourth more was taken away privately by passengers leaving, this will give us an aggregate value of about 11 million pounds sterling.

The entire population of the State, deduced from the census of 1850, and subsequent arrivals, is assumed to be not less than 300,000, of whom but 8000 are females—a greater disproportion of the sexes than exists in any other country. Of the entire population, about one-half are probably engaged at the mines, although the California papers state only one hundred thousand are at the diggings. The gold found, divided among 150,000, would average about £77 per head. The shipments from the Australian ports in 1852, of gold dust, were: from Port Philip upward of two million and a quarter oz.; from Sidney one million oz. At Adelaide, Victoria, gold to the value of two millions sterling was also received in the year. So that the total gold may be fairly valued at £13,000,000 sterling. This is irrespective of any amounts brought away privately by passengers, of the quantity hoarded by diggers and lodged in the banks, and of some large amounts shipped through Van Dieman's Land.

The population of the two colonies of New South Wales and Victoria is stated at about 400,000. The number engaged in digging gold in the former colony is set down at less than 10,000, and in Victoria at 100,000. But we will assume the same number is engaged in gold seeking as in California; the average to each person would therefore be £87 per head, or £10 per head more than in California. We have been particularly careful to under estimate the facts with regard to Australia, from the want of official data, our computation being derived from the actual shipments reported and statements given in the local papers. But our impression (grounded upon the estimates and information of well-informed local authorities) is strong that the average yield per head, of the Australian gold fields, to the population employed, has exceeded £100 for the year. Of course, this sum has been unequally divided; but the facts are patent and encouraging. [London Globe, April 22.

Public dinners are under the ban of Horace Greeley, who, in an editorial in the Tribune, noticing the banquet to John P. Hale, opens thus:

"Public dinners are public nuisances—flagrantly so. They are a relic of out-grown barbarism which esteems eating and drinking the chief ends of life, and would show affection as Joseph did to his brother Benjamin—by giving him three times as great a mess as was apportioned to his half-brothers. It is every way unworthy of our age to attempt to honor, reward or show admiration for a public benefactor by feasting him, even when (as at Boston yesterday) intoxicating liquors are excluded. But an ordinary 'public dinner,' 'with a stick in it,' is essentially a bestial performance. Two or three hundred people are assembled to eat an inordinate meal, at an unusual and unseasonable hour, paying for it a sum that many of them cannot really afford, and washing it down with incessant libations of villainously drugged cider and cockroach Madeira, which gets steadily worse as the company get more and more enthusiastically and obliviously drunk—then the speeches, beginning with the prosy and the foggy and ending some where in the infancy of the small hours, with the tipsy and the nasty—then the leathery cloud of cigar-smoke which, for the last hour or two, is battened down upon the whole concern, afflicting, torturing, demoralizing all well-bred, cleanly, uncorrupted senses—and oh! the sick headaches, the days of misery, and often the fatal illnesses that follow, as Death on the Pale Horse was followed. On the whole, we consider the public dinner the absurdest, stupidest bore of the nineteenth century."

FINE COTTON.—The editor of the U. S. Economist has received, from a firm in New York, a remarkable specimen of cotton, destined for the World's Fair. It was procured by a merchant of Texas from the Pima Indians. It is of a texture and strength of fibre superior to any ever before offered in New Yor. To the touch it has the feeling of silk, being destitute of the harsh feeling incident to cotton. It is of a long staple, and of a beautiful clear color. The discoverer has procured a quantity of the seed, and will enter extensively into the culture. It has been found under circumstances which lend to the hope that the degeantion of the quality usual upon these fine qualities will not be encountered in this case.

TALL COTTON.—The Nashville True Whig has seen at the Mutual Insurance office in that city a couple of cotton stalks which, in point of altitude, are rather remarkable They were twelve feet high, and one of them produced four hundred and three bolls. They are specimens from the plantation of M. R. Cockrill, Esq., in Madison county, Miss., latitude 32 degrees, and of the Egyptian species. Mr. C. designs sending them to the World's Fair for exhibition.

LOCOMOTIVE FOR JAPAN.—Morris & Son, of Philadelphia, have just completed a miniature locomotive to be taken out by the Japan expedition to initiate the Japanese into the mysteries of steam. The locomotive is complete in every particular, as also the tender and passenger car. The entire weight is 1210 pounds, and the capacity of the locomotive is estimated at nine tons. A railway track will also be sent to Japan, with the locomotive and its appendages.

A letter from St. Petersburg says: M. Nabel, Engineer of our Capital, has just constructed a caloric steam engine on the plan of that invented by Captain Ericsson; but with an improvement, which consists in this, that the two cylinders, instead of being placed one above the other, are placed one within the other. The trial of this engine, which took place in the presence of the Grand Duke Constantine, has succeeded perfectly. This Russia is the first country in Europe that has imitated this invention of Capt. Ericsson.

A syphon for dairymen is now in use in Scotland, by means of which the milk is drawn away from the cream, instead of skimming the cream off tha milk.

The Irish in the United States, and their poorer friends in the United Kingdom, produce, it is said, one-half of the correspondence carried on by the two nations.

The Norwalk Disaster.

FIFTY-THREE LIVES KNOWN TO BE LOST.—The Catastrophe at Norwalk.—Our Northern exchanges come to us burthened with the particulars of another frightful railroad disaster:

The train to which this terrible calamity has occurred was the express train for Boston, on the New Haven railroad. It left the canal street station, in New York, at eight o'clock on Friday morning, the 6th inst., and consisted of two baggage and five passenger cars. The number of passengers was about two hundred. The train arrived at Norwalk at half past ten o'clock. About half a mile beyond the Norwalk station the road is carried over the creek or river by a bridge, in which there is a draw about sixty feet wide; the steamboat Pacific plying between Norwalk and New York and other vessels having a right of way. It was at this bridge that the frightful catastrophe occurred.

The mode of signalling the engineer that the draw is open, and that he must stop his train, is the lowering of a large red ball, which, when the bridge is closed and the track free from impediments, is again raised to the top of a staff of some altitude. Of course the engineer is bound so to regulate his speed as he approaches the bridge that he can "brake up" without difficulty as soon as he discovers the warning signal. In this instance the engineer appears neither to have so abated his speed nor to have looked out for the signal. The ball had been lowered, the drawbridge having just been opened for the passage of the steamboat Pacific. The train, according to the testimony given at the coroner's inquest, was going at its full speed. So that this fearful loss of life can only be charged upon a criminal recklessness on the part of the engineer which is almost without a parallel.

So terrific, indeed, was the speed of the train that although the gap or opening in the bridge was sixty feet wide, the engine literally overleaped it and struck the abutments on the other side, very little below the level of the line, before it fell into the water. The tender followed the engine and fell upon it. The first baggage car fell partly across the tender, and the second, in which was a smoking room, fell close to it. Two of the passenger cars were precipitated upon this mass, and all were submerged. the engine and baggage wagons being deeply imbedded in the mud. It was high tide in the river, and the water was about twelve feet deep. The bottom of the third car broke in two, and the fragments hung suspended on the edge of the stationary part of the bridge. Some of the passengers were thrown into the stream a distance of about fifteen feet.

No pen can describe the scene that followed. We copy, however, the narratives of some who were eye-witnesses to this fearful disaster:

STATEMENT OF EYE-WITNESSES.—Mr. James A. Renaud, engineer of the steamboat Pacific, makes the following statement, which is also signed by Captain S. S. Byxbee, of that boat:

"I witnessed the terrible accident on the New York and New Haven Railroad, which occurred at ten o'clock this morning. The place where it happened is called South Norwalk Village, where there is a drawbridge across the Norwalk river. The drawbridge had been raised to permit the passage of the steamboat Pacific. I am the engineer of that boat, and was on board her at the time the accident occurred. We had got about thirty or forty yards from the draw when we heard the cars coming. I immediately walked aft and stood on the guard, where I could see every thing that happened. The cars were then coming at full speed. The draw was open and the ball was down. The ball is used for a signal. When it is up it signifies that all is right.

"The locomotive was under such headway when it ran off, that before it reached the water it struck the abutment on the opposite side—a distance of about sixty feet. The tender, baggage car, and two mail cars came next. Two passenger cars went into the opening on the top of what had preceded them; the third broke in the middle and half of it went down. In this third car two were killed instantly, and many more were hurt. How many in all were killed I do not know, but before I left at twelve o'clock, noon, between thirty and forty had been taken out dead. They were horribly bruised and mangled. One beautiful young girl, about sixteen years old, had the back of her head knocked in. There was one child about four months old and many other children killed. The engineer and firemen of the train, when they saw the ball down, jumped off before the cars reached the bridge.

"When the cars ran off those in the rear ones screamed terrifically. We put right back and rendered what assistance we could. People went to cutting the cars with axes and taking out the dead. Not one that was taken out of the second car was alive. The excitement was intense; women were rushing down with quilts to cover the dead; others were vainly striving to restore to life the poor victims, as they were taken out."

Mr. Thomas Hicks, the artist, was in the first car with Miss King, of New York. They occupied a seat within four of the end of the car, on the right hand side, facing the engine. Mr. Hicks describes the scene as follows:

"The cars were seemingly going at the usual rate, when, without warning or intimation of any kind, he beheld the front part of the car rushing towards him in fragments, the passengers being tossed in the air like chaff, dashed up against the top of the car, and thrown about in a hurricane of destruction. In an instant he found Miss King gone from his side, and himself crushed under the partially fallen roof of the car, and surrounded by a choking atmosphere, in the midst of a shapeless mass of ruins, dead bodies on every hand, and the darkened car rapidly filling with water. He began feeling among the wreck and under the water for his companion, but she was nowhere to be found. He continued the search till the water had risen to his chin, a time which he judged to have been about ten minutes, when, despairing of her recovery, he looked about him for a mode of escape. Just behind him, at the corner of the car, he beheld an apertura through which he crawled out upon the top. Here he lingered with a view to renew the search for his companion, when he was accosted by some one, who asked him for whom he was looking. He described the lady's dress, when his interlocutor informed him, to his inexpressible astonishment and gratification, that she had just gone out upon the track. He ascertained afterward that the front of the car was stove to atoms by the concussion, and that the top of it was split open laterally on the side where he sat, and this occasioned that side of the roof to fall. It also apeared that during the instantaneous process of splitting open the top of the car and the fall of the ceiling, Miss King, without any knowledge or agency of her own, had been projected through the crevice upon the top of the car. And here, without having been wet, but with a severe wound in the face, she found herself with another car precipitated upon it, which passed her and tumbled over into the river beside the wreck of the first. Her escape, and the manner of it especially, was a miracle. Mr Hicks called out, when he discovered the means of escape, to those in the car, if so there be any living to hear, pointing to the way of getting out. But he saw but one person avail himself of the notice, or escape in any way.

"The second passenger car dashed into the first nearly half its length. The death of nearly all must have been sudden and instantaneous. There was but one shriek; then all was still as death, save the surging of the waters as they first receded from the force of the concussion, and then closed in upon the car. He thinks none were lost out of the third one, or at most but one or two."

LATEST FROM NORWALK.—Up to the present time (nine o'clock Saturday morning) fifty-two dead bodies have been recovered. Some of the bodies are still lying in the station house, awaiting recognition by their friends. It is believed that some bodies lost have been washed away by the current, and that the whole loss of life amounts to sixty.

Mr. Fluent, who was married on Thursday, and whose wife was among the victims, is almost insane.

Fifty coffins have been purchased by the company and brought to the station; the dead bodies as they were brought in were marked and placed in them. Upon those that were recognised their clothing was allowed to remain, while those that were unknown were stripped, their clothes and valuables were placed safely away, and upon their persons clean linen shrouds were arranged.

Most strenuous efforts are constantly being made to recover what bodies there may still be entangled in the wreck. Preparations for dragging the creek are being made, and cannons will be fired to bring up the dead.

The locomotive was discovered this morning, buried on the opposite side of the creek.

LEGISLATIVE INVESTIGATION.—Hartford, May 7.—The Legislature, at its session this morning, appointed a special committee to investigate the cause of the late disaster. The committee consists of Senator Hyatt, Dr. Beckwith, Mr. Russell, and Mr. Halsey.

They are instructed to repair at once to the scene of disaster, and collect facts and report officially. A bill was also introduced making a fine of $10,000 for every person killed upon a railroad, and imposing heavy penalties for injuries on account of accidents caused by carelessness. A thorough investigation of this affair is to be made. The legislature have also resolved to appoint a Board of Railway Commissioners, with extensive powers.

THE KILLED.—We have the names of forty-one of the victims of this melancholy disaster, and fifteen bodies still remain at Norwalk unrecognized. The wounded, so far as reported, number twenty-four, and one hundred and eighteen escaped without injury. These form an aggregate of one hundred and ninety-eight, leaving eighteen persons to be accounted for, to make up the number of two hundred and sixteen passengers registered as being in the cars.

The New York press generally lash Engineer, Conductors, and the Company indiscriminately. The Express says of Tucker, the Engineer:

"It is unfortunate for the unhappy man that, his own body is not among the corpses of the slain, for if he lives, he must live to be branded as a murderer, and to be shunned as a Cain."

And the Tribune:

"We know that the outcry of public indignation is mainly directed against the Engineer, who is in the hands of justice, and who, we trust, will be punished as he deserves; but we cannot, on that account, acquit his employers. There are points on which the guilt of the Company, and its share in this awful massacre, become undeniable."

And the True Democrat:

"It is well to imprison the engineer, who madly threw his human charge (while he took good care of himself) into the jaws of destruction. It is well to arrest the conductor, who, to gratify a little personal spleen, was willing to risk (since he could and did save his own) the lives of the two hundred souls committed in such confidence to his safe keeping. But, where are the equally culpable influences that placed men like these in a position in which they could so conveniently trifle with all that humanity holds precious, and the heart cherishes as sacred? May they walk our streets, simpering at the havoc their cupidity has manufactured? May they look into our eyes, and hypocritically tell us of their grief, while, with their fingers in their pockets, they count over the dollars they have saved in the employment of such cheap assassins, in lieu of more costly help, whose ability and consciousness would have been a guarantee for the public security?"

HARD FATE.—A few days since while three men were engaged in painting the front of a lofty house in Vesey street, the scaffolding gave way and one of the men was instantly killed. On Monday his remains were followed to the grave by his widow and her three orphans, two neighbors joining in the solemn ceremony. And now for the history of this desolate family as given by the New York Correspondent of the Philadelphia Dispatch. He tells us that this family had scarcely been two months in this country! This was the first chance the unfortunate deceased had been favored with since he landed, of earning a penny; and, though a lawyer and a literary man at home, hunger and want, sickness, penury, and friendlessness, had compelled him to take that day a brush in hand and turn painter, to obtain bread for his starving self and family! How brief was that labor! Instead of returning home at night with his dollar to his famishing little ones, he was carried home before dark on a shutter, a mass of mangled and mutilated humanity. In comfortable circumstances in Dublin, he and his family abandoned their home to better their fortune, and arrived here last February. They had with them about $280 in gold.

They were robbed of this petty store within a few minutes after their trunks reached the shore—some "baggage-smasher" having carried off the very trunk that contained it. This left them penniless in a foreign land. Sorrow made his wife ill. Their infant child sickened and died the first week after. The broken-hearted immigrant was next prostrated himself, by downright trouble and dispair. When he recovered, which was slowly, his wife, unused to such hardships, sank away again, a victim of her sufferings. All this exhausted the means of every friend to whom they could apply, and swallowed up, in pledge after pledge, every rag of clothing except that which covered their nakedness. Even the wedding dress had been pawned, the morning of the accident, to obtain food! Yesterday the widow died, and to-day the poor little children will be sent to the alms house! Three months ago the whole family were living joyously in their own native home, and now behold at Ward's Island, in these helpless orphans, all that is left of it! A more crowded chapter of wretchedness and misfortune it has never been our lot to encounter.

A GIRL MURDERED BY HER OWN FATHER.—The particulars of a most revolting murder came to our knowledge yesterday, the perpetrator of which has frequently appeared in our police reports, a man by the name of Wm. Robinson. Robinson and his wife were both in the habit of getting drunk, when they would fight each other like dogs, and then they would be taken up by the police. Several months since they left here, moving to Mississippi, near Hernando. Since then they have separated—the wife, who had several negroes, dividing some negroes among her children, who were to remain with their father. A few weeks since Robinson sold a negro belonging to his eldest daughter, a girl of some fourteen or fifteen years of age, to which she objected, and by some means the old man was arrested and put in jail at Hernando. During the past week he had been liberated from custody and allowed to return to his children.

On Wednesday last he again sold his daughter's negro, and the purchaser came to take his property away, when she still refused to give the negro up. In a fit of anger he took his gun and fired at her, lodging the contents in her body, inflicting a mortal wound. The girl lived in great bodily pain and suffering until the next morning, when she was relieved from her misery by the hand of death. The murdering fiend fled and has not since been heard from, although the officers of justice are in hot pursuit. It is supposed that he is lurking about the suburbs of the city. A more atrocious, cold blooded murder we have never chronicled, and what is worse to relate, the horrible deed may be laid to the curse of John Barleycorn. It was liquor that caused it all. A curse upon both parents, one of whom is the murderer of his own child—the other, probably, leading a dissipated, profligate life. To what sad end doth it bring its followers. [Memphis Whig, 14th.

DEATH FROM HYDROPHOBIA—Singular Case. Wm. Gray, a lad 16 years of age, died on Monday night, on board the sloop Armada, lying at the foot of 61st street, East River, having exhibited, previous to his death, marked symptoms of hydrophobia. Coroner Wilhelm held an inquest, yesterday, upon the body, when Captain Menerlo, master of the sloop, stated that the deceased had been employed on board the vessel for a month past; that on Friday last, he complained of dizziness in his head, and pain in his back and limbs. He grew worse, and on Saturday had a high fever, but could not drink or even look at water. On Sunday, a physician was sent for, who gave him medicine, and further attended him; he foamed at the mouth and appeared frightened at every thing he saw, and when the water was shown him or even spoken of, he became very much excited; while sick, he told Mr. Mansrlu that about four and a half years ago, he was bitten by his own dog, which, at the time, he thought was not mad; soon after this he sold the dog, and lost sight of him.

Dr. Blumenthal, of No. 402 Fourth street, made an external examination of the body, upon which he found no marks of violence, but discovered symptoms which led him to conclude that death was caused by hydrophobia.

The jury concurred in this opinion, and a verdict to that effect was rendered by them. [N.Y. Sun, 11th.

A good, stout, healthy, honest, industrious, steady, faithful, persevering, temperate, obliging, trustworthy, good-natured, teachable, tractable, civil, moral, intelligent boy, fifteen years of age, can have an opportunity to learn the printer's profession at the Courier office.

A number of small-pox patients in Oglethorpe, Georgia, made a stampede from the buildings in which they were confined by the civil authorities, and, in different stages of the fearful malady, fell upon the officers and put them all to flight. Mayor Sorrell called out the military to suppress the disturbance; they, however, made but poor resistance to their diseased opponents, flying in great confusion at their approach. At the last accounts, small-pox had the day, and the disorder was subsiding.

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE OFFICE,
Saturday Morning, May 21, 1853.

There have been few changes of much moment in our general market during the past week, though with a considerable degree of dullness a few articles, including Flour, Pork and Bacon, have been saleable only at a slight reduction in the rates. Corn has been in good request at steady prices. The Cotton market has been quiet, and the rates irregular. Tobacco has met with a good demand, though less active then during the previous week, and prices have been very full. On Saturday the accounts of the steamer Atlantic reached here by telegraph. They embrace dates from Liverpool to the 4th, and represent a slight improvement in the Cotton market at that port, during the three days preceding the steamer's departure. The sales during this period were stated at 20,000 bales, of which 3000 had been taken on speculation and 2000 for export. The quotations are given as follows: Fair Orleans 3½, Middling Orleans 3⅝, Fair Uplands 3¾, and Middling Uplands 3 5-16 ₩ lb, indicating an improvement for most descriptions.

COTTON.—The Cotton market opened on Saturday with a fair demand, which was but little affected by the Atlantic's accounts, published in the evening papers of that day, and the sales embraced 6000 bales at firm prices. On Monday, however, there was less inquiry, and only some 3000 bales were disposed of at rates for most qualities rather in favor of buyers, but without quotable change. Even running lots of Middling were firmer however, that description being most in request. On Tuesday barely 2000 bales found purchasers, but at rather higher prices for Middling to Good Middling, the tower grades being very dull and irregular in the rates. On Wednesday, also, barely 2000 bales changed hands at the rates of the previous day; but on Thursday some English buyers came forward, and the sales embraced 4000 bales without further change in prices. Yesterday, however, the market was again quiet, and the sales were limited to 2000 bales, making the entire business of the week 19,000 bales, prices closing without further change.

The receipts of the week are 18,846 bales, against 26,418 bales for the corresponding period last year, and in the total receipts at this port the increase, compared with last year, is 235,731 bales.

THE BACHELOR AND THE BABY.

There was no one at home except the baby's mother, and baby, and I. Baby had just gone to sleep, when baby's mother remembered a trifling commission which she had promised to execute for me in the village. With an injunction to touch the cradle if baby woke, she departed, leaving me proud of my new employment, and lulled by past immunity into a state of fatal security.

With one eye on my book, and the other on the cradle, like a faithful watch-dog, I listened to the retreating footfall that should have warned me, but did not, "to look out for squalls." I had no idea of the awful responsibility which I had taken upon myself, or I should have shrunk from it, as a cat does from water, or a mastiff from a churning-machine. In fact, I rather suspect that I fell in a trifling degree ambitious that baby should open one eye—only one—that I might have the pleasure of shutting it again. Unwary mortal! How little do we know when we are well off! My ambition was but too soon to be gratified; I had yet to learn by bitter experience how weary is the lot of those who—tend no babies.

I wonder whether infants are conscious in their sleep of their mother's absence, and know that an opportunity has arrived for "cutting up their didoes!"

The baby, ever whose slumbers I had become the guardian genius—how the flies pitched into its nose!—was as sound asleep as any baby could be when its mother departed; but no sooner had her shadow faded from the room than symptoms of wakefulness began to appear. First came a sigh; then a chuckle, that said as plain as chuckle could say, "Now for some fun;" then one eye opened and shut, and then both began peeping about, till the head seemed inclined to bob off the pillow.

I felt a little nervous at these symptoms—only a little. "Psh!" said I to myself, "a roll or two of the cradle will soon settle your business, youngster."

But it did not. Baby was bound to have a spree. It knew that "its mother was out." That big, bothersome blue-bottled fly, too, tired of watching for the ship over the clock-face, started on a voyage of discovery on its own account, and the first promontory which it reached was the nose of the baby, a tempting spot, upon which it landed for refreshments, buzzing most villainously as it did so. It was a ticklish landing, however, and baby soon drove it off with a sneeze that astonished its nerves, and mine, too, more than the fly's; for the fly was accustomed to ticklish situations, which I was not. Baby was thoroughly roused. Up went its round, chubby arm; but a rock of the cradle soon sent that back to its place. I did rock that cradle beautifully. The little head rolled to and fro as easily as if it had been fastened on by a toy manufacturer's neck. I could not help admiring myself for the way in which I did it, and I am sure that any reasonable baby would have gone to sleep again, if only for compliment's sake; but the baby in the cradle didn't. The moment the rocking ceased, up popped the little head, like Judy's in the show, with a small peevish cry. That cry! it was like the "fizzing of the fuse" of a powder magazine, sure to end in an explosion.

Were you ever roused in the middle of the night by the maid-of-all-work coming in her slippers and night-cap to inform you that the house was on fire? Did you ever stand near a Dutchman who was weighing powder with a lighted cigar in his mouth? Did you ever stand over the boiler of a Mississippi steamboat, and expect every moment to be landed on the tree-tops half a mile inland? If not, you cannot conceive my horror when I heard that cry. I was in a cold perspiration from head to foot. I have no doubt that hail-stones as big as peas might have been picked off my forehead. I reached for dear life, and baby bounced about like a ball of Indian-rubber. But it was all useless. I sang all the songs that I could think of from the Cabalistic "hushahshy!" to "Cease, rude Boreas!" I tried tenor, and I tried base; but the baby did not know the difference. It seemed to think it all base. The louder I sang, the louder it cried. It was bawl and squall, and squall beat. The cry peevish boomed the cry indignant, and the cry indignant became the squall imperative. Blue-bottle buzzed with delight, and danced a hornpipe on the window, while the clock kept up a tantalizing "Go it! go it!"

In an unlucky moment, I lifted the little tempest out of the cradle. Never, never, never will I commit such an act of thoughtless impudence again! Before I did so, I could have truly sung with the poet, "The white squall raves;" but after the fiercest blasts of Boreas seemed blowing from that little throat.

In the hope of quieting the tornado, I took it in my arms, waddled it to and fro the room, turned him up and down till my shoulders ached; dandled it on my knees, now the right one, now the left; but nothing would do. Like an easterly gale, that multiplied squall seemed to be endless. I felt really alarmed. I was completely terrified. I saw visions of convulsions and such like ills that infant "flesh is heir to." If I had been in the city, I am sure that a crowd would have been collected. I might have been taken up and accused of an attempt to commit infanticide—perhaps been published in the papers as a wretch guilty of cruelty to dumb animals. Dumb! How I wished that the dear family organ had been dumb! I even envied the deaf man that pick up cinders.

I looked at the clock, and exclaimed, in despair, "When will the mother return?" and the clock answered, with mocking monotony, "Not yet! not yet!" Blue-bottle had ceased its buzzing, and returned to its old quarters over the dial-plate, to watch for the re appearance of the ship; perhaps asking, as impatiently as I did, the question, "When will she return?" while the clock continued to repeat, unceasingly, "Not yet! not yet!"

I knew not what to do, and rushed a dozen times to the door, hoping to see the coming relief. But the walls of the distant church and the houses beyond were thick, and I could not look through them. The brook was laughing in the sunshine, and murmuring joyously as it glided over the stones; and I felt a strong temptation to pop the piping part of the baby into it. I am sure the clock cried, mockingly, "Do it! do it!" But the thought of a Coroner's jury restrained me; a country jury of Dutch boors, with short pipes in their mouths, and skulls two layers of brick thick.

There was a rooster upon the fence, flapping his wings and crowing like a Trojan—I do believe it was over my perplexity; the pigs were grunting in their sty, pulling each other's ears for amusement; and a cow was giving nourishment to her calf in a distant field. Suddenly a bright idea struck me. I seized an old tobacco pipe that had been stowed away upon the mantle-piece, and immersing the bulb in a tumbler of water, thrust the stem into baby's mouth. Baby was no genius. I became satisfied of that in a minute. It is an attribute of genius to accomplish its desires with imperfect instruments. There was no stoppage in the pipe: I tried it myself.

I was at my wits' ends, and laid the baby on the floor, cramming my fingers into my ears. It was of no use. I could not shut out the sound. It was like a thousand "ear-piercing pipes" drilling me through and through. I was riddled with screams that touched like galvanic wires on every nerve. The clatter of a three story cotton-mill, with a hundred girls talking of new bonnets through the din, was nothing to it. All the locomotives in the Union, tortured into a state of agony, would alone compare with it. But mill and locomotive might be stopped and baby would not be quieted, even for a moment. Anything but a baby's lungs would have been worn out by such an exertion of power. But their strength only increased, seeming to acquire new pipes at every breath.

What would I not have given for the sight of a policeman bearing down to my relief! Never did Robinson Crusoe on his desert island gaze more longingly over the ocean in search of a sail than I did down the road for a bonnet and curls. I could have smiled lovingly on the fattest dowager that ever sweltered in the West Indies, or the thinnest scrub that pays her devotions to the door-steps. But the feminine, like other useful commodities, had all vanished when most wanted. Even the cat, accustomed to running as she was—even the cat, sensible creature, had disappeared.

Like the distressed hero of a novel, I was left to my own resources, and had no resources left. There was a baby flopping about on the floor like a porpoise on a ship's deck, as if lying on its beam-ends was a natural position. I righted it a dozen times, but over it went again, as if all its ballast had shifted to the head. I brought the shovel and tongs and the bellows from the fire-place, but baby wouldn't look at them, not a bit of it; although I took the trouble to blow the bellows in the blue-bottle's face, and sent the threads on the carpet flying about the room. Even the clothes-brush and nutmeg-grater proved no attraction, and I broke a suspender-button hopping about like a frog on all-fours. If I had stood on my head, and shook the pennies out of my pockets, it would have had no effect. Even a lump of sugar would not bribe it to be quiet. It made wry faces at the mirror, and pitched savagely into the pillow, turned indignantly from the tea-kettle, and squared off at the rolling-pin. If I had given it the carving-knife, I do verily believe that it would have cut off its own head, and made two squalls instead of one; but I forbore. Give me credit for my magnanimity—I forbore!

For nearly an mortal hour—an age—was I thus kept in a state of frenzy. My hairs stood up "like quills upon the fretful porcupine." They have always stubbornly refused to lie down smoothly since. If my trial had lasted much longer, I should certainly have had a "gray head upon my young shoulders." Perhaps I should have sunk into the grave with a nervous fever, and had "Died of baby-nursing" for an epitaph upon my tombstone. Fortunately for the public in general, and me in particular, I was spared such a catastrophe by the return of the mother, who burst pantingly into the room at the critical moment when my Job-like patience had miserably perished—by degrees, as the water leaks from a broken-hooped bucket. With what a feeling of relief did I look up at the old clock as it announced to me, in its most cheerful tones, "She's come! she's come!"

Would you believe it?—but I'm sure you can't, the fact seems too great an enormity—that little piece of perversity was as quiet as a lamb in a minute! Why, the mother was so deceived that she actually called it her "precious lamb!" I heard her, and was astounded! I wonder she didn't feel sheepish; I know I did. Lamb, indeed! If that was being a lamb, what would it be when it became mutton? Why, it was fast asleep again in no time, and laughing in its dreams over the fun it had enjoyed. Didn't I vow never to be caught alone with a baby again? If ever I am, may I be——served in the same manner again.

INTERESTING CHAPTER ON SNAKES.—A paper was lately read before the Boston Society of Natural History, from Dr. W. J. Burnett, on the character of the rattlesnake. This doctor had been experimenting on two or three specimens of this animal, and announces the discovery of numerous embryo poison fangs in the jaws of the snake, immediately behind the outward fangs. The use of these hidden weapons of destruction appears to be to supply the place of the bitlag fangs of the serpent when they get broken off or worn ont in service. It also appears that the long fangs (two in number) which are used in inflicting the deadly bite of the rattlesnake, are naturally shed every few years, when they are not injured by accident or wear, and the reserve fangs are sufficiently numerous to meet the worst emergencies. From minute microscopic examination of the structure of these teeth, Dr. B. concludes that there are two canals in each fang, only one of which conveys the poison to the wound. Respecting the character of the poison itself, the doctor remarks as follows:

"There is good reason for the belief that its action is the same upon all living things, vegetables as well as animals. It is even just as fatal to the snake itself, as to other animals, for Dr. Dearing informed me that one of his specimens, after being irritated and annoyed in its cage in moving suddenly, accidentally struck one of its fangs into his own body; it soon rolled over and died, as any other animal would have done. Here then, we have the remarkable, and perhaps unique philosophical fact, of a liquid secreted directly from the blood, which proves deadly when introduced into the very source (the blood) from which it was derived!"

In order to scrutinize by the aid of the microscope the operation of this deadly agent on the blood, Dr. Burnett stupified one of the fiercest of his snakes by dropping chloroform on his head:

"Twenty-five or thirty drops being allowed to fall on his head, one slowly after the other, the sound of his rattle gradually died away, and in a few minutes he was wholly under this agent. He was then adroitly seized behind the jaws with the thumb and fore-finger, and dragged from the cage, and allowed to partially resuscitate; in this state a second person held his tail to prevent his coiling around the arm of the first, while a third opened his mouth, and with a pair of forceps pressed the fang upward, causing a flow of poison which was received on the end of the scalpel. The snake was then returned into the cage.

"Blood was then extracted from a finger, for close microscopical examination. The smallest quantity of the poison being presented to the blood between the glasses, a change was immediately perceived—the corpuscles ceased to run end pile together, and remained stagnant without any special alternation of structure. The whole appearance was as though the vitality of the blood had been suddenly destroyed, exactly as in death from lightning. This agrees also with another experiment performed on a fowl, where the whole mass of the blood appeared quite liquid, and having but little coagulable power."

Dr. Burnett is of the opinion that the physiological action of the poison of the rattlesnake in animals is that of a most powerful sedative, acting through the blood on the nervous centres. He supports this position by the remarkable fact that its full and complete antidotes are the most active stimulants; and of these, alcohol (commonly in the form of rum or whisky) is the first. This remedy is well known in the South, and there are some twenty-five authentic cases on record proving that a person suffering from the bite of a rattlesnake may drink from one to two quarts of clear brandy without feeling the slightest tendency to intoxication, and eventually recover. THE NEW MEMBER.—A year or two since, a Mr. B—— was elected to represent the town of Shelburne, New Hampshire, in the Legislature. He was a plain old farmer, full of sound sense, and ready for any real work that was needed. When he made his appearance at the State House, it must be confessed that his tout ensemble was anything but fashionable. His hat was a perfect relic of antiquity—his coerse frock and trowsers of genuine dapple-gray homespun—his shirt bosom the product of his wife's own loom, and his boots of the thickest and most substantial cow-hide.

As Mr. B—— entered the lobby, there were several young "members" standing about the fire, and supposing the new-comer to be only a visitor, they merely cast a glance at his weather-browned face, turned up their noses at his verdant look, and then continued their conversation. B—— took a seat near the stove.

"No room here for visitors," said one of the flippants.

"O, I'm a member"

"You a member?" uttered the first speaker.

"Sartain," responded B——, in a mild tone.

"Where from?"

"Shelburne."

"Well," said a fashionably-dressed "member," with a disdainful look at the rough, coarse dress of the farmer, "haven't the folks of Shelburne got any body else to send here?"

"O, as for that matter," returned Mr. B——, with perfect good nature, "I s'pose there's a good many men there that knows more'n I do, but they havn't any of 'em got any clothes that's fit to wear!"

The fledglings were floored, and before the session closed they found that the "member from Shelburne" could see through a question as far as they could see around it. [New York Spirit of the Times.

SOMETHING COMICAL.—The following circumstance happened in one of the towns of Arkansas: A man had been drinking until a late hour at night, before he started for home. All honest folks had long been in bed, and the houses were shut and dark. The liquor he had taken was too much for him; he did not know where to go. He at last staggered into an empty wagon-shed and fell upon the ground. For a long time he lay in the unconsciousness of a drunken sleep, and would have undoubtedly frozen, (for the snow on the ground showed the night to be very cold) had not others less insensible than himself been around him. This shed was a favorite rendezvous for the hogs, which rushed out when the new comer arrived, but soon returned to their beds. In the utmost kindness, and with the truest hospitality, they gave their biped companion the middle of the bed, some lying on either side of him, and others acting the part of the quilt. Their warmth prevented him from being injured by the exposure. Towards morning he awoke; finding himself comfortable, and in blissful ignorance of his whereabouts, he supposed himself enjoying the accommodations of a tavern, in company with other gentlemen. He reached out his hand, and catching hold of the stiff bristles of a hog, exclaimed—"Why, mister, when did you shave last?"

THE SHIPWRECKED SAILORS OF THE GOLDEN LIGHT.—It will be remembered that, some two months ago, the ship Golden Light, from this port for California, was struck by lightning and burnt, when only a few days out, and that her passengers and crew took to the boats, four in number. Those in two of the boats were picked up by a vessel and brought to this port, and afterwards a third boat, with seven of the crew on board, succeeded in reaching Antigua, one of the West India Islands. Five of these latter reached this city last night, in the ship Sarah, from St. Thomas, having been forwarded by the U. S. Consul there.

From the lips of one of the shipwrecked men, we learn the history of their deliverance from death. Before the four boats left the burning ship, they all having been provisioned and supplied with a barrel of water, the captain gave them certain instructions as to their course. The sailors of whom we speak were in a whale boat, which was one of three sent out in the ship as freight. After starting from the ship they soon fell to leeward of the other boats and lost sight of them, the fourth boat, which is still missing, being the last one they saw. They tried to speak her, but could not make themselves heard. Finding themselves alone upon the ocean in a frail boat, they put it before the wind, with many misgivings as to their fate. Among them was a young Yankee boy, but ill prepared for such hardships as he was about to undergo. He had saved from the wreck his little and his mother's miniature, and he often occupied the weary hours of suffering by reading the former. Continued vigilence was necessary to keep the boat from swamping, and the boy in question calmly performed his allotted share of duty, his conduct being in this respect a striking contrast to that of two Portuguese sailors, who, with loud outcries and lamentations, declared that there was no hope, and spent most of the time in tears. Several times great waves filled their little boat with water, and it seemed as if they must go down, but by active exertions they bailed it out and pressed forward for the land. They had no compass, and steered by the sun in day time and the stars at night. The salt water had spoiled their food, and they found to their dismay that their precious barrel of water had half leaked out.

After this discovery they were put on short allowance of water, and their sufferings from thirst were very great, so much so, that they could eat but little, as it increased their desire for water. They were fearful that each would rob the barrel during the sleep of the others, and this, with their inconvenient position, nud the continued call upon them for active exertion, prevented them from taking much repose. When they left the ship they had a large sail which they put up in stormy weather. Twice vessels came across their track. In one case the vessel, a schooner, came within a half mile, and their hopes of deliverance rose high; but notwithstanding their signals, she put about and was soon out of sight; to them a most bitter disappointment, for they feared that they should never be able to reach the land.

At length, after running before the wind for seven or eight days, they were of opinion that they were near some of the West India Islands, and accordingly put about and continued to beat for two or three days longer. Finally, after having been in the boat for nearly eleven days, they came in sight of land, which proved to be Willow's Bay, Antigua, where they were hospitably received, and forwarded to St. Thomas.

The fourth boat which is still missing, contained some seven or eight of the ship's crew, among whom were several boys. They were well provided with provisions and instruments, and the boat was a good one. It is possible that may have been picked up by some outward-bound vessel. [Boston Traveller.

HORSE-HAIR SNAKES.—Concerning these sinuous and attenuated entities, Dr. Gideon H. Smith addresses the following communication to the Baltimore Patriot;

"I would suggest to the editors of Baltimore a very simple plan for straining all their hydrant water, which, at this season of the year, is a matter of some importance to delicate palates. Take about a quarter of a yard square of good fine flannel, and tie it firmly over the mouth of the hydrant spout, leaving a small sack or bag, of the size of a goose-egg, in the centre of the flannel. The water fixed his hydrant in this way, and it proves perfectly effectual. At this time the little horse-hair snake or eel is very abundant in all the streams and pools of water, and frequently makes its appearance in the hydrant water, and the above plan will certainly catch it. This little reptile is believed to be perfectly harmless. It is generally supposed to be produced from horse-hair that has fallen into the water. This is of course a ridiculous common error. It is, like all other organized beings, animal or vegetable, a regular organized animal, propagated by its own kind. Its scientific name is gordius aquitacus. At the present time, and for a few weeks to come, it appears nearly white, or like a thread of gloss or white horse-hair, only a little longer. It is very active, swimming about rapidly. It has probably just cast off its old skin. In a week or two it will be a dark brown or nearly black, somewhat like a piece of dark colored horse-hair, from two or three to five or six inches long. I have had several of these reptiles brought to me lately, and many inquiries made respecting them. The above plan will effectually prevent their being swallowed. All pools and streams of water in the Middle and Southern States are equally inhabited by them."

THE NEWSPAPER—Eloquent Extract.—The following extract is taken from a sermon delivered by the Rev. Dr. Adams, of New York:

"Why is anything made public, but the belief that it will be of interest to others? Why is it announced that Isaac and Rebecca were married on a certain day last week, but on the supposition that it will give you pleasure to know it? And then lower down the sheet, under the startling head of deaths, your eyes run along always with apprehension lest it fall on some well known name, and reads that the aged father, the young child, the beloved wife, the rich, the poor, the admired, the honored, the beautiful are gone; and is it not taken for granted that even strangers will have a sigh for the afflicted, and the world respond in sympathy to the incursions of a common foe.

"Read in this light, the commonest advertisements which crown our papers have a kindly order about them. Say not, with a cynic as though you were doubtful whether there was any thing honest in the world, when a store keeper advertises his wares, that it is all sheer selfishness, for it is pleasant to announce a fresh supply of tallow and wool, hardware or muslins, is it not just as pleasant for one who wishes to know it. When a brace of young partners in trade insert their virgin advertisement, informing the world how happy they shall be to wait on customers, can you read it without entering into their career?

"Business advertisements! Waste paper! You know not what you say. Those ships are to sail for every harbor in the world, those fabrics which have arrived from every commercial mart on the earth, this iron from Russia, tea from China, cotton from Georgia, sugar from Louisiana—do they not preach to us at the corner of the streets, at the entering of the gates, in our docks, and in our custom-houses and exchanges, sermons on the mutual dependence of mankind?"

THE ERICSSON.—The New York Tribune says: "This ship is now lying at her dock in Williamsburgh, just above the Grand street ferry. Important alterations are going on in her machinery at Hogg & Delamater's foundry, which the owners are confident will considerably increase her speed. She is to be ready to sail for London, on her first passenger trip, soon after the 1st of July, at which time the improvements now going on will be completed, and she will be in order throughout. Capt. Ericsson and some of the principal owners will go out in her to Europe. She can accommodate about two hundred passengers. The ship is now open to public inspection.

Kossuth's friends in London have resolved to prosecute the London Times for charging him with being implicated in the affair of the rocket factory. Kossuth declares that while residing in England he was not engaged in any conspiracy against Austria, nor in procuring arms to revive hostilities in Hungary, as he depends upon Hungary itself for organization, men, arms, etc., when the proper time shall arrive. The whole fuss made by the Times seems to have been a flash in the pan, and nobody hurt.

INTERESTING STATISTICS.—An article in a late number of the New York Post presents the following very interesting statistics, compiled from an appendix to a report of the Secretary of the Treasury to the U. S. Senate, on the Colonial and Bake trade of the United States:

Our average imports from 1821 to 1826, specie included, were $80,878,348; from 1848 to 1852 they were $181,966,570, showing that they have more than doubled in thirty years. Our average imports from 1821 to 1826 were $69,430,585, and from 1848 to 1852, $175,943,360. In 1821 the tonnage of the United States was only 1,298,958 tons; in 1852 it was 4,138,441 tons, showing that it has more than trebled in thirty years. Next to Great Britain, we have a larger tonnage than any other nation in the world, and in five years, at the present rate of increase, we shall surpass Great Britain.

The value of our annual products exceeds three thousand millions of dollars, of which only about $170,000,000 are sent abroad, leaving 2,830,000,000 to be consumed at home and interchanged among the States. At least $600,000,000 is thus interchanged between the States of the Union.

The total debt of the several States in 1851 was $201,541,624, which was less by some millions than it had been during the previous ten years. The value of property assessed in the same States was $5,083,149,407, the real value being, however, $1,068,157,770—a pretty good security, we think, for their debts, whether owing at home or abroad.

The total population of the villages, towns, and cities of the United States is only 4,000,000, while the rural population, "the honest peasantry, their country's pride," is 19,263,000. The four cities of New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and Baltimore contain a population of 1,214,000, the amount of whose real and personal property is $702,000,000, or $578 each. The property of the rural population is $2,312,000,000, or about $120 each.

From returns from the agricultural crops it appears that we raise annually $143,000,000 in wheat, $391,200,000 in Indian corn, $190,275,000 in hay, $70,840,000 in oats, $73,125,000 in Irish potatoes, and $120,000,000 in cotton; the whole crop being $1,752,583,042.

The animals slaughtered are worth quite as much as the cotton, bringing some $183,000,000 per annum. One of the most useful of our crops—wine—is yet in its infancy, the West having made only a little over $1,000,000 of gallons in 1851, worth about $500,000; but the cultivation is increasing, and in a few years will be immense, especially when New Mexico and California, which are admirably adapted to it, shall go into the business.

No portion of the trade of the Union has grown more rapidly within a few years than that connected with the steam marine. The total number of steam-vessels now employed on our coast is 625, with a tonnage of 212,500, and employing 11,770 men as officers and crew. In the interior the number of steam-vessels is 765, with a tonnage of 204,725, and employing 17,007 men.

Our whole steam marine, therefore, amounts to 1390 vessels, with a tonnage of 417,226, manned by 29,337 men, and carrying, besides freight, about 40,000,000 of passengers every year. In this vast travel, only 750 lives were lost in 1852—far too many, but not so many as some people, who fancy every steamboat a powder-house, are prepared to expect.

The amount of money paid into the Treasury of the United States, as duties on foreign goods, in the year 1852, was at New York $28,772,558; at Philadelphia, $3,715,126; at Boston, $0,250,588; and at Baltimore, $1,063,530. It will be seen that New York more than trebles all the other cities.

There are 12,808 miles of railroad in operation in the United States, and 12,612 in progress—more than in all the rest of the world.

FOREIGN DRY GOODS.—We annex our customary monthly tables, showing the importations of foreign dry goods into this port during the month of April, 1850, '51, '52 and '53. It will be seen that the importions for the present year largely exceed any former period, being no less than $30,751,923 during the last four months, against $19,839,177 for the corresponding period last year, and $4,780,831 for the past month, against $2,582,408 in April, 1852.

It will be seen that the increase is greatest in silk goods, being more than 100 per cent. on the importations of April last. The importation of woolen goods for the month, exceeds that of last year 100 per cent.; cotton goods, more than 50 per cent.; flax, 30 per cent.

These statements will strike many of our readers with surprise, as showing the enormous outlay by our people for the more cost-ly manufactures of England and the Continent. We are no longer contented with fine cotton goods, delaines, and other manufactures, which, in bygone years, were thought good enough for consumption among the States. These official tables exhibit no less than eleven millions of dollars' worth of silks alone brought into our port during the last four months. Seven millione and upwards in woolen goods; over six millions in cottons, and a general aggregate of more than thirty millions in value.

This, be it remembered, when money has been in active demand at nine to eighteen per cent. per annum, for weeks in succession, on the best paper that could be produced. The Dry goods business during the present season has been more active then at any former period, and the market is nearly bare of the various descriptions of French and British goods, the prices of which are fully sustained.

The amount of duties collected at this port is very large for the present month. The Sub-Treasury at New York holds upwards of six million eight hundred thousand dollars, and the whole sum on deposit at the various offices, at the last official report, was above Eighteen Millions of Dollers.

The receipts of duties at this port alone for the quarter ending March 31 were $28,623,965, against $22,227,197 for the same period of last year. We republish the summary of duties for each quarter of the year, viz:

Quarter ending	1851-2	1852-3.
September 30	9,444,661	10,467,718
December 31.....	5,045,600	6,913,896
March 31.....	7,736,936	11,243,351
	$22,227,191	$28,623,965
June 30, estimated ..	6,683,336	9,713,000
Total $28 910,527		$38,336,965

We think the results of the current quarter will fully confirm our estimate as above stated. Sufficient is however shown to explain why money has been scarce in our market.

There is a constant tendency to overtrading. It is very clear that the increase in our foreign importations is more than commensurate with the growth of population and growth of capital, and that more caution must be observed in order to maintain more soundness in our business affairs.

ARRIVAL OF THE COMET—The quickest trip on record from San Francisco.—Our shipping merchants were taken all aback on Saturday afternoon by the announcement of the arrival of the clipper-ship Comet, Capt. Gardner, after a most extraordinary run of eighty-three days and eighteen hours from St. Francisco to this port. This favorite ship anchored in the North River, near Castle Garden, and yesterday morning crowds of people assembled on the Battery to look at the vessel which had made the quickest trip to New York from California, a distance of seventeen thousand miles. The Comet was twelve days from San Francisco to the Line on the Pacific side; she then encountered a succession of head winds from Cape Horn to the Equator; she did not lay her course for twenty-one days, and was fifteen days from the Equator on the Atlantic side. Her passage has indeed been a wonderful one, and she now stands at the head of the list, unequaled, we believe, in her performance by any vessel afloat. The ship Alex. Coffin, it will be remembered, some time ago, made the voyage from San Francisco in ninety days. [N. Y. Evening Post, May 9.

AN OYSTER CATCHING A MOUSE.—In Allentown, Pa., one evening last week, the proprietor of a restaurant left a few oysters standing in a basin on the floor; from the heat of the room they partially opened; during the night it appeared a mouse undertook to creep in between the shell, when the oyster fastened on the mouse and made it a victim. In the morning the oyster was picked up with the mouse tightly pressed between its shell.

SIAMESE TWINS.—A landlord in Boston, before receiving the Siamese Twins as guests, remarked that he supposed they would both wish to occupy the same room. On being informed, that, of course, such would be the case, he regretted that he could not accommodate them, as he had no room with two beds.

NOW READY,

THE FIRST RE-PUBLICATION OF THE

COMPLETE WORKS OF ARMINIUS.

DERBY & MILLER, Auburn, New York, have now ready the Works of JAMES ARMINIUS, M. D., formerly Professor of Divinity in the University of Leyden, the first two volumes translated from the Latin, by James Nichols; and the third volume, by Rev. W. R. Bagnall, M. A., of the New England Conference. It may not be generally known that only two of the three volumes of the Works of Arminius have ever been published in the English language, viz: the edition published in 1825, by James Nichols, London, the third volume never having been translated, or if it was, never re-published. It remains for an American translator to render the third volume into English, and for an American Publishing House to first offer in the English tongue the complete Works of the Great Expounder of the Arminian System. The competency of the American translator for his task is vouched for by those who know him best, and who are well and favorably known by the literary and religious public.

[Letters of Recommendation and Encouragement from the Bishops and other Distinguished Divines of the M. E. Church:]

FROM VENERABLE BISHOP HEDDING, (since deceased.)

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 30, 1851.

Messrs. Derby & Miller:—Gentlemen—I have received yours of the 20th instant. I am too sick to write, and have to get a brother to write this. I am unable to go around and get subscribers; but am of opinion that the re-publication of the Works of James Arminius is needed in this country. I think many of the ministers of the Gospel would take it. I will take one copy if it is delivered here. Yours, ELIJAH HEDDING.

FROM BISHOP WAUGH.

BALTIMORE, January 2, 1852.

Gentlemen—Your prospectus of the "first re-publication of the complete Works of Arminius," now lies before me. I hope your success in procuring subscribers will fully justify you in the heavy outlay required to publish this first American edition. I shall be glad to see the Works of this renowned polemic in general circulation, believing that they will very much contribute to dissipate many misconceptions respecting the sentiments of this celebrated Divine, and also add a most valuable collection of treatises to our theological literature. B. WAUGH.

FROM BISHOP MORRIS.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 30, 1851.

Gentlemen:—Having no experience in publishing or selling such Works, I am not prepared to express a reliable opinion; but my opinion is that an American edition of the complete Works of Dr. Arminius, properly gotten up, would sell well in the Western States. For myself, I should be glad to see it tried, if you judge the prospects of success justify the enterprise. Yesterday, I presented your prospectus to such brethren as I had time to see, and now return it to you with eight names, including my own, for a copy each—all Methodist ministers. There are others here who will probably patronize the work, and I presume the circulation of it will not be confined to Methodist preachers. Yours, respectfully, T. A. MORRIS.

FROM BISHOP HAMLINE.

SCHENECTADY, Jan. 8, 1852.

Messrs. Derby & Miller:—I am gratified at the prospects of a re-publication of the complete Works of James Arminius.

"The Life and Times of Arminius," an article which appeared in the Lib. Rep., from the pen of Prof. Stuart, some twenty years ago, awakened in me a greater desire to have access to those sources of information, by which his views of the Leyden Divine were so remarkably modified. Since then it has been my opinion that the state of theological literature, and of the American churches, calls for this re-publication. I trust you may find ample encouragement to proceed with the enterprise.

Respectfully, L. L. HAMLINE.

FROM BISHOP JANES.

BOSTON, May 28, 1852.

Messrs. Derby & Miller:—Gentlemen—Your circular, proposing to publish the Works of James Arminius, D. D., is before me. I approve of the proposition. I am personally acquainted with the Rev. W. R. Bagnall, M. A., the translator of the last volume. I have full confidence in his ability and integrity as a translator. I believe the re-publication of the Works of that eminent Divine will greatly subserve the cause of Christian truth.

Respectfully, yours, EDMUND S. JANES.

FROM BISHOP ANDREW.

OXFORD, (GA.) May 12, 1852.

Gentlemen:—Some years ago I met with an English edition of the Works of Arminius, which I was sorry never to examine. It was the only copy I had ever seen, and I have not since met with another. I have often wondered that no American publisher had attempted the publication of the Works of the great Leyden Theologian. I am glad you are about to supply the deficiency. I hope you will succeed and be amply sustained. Many erroneous and crude notions, as to what is properly Arminianism, would be corrected; and many important and scriptural truths clearly and forcibly illustrated by the study of the Works of the illustrious Protestant of Leyden.

Yours, respectfully, JAMES O. ANDREW.

FROM REV. DR. M'CLINTOCK, (Editor of the Methodist Quarterly Review.)

NEW YORK, Jan. 8, 1852.

Messrs. Derby & Miller:—Absence from the city has prevented me from replying at an earlier period to your letter of the 20th ultimo.

I am heartily glad that you propose to complete the translation of Arminius' Works, and to publish the same. In so doing you will supply a want which has long been felt, not merely by the Methodist ministers of this country, but also by those of other religious denominations. Unless I am greatly mistaken, your enterprise in undertaking the Work will be promptly and amply met by the theological public. Yours, etc., JOHN M'CLINTOCK.

FROM REV. DR. TEFFT, (President Genesee College.)

LIMA, Dec. 21, 1851.

My Dear Sir:—There can be no doubt, it seems to me, that a well executed, uniform edition of the Works of Arminius is a desideratum at this time: and I have no doubt that you will find such an edition profitable in a pecuniary point of view. You will receive, of course, the patronage of the Methodist Episcopal Church, whose theology agrees so nearly with that of the great Dutchman, as well as of the other denominations, who, whatever their religious opinions, are not fully read in theology without some knowledge of the writings of that illustrious Divine. I hope you will go on and publish.

Most respectfully yours, B. F. TEFFT.

FROM REV. DR. DURBIN.

PHILADELPHIA, Jan. 15, 1852.

Gentlemen:—Your favor of Dec. 20, was addressed to me while I was west of the Mountains. Upon returning I have it before me. It gives me great pleasure to subscribe for a copy of the complete Works of James Arminius, D. D., which you propose to publish. I commend the Work to the notice and favorable consideration of all ministers who wish to have access to the fountain of Arminian theology, than which none finds much general and hearty approval in the Christian world. You will confer a great favor upon the Christian public by issuing a good edition of the complete Works of Arminius.

Very respectfully, J. P. DURBIN.

☞ Religious Newspapers giving the above one insertion will be entitled to a copy of the Work. my21 1t.

Why then should Christians not unite!

VOCAL MUSIC.

In creating man the Almighty gave him not only speech, but also a distinct organ, the voice—that by its union with the former it might be able to express his feelings of every kind. The human voice, therefore, is not an instrument made by man, but an organ bestowed on us immediately by God, and therefore it possesses greater perfection, a greater charm, than any other instrument. All the musical instruments successively invented are but faint imitations of this first instrument of God's own creation, and they are considered the more perfect the nearer they approach to human song, and the more like it their tones appear to be. Owing to the wonderful property of human song, the capability of uttering the synonymous word at the same time with the tone, the song of man is the most inimitable, the grandest expression—an expression which art can never attain—of our feelings, sensations, and ideas, as also the most worthy and best adapted for the praise and adoration of the Supreme Being, to which end more especially this noble gift was no doubt bestowed by God. The most ancient history, in treating of the earliest ages of mankind to which it extends, has recorded a great number of instances in which the human voice agreeably to Divine inspiration, sang lofty hymns, particularly in the persons of David, Paul, and others, in the manifestation of the greatness of God, and in prayer and thanksgiving for his blessings. Seventeen hundred years before Christ, Jacob, the son of Isaac, sang in the spirit of prophecy, the future fortunes of the tribes of Israel. Fifteen hundred years before Christ, Moses and his sister Miriam, the prophetess, sang the praises of the Lord, on account of the fortunate passage through the Red Sea, effected by means of a Divine miracle. Deborah, the prophetess, and Barak, the son of Abinoam, sang twelve hundred years before Christ, a noble and sublime song, after the destruction of the army of the Canaanites. One thousand years before Christ David composed and sang his exquisite Psalms, in which he exhorts, in the most forcible and inspired manner, to the singing of the glory of God. Thus:

Psalms xxxiii: 2. Praise the Lord with harp; sing unto him with the psaltery, and an instrument of ten strings. V: 3. Sing unto him a new song, play skilfully with a loud noise.

Psalms lxxxi: 2-5. Take a psalm, and bring hither timbrel, the pleasant harp with the psaltery. Blow upon the trumpet in the new moon, in the time appointed on our solemn feast-day. For this was a statute for Israel, and a law of the God of Jacob. This he ordained in Joseph for a testimony, when he went out through the land of Egypt, where I heard a language that I understood not.

Psalms cxlix: 1. Praise ye the Lord, sing unto the Lord a new song, and his praise in the congregation of saints. V: 3. Let them praise his name in the dance; let them sing praises unto him with the timbrel and harp.

Paul also exhorts to the same effect in Ephes. v: 19: Speaking to yourselves in psalms, and hyms, and spiritual songs, singing and making melody in your heart to the Lord.

That nothing is better adapted than singing, to praise and to glorify in the worthiest manner our Father in heaven, is clearly intimated in the preceding passages. Nay, we learn from Holy Writ that the noblest employment of purified beings, in a higher state of existence, is to praise and to extol in inspired hymns, the omnipotence of the Most High.

Revelation of St. John, v: 8. And when he had taken the book, the four beasts, and four-and-twenty elders fell down before the Lamb, having every one of them harps, and golden vials full of odors, which are the prayers of saints. V: 9. And they sung a new song, saying, "Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals therein, etc.

Thus also in Rev. xiv: 1. And I looked, and lo, a Lamb stood on Mount Sion, and with him an hundred forty-and-four thousand, having his father's name written in their foreheads. V: 2. And I heard a voice from heaven as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of a great thunder, and I heard the voice of harpers harping with their harps.

V: 3. And they sung as it were a new song before the throne, and before the four beasts, and the elders, and no man could learn that song but the hundred and forty-and-four thousand, which were redeemed from the earth.

How sacred then does song appear! What a blessing to man is its possession, as it gives us already here upon earth a foretaste of heaven! If, by means of this faculty, we are enabled to express our feelings towards the Creator in the noblest and sublimest manner, so also we must be enabled by it to communicate them most completely to our fellow-creatures.

RECOLLECTIONS of JOHN WESLEY.

From a foreign exchange we clip the following extract from a brief memoir of the late William Hone. It is interesting in itself, and conveys a warning lesson parents and guardians would do well to meditate on. How sadly has their abuse of an earnest form of Christianity, in the presence of their children, operated upon them when those same children come in contact with its professors! The memoir says:

The account he (William Hone) at different times gave me of his conversion began with that of his early unbelief, and the causes of it. His father was an Independent Dissenter, and brought him up very strictly, unfortunately too strictly—the ordinary pennies for a slight fault being to get by heart a chapter in the Bible. On one occasion, being sent to get his task, sitting on the garret stairs, he threw the book from him down the whole flight saying, "When I am my own master I will never open you. "And alas!" said he, "I kept my word but too well, for thirty years I never looked into it."

"My father and his friends," said he, were in the habit of speaking much and bitterly of John Wesley. They frequently called him a child of the devil; I had a most terrific idea of this child of the devil. Being under six years old, I went to a dame school to learn my book, and be out of harm's way; my dame was a very staid and pious old woman, she was very fond of me, and I was always good with her, though naughty enough at home. She lived in one room, a large underground kitchen—we went down a flight of steps to it. Her bed was always neatly turned up in one corner. There was a large kitchen grate, and in cold weather always a good fire in it, by which she sat, in an old carved wooden arm chair, with a small round table before her, on which lay a large Bible open, on one side, and on the other a birch rod. Of the Bible she made great use, of the rod very little; but with fear we always looked upon it. There, on low wooden benches, books in hand, sat her little scholars. We all loved her, I most of all, and I was often allowed to sit on a little stool by her side. I was happier there than anywhere; I think I see her now, that placid old face, with her white hair turned up over a high cushion, and a clean neat cap on the top of it—all so clean, so tidy, so peaceful. I was happy there.

"One morning I was told I was not to go to school; I was miserable, naughty, disagreeable, cried to go to my dame, it was a dark day to me. The next day I got up hoping to go to school, but no, I might not, and then they told me she was ill, and then I cried the more from grief: it was my first sorrow. That day, too, passed in tears, and I cried myself to sleep. Next morning everybody was so tired of me that the servant was told to take me to her. As we approached the house, all was so still, it gave me an awful feeling that all was not right; the kitchen door was shut, the servant tapped, and a girl opened it, no scholars, no beaches, the bed let down and curtained, the little round table covered with a clean white cloth, and on it something unintelligible, covered up with another. 'Here is master William, he would come,' said my bearer, and a low hollow voice from the bed said, 'Let him stay, he will be good.' There lay my dame, how altered! Death on her face, but I loved her all the same. My little chair was placed near her bolster, and I sat down in silence.

"Presently she said to the maid, 'Is he coming?' The maid went to the window and said 'No.' Again the same question and the same answer. Who could it be? I wondered in silence, and felt overawed. At last there was a double knock at the house door above, and the maid said joyfully, 'O, madam, Mr. Wesley is come!' Then I was to see this child of the devil! I crept to the window, I could only see a pair of black legs with great silver buckles; the door was opened, steps came down the kitchen stairs, each step increasing my terror: I saw the black legs, then came in a venerable old man, with as it seemed to me the countenance of an angel, shining silver hair waving on his shoulders, with a beautiful, fair, and fresh complexion, and the sweetest smile! This, then, was the child of the devil! He went up to the bed—I trembled for my poor dame, but he took her hand and spoke so kindly to her, and my dame seemed so glad! He looked at me and said something. She said, 'He is a good boy; he will be quite quiet.' After much talk he uncovered the table, and I saw the bread and wine, as I had often seen it at my father's chapel, and then he knelt down and prayed. I do not say I prayed, but I was awfully impressed, and quite still. After it was over he turned to me, laid his hand on my head, and said, 'God bless you, my child, and make you a good man.' Was this a child of the devil? I never saw Mr. Wesley again. My dame died, but from that hour I never believed any thing my father said, or any thing I heard at chapel. I felt, though I could not have expressed it, how wicked such enmity was between Christians, and so I lost all confidence in my good father, and in all his religious friends, and so in all religion."

PREACHING HOLINESS.

Brother McTyeire:—Enclosed you will find a letter addressed to me by Rev. T. H. P. Scales, of the Alabama Conference, who died April 2, 1853. I think there is too much that is instructive in it to throw it away. Brother Scales had for years professed to enjoy the blessing of sanctification. This doctrine has been a favorite one with him, and he has often preached upon it to the edification and comfort of many. It is useless to speak of the virtues of our deceased brother. His example has been long observed by a large portion of our Church in Alabama. It cannot soon be forgotten.

He died full of faith and the Holy Ghost, giving his testimony to the truth of the doctrine which he so much loved. May we, who are younger in the ministry, be enabled to follow on to know and to realize the perfect love of God, so that we may be the better qualified to become instructors in righteousness.

Montgomery, Ala. C. D. Oliver.

Talladega, Ala., Jan. 13, '53.

Brother Oliver:—Sir:—In noticing the list of appointments I discover that you have returned to the same charge. I hope you may have a prosperous year in Montgomery, and that you may be abundantly blessed in your work, and that your own soul may prosper abundantly in the divine life. You know that those who feed others, should be fed themselves. Strength cannot be imparted to others through us unless we are greatly strengthened ourselves. And if we successfully preach the doctrine of Holiness, (and the Bible knows nothing short of this,) we must be holy ourselves.

You know that the system of salvation is in itself pure, and its claims upon us cannot be met unless we who claim to be subjects of that system possess a corresponding spirit. You know, too, there is a capital error among some ministers of the Gospel, and others, lay members in our Church, who contend that the work of entire sanctification, Christian perfection or Holiness, is perfect and complete in regeneration, and that all that is said in the Holy Scriptures in reference to this great work of finished salvation, relates to the new birth of regeneration.

This to my mind seems to be quite a blunder in theology, and I fear is, fraught with much mischief, and will result in serious consequences to the Church and the cause of God in general. It wholly sets aside many very plain and pointed passages of Scripture, which are addressed to the Church, to those who have been regenerated, or born of the Spirit. Many indeed I might now quote to you were it necessary, but I am sure that you know them. "Leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ, go on to perfection," "Grow in grace," "Be ye Holy," "Be ye perfect." A hundred such passages might be collated from the Holy Scriptures. And, again, it is obvious that this is the grand and ultimate design of the system of salvation, to save men from all sin in this life, and to preserve them in that state, blameless, unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ.

We are "sanctified by faith," as well as justified by faith. Again, wherefore the necessity of all the precepts in the Bible to the justified, to go on to perfection, etc., if they were already made "perfect in love?" And if wholly sanctified in regeneration, why does the Apostle pray to the Head of the Church to sanctify her wholly, etc.? Moreover, the advocates of that heretical system not only set aside wholly the divine authority and teaching on that subject, but also greatly dishonor our most prominent standard writers and works on that subject. I might name here a Wesley, Clarke, Fletcher, Watson, and a host of others. And, again, what is done with the ordination vows on this subject? How are they respected?

It is one of the most prominent articles of our creed, that of Christian perfection. That is regarded as a subsequent work, to be wrought in the soul, to that of regeneration or justification.

Our ministers formally taught and enforced the positive necessity of going on to perfection, and to make it a point or end to be secured in Christian experience, first justified, then to be sanctified wholly, or to be made perfect in love. The Holy Spirit accomplishes that work in the soul of the believer, and then testifies in reference to that work. As in justification, so in sanctification: "sanctified by faith that is in Christ Jesus." What might we not expect to witness in the displays of mercy and and divine power, in the sanctification of the Church, and in the conversion of the ungodly and irreligious? The Church would soon put on her beautiful garments, made white and clean in the blood of the Lamb. She would then "be as terrible as an army with banners," and "righteousness would go forth as a lamp that burneth."

May the Lord abundantly bless you, my Brother, in the proclamation to the Church of this pure Bible doctrine. I trust that you have witnessed in your experience all that I have said on the subject of personal holiness. I have taken much greater latitude on this subject, in penning you a few thoughts, than I anticipated. It is a theme upon which I delight to dwell, and I am assured you will at least appreciate my motive.

Thomas H. P. Scales.

PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

[Correspondence of the Advocate.]

Paris, April 28, 1853.

Our annual meetings or religious anniversaries are just over. We cannot call them this year May meetings, since they have all been held in April, because the rule is here to hold them, not as in England in the beginning of May, but three weeks after Easter, so that when Easter falls in March, the annual meetings are in April. As I have already given last year at sufficient length the names of, and objects aimed at by, our various Paris Societies, (see numbers 72 and 76 of the Advocate) I shall not enter into my details this time, but simply state a few facts and signs of prosperity.

I. THE COLONY OF ST. FAY,

Established for the regeneration of youths and children whom the Government detains, until they are of age, in a house of correction, because they have been guilty of some offence, has received an increase of 23 new inmates during the year. But some having left, the number of colonists is only 71, namely, 36 convicted children and youths, 26 vicious children, and 9 girls. A Catholic inspector having just visited some 50 similar establishments, placed under the direction of the Romish Church, was pleased with none so much as with that of St. Fay. Receipts $7838, expenses $7882. The deficiency, including a few debts, which must be paid very soon, amounts to $1743.

II. THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY

Is in a state of great prosperity. The distribution of tracts has again exceeded one million copies this year, and the Government has given without any difficulty to every one of the publications of the Society the stamp which they require in order to be freely distributed by the colporteurs. To give an idea of the extensive agency of this Society, it will suffice for me to say that at a single Committee meeting 80 letters were received, 60 of which were from various parts of France, and the rest from foreign countries. Twenty-three new tracts have been published during the year, six of which belongs to the childrens' series. The Youths' Magazine, called "l'Ami de la jeunesse," now pays its expenses. The sale of the "Almanac de bons Conseils" has reached 146,000 copies. Receipts $10,416, balance in hand $1617.

III. THE BIBLE SOCIETIES

Have also been prosperous. First, the Protestant Bible Society has placed 6824 copies of the Scriptures. Receipts $7285, expenses $3707. Then the French and Foreign Bible Society has sold 37,273 copies, and distributed, either at reduced prices or gratuitously, 61,108 copies more. Receipts 18,195, expenses 13,088. Lastly, the British and Foreign Bible Society has sold in France, to booksellers, most of whom are Papists, 18,211 copies of Scriptures, and placed by means of colporteurs 74,554. Deducting from the sales of these Societies what has been sent to Belgium, to Switzerland, and to other countries speaking the French language, it appears that the number of Bibles and Testaments which have been put into circulation in France, during the last year, amounts to 122,681. These figures are certainly very encouraging.

IV. THE HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETIES

Have had much to suffer from persecution. Thus the Evangelical Society, which is in hands of the Dissenters, has had thirteen schools and three chapels shut up by order of the local authorities. The Central Society has not been spared either, although in the hands of the National Reformed Church, and has seen three chapels interdicted. Appeals have been made to the tribunals, to the Senate and to the Emperor; and it is hoped that justice will be done. Those persecutions have however been useful in awakening the zeal of the missionaries, the number of whom has been increased. The agents of the Evangelical Society are 20 in number, including 20 ordained ministers, 8 evangelists, 48 teachers, besides 30 students in their Normal School. Receipts $32,222, expenses $34,536. A pleasing instance of liberality was mentioned in the report of a poor man who, with an annual income of $100 only, regularly managed to give $70 every year to different religious societies. The Central Society has received $16,304, and spent $11,121. Instances of revivals, conversions, and other encourging statements, are given in the reports.

V. THE SOCIETY OF THE PROTESTANT SOU

Is gradually increasing its income, which has now risen to $3,128. This sum is however very far from what it should be, for if only one-tenth of the French Protestants were to give one cent per week, the yearly amount collected would be $80,000. A new plan proposed at the meeting was that of boxes, entrusted to the care of one child in each family; thirty boxes thus placed by one minister, in thirty different families had yielded $100.

VI. THE MISSIONARY SOCIETY

Has been severely tried, first by the Kaffir war, which has brought desolation among its stations in South Africa, and more lately by the foul attacks of a pamphlet written by a Rationalist against all missionary efforts in foreign parts, whilst there yet remains something to be done amongst the French populations. Its receipts, however, have not suffered, since they have amounted to $21,200, expenses $21,552.

VII. The anniversary of the Society for promoting Primary Education amongst the Protestants of France was again presided over by Guizot. His speech was certainly not so objectionable to Protestant hearers as that of last year, on the contrary there were only two sentences in favor of the Papacy. The rest was thoroughly good. He showed that the only hope of salvation for France was in religion—in the resurrection of faith, hope and charity, and that a Christian education was the best means of raising these. From the report it appears that 22 new schools have been opened, 106 grants made to schools, and personal pecuniary help given to 13 male and one female teacher. The treasurer has received $10,628, and disbursed $9,830.

VIII. THE DEACONESS' INSTITUTION

Now contains 36 Sisters of Charity, 10 of whom are employed in the Provinces as infant teachers, or nurses in hospitals in the Provinces. The 26 others are being trained in the institution. The numerous branches of the labor of love to which they devote themselves are in full operation; they comprehend an infant school with 115 children, a large day-school for girls, a sewing school with 32 apprentices, a disciplinary with 16 refractory girls, a refuge containing nine reclaimed fallen females, an hospital, in which 941 sick persons have been taken care of since the opening of the institution, and an infirmary for scrofulous children. The average number of persons in the institution has been 111. Receipts 16,527, expenses $12,850.

IX. The last of these meetings was the anniversary of the Evangelical Alliance, the attendance to which was much larger than in the preceding year; and no wonder, for a most extraordinary spirit of union and brotherly love had pervaded all the meetings. Whether it be the fear of impending persecution on all Evangelical Christians, or the result of more piety and real fraternal feeling, it is certain that on no occasion heretofore had there been so much of the spirit of Evangelical Alliance. May this spirit continue, and spread more widely still, until all the children of God become one in Jesus Christ.

This Union is the more remarkable, as the number of pastors and laymen who have come from the country in order to attend these anniversaries is much larger than on any previous occasion. I have seen a list of more than ninety ministers only, some of whom have come from a distant of 400 to 600 miles, which is no small distance in a country where railroads are not so plentiful as in the United States. The cause for this great influx of visitors I must explain in my next, as I do not wish to be too late for to-night's post. I shall at the same time give some details of three new Societies, which have held their first anniversaries last week, viz: The Sunday School Society, the Young Men's Christian Union, and the Society of the History of French Protestantism. I will only add here that all our visitors from the country, who are now returning home, have been pleased with all they have seen and heard, and that they will surely give a new impetus to Evangelical zeal and devotedness in their respective residences. The Scoffer Silenced.

To a young infidel who was scoffing at Christianity because of the conduct of its professors, the late Dr. Mason once said: "Did you ever know an uproar to be made because an infidel went astray from the paths of Morality?" The infidel admitted that he had not. "Then by expecting professors of Christianity to be holy, you admit it to be a holy religion, and thus pay it the highest compliment in your power." The young man had no reply to make.

An English paper stated that several cases of bad health had been traced to papering rooms with green paper. The color is formed in part with arsenic. In some parts of Germany this kind of paper has been forbidden by the authorities.

Sir Walter Scott in lending a book one day to a friend, cautioned him to be punctual in returning it. "This is really necessary," said the poet in apology; "for though many of my friends are good arithmeticians, I observe almost all of them are bad bookkeepers."

CATCHING AN ALIGATOR.

M. de la Gironiere, a French physician, who spent some twenty years on the island of Luzon, one of the Phillippines, has recently published in Paris a most exciting personal narrative, which is having a large run. We select from it the following description of an alligator hunt:

From my window I daily saw them gamboling in the water, and wayleying and snapping at the dogs that ventered too near to the brink. One day a female servant of my wife's having been so imprudent as to bathe at the edge of the lake, was surprised by one of them, a monster of enormous size. One of my guards came up at the very moment she was being carried off; he fired his carbine at the brute, and hit it under the fore-leg—the arm-pit—which is the only vulnerable place. But the wound was insufficient to check the cayman's progress, and it disappeared with its prey. Nevertheless, this little bullet hole was the cause of its death; and here it is to be noted that the slightest wound received by the cayman is incurable. The shrimps, which abound in the lake, get into the hurt; little by little their number increases, till at last they penetrate deep into the solid flesh, and into the very interior of the body. This is what happened to the one which devoured my wife's maid. A month after that accident the monster was found dead upon the bank, five or six leagues from my house. Indians brought me back the unfortunate woman's earrings, which they had found in its stomach.

Upon another occasion, a Chinese was riding before me. We reached a river, and I let him go on alone, in order to ascertain whether the river was very deep or not. On a sudden, three or four caymans, which lay in waiting under the water, threw themselves upon him; horse and Chinese disappeared, and for some minutes the water was tinged with blood.

Out one morning with my shepherds, at a few leagues from my house, I came to a river which must be swum across. One of the shepherds advised me to ascend it to a shallow place, for that it was full of caymans; and the advice was about to be followed, when another man, rasher than myself, spurred his horse into the stream. Midway a monstrous cayman advanced to meet him. His companion uttered a warning shout, the Indian himself perceived the danger, threw himself from his horse, and made for the bank. On reaching it he immediately paused behind a fallen tree trunk, where he had water to his knees, and where, believing himself in perfect safety, he drew his cutlass and waited. Meanwhile the cayman reared his enormous head out of the water, threw himself upon the horse, and seized him by the saddle. The horse made an effort, the girths broke, and while the cayman crushed the leather, the steed reached dry land. Perceiving that the saddle was not what he wanted, the caymen dropped it and advanced upon the Indian, whose master and comrades shouted to him to run. The poor fellow would not stir, but waited calmly, cutlass in hand, and on the alligator's near approach, dealt him a blow upon the head. He might as well have tapped upon an anvil. The next instant he was writhing in the monster's jaws. For more than a minute we behold our poor shepherd, his body erect above the surface of the water—the cayman had seized him by the thigh—his hands joined, his eyes turned to heaven, in the attitude of a man imploring divine mercy, dragged in the direction of the lake. Soon he disappeared. The drama was over, the cayman's stomach was his tomb.

Unable to save the Indian, the spectators of his horrible end swore at least to avenge him.

I had made three nets of strong cords, each of which was strong enough to form a complete barrier across the river. I also had a hut built, and put an Indian to live in it, whose duty was to keep constant watch, and let me know as soon as the cayman returned to the river. He watched in vain for upward of two months; but at the end of that time he came and told me that the monster had seized a horse, and had dragged it into the river to devour it at leisure. I immediately repaired to the spot, accompanied by my guards, by my priest, who positively would see a cayman-hunt, and by an American friend of mine, Mr. Russell, of the house of Russell & Sturges, who was then staying with me. I had the nets spread at intervals, so that the cayman could not escape back into the lake. This operation was not effected without some acts of imprudence; thus, for instance, when the nets were arranged, an Indian dived to make sure that they reached the bottom, and that our enemy could not escape by passing below them. But it might very well have happened that the caymau was in the interval between the nets, and so have gobbled up my Indian. Fortunately every thing passed as we wished. When all was ready, I launched three pirogues, strongly fastened together, side by side, with some Indians in the centre, armed with lances, and with tall bamboos with which they could touch the bottom. At last, all measures having been taken to attain my end, without risk of accident, my Indians began to explore the river with their long bamboos.

An animal of such formidable size as the one we sought, cannot very easily hide himself, and soon we beheld him upon the surface of the river, lashing the water with his long tail, snapping and clattering with his jaws and endeavoring to get at those who dared disturb him in his retreat. A universal shout of joy greeted his appearance; the Indians in the pirogues hurled their lances at him, while we, upon either shore of the river, fired a volley. The bullets rebounded from the monster's scales, which they were unable to penetrate; the keener lances made their way between the scales, and entered the caymau's body some eight or ten inches. Thereupon he disappeared, swimming with incredible rapidity, and reached the first net. The resistence it opposed turned him back; he re ascended the river, and again appeared on the top of the water. The violent movement broke the staves of the lances which the Indians had stuck into him, and the iron alone remained in the wounds. Each time he re-appeared, the firing re-commenced, and fresh lances were plunged into his enormous body. Perceiving, however, how ineffectual firearms were to pierce his cuirass of invulnerable scales, I exorted him by my shouts and gestures, and when he came to the edge of the water, opening his enormous jaws already to devour me, I approached the muzzle of my gun to within a few inches, and fired both barrels, in the hope that the bullets would find something softer than scales in the interior of that formidable cavern, and that they would penetrate to his brain. All was in vain. The jaws closed with a terrible noise, seizing only the fire and smoke that issued from my gun, and the balls flattened against his bones without injuring them. The animal, which had now become furious, made inconceivable efforts to seize one of his enemies; his strength seemed to increase instead of diminishing, while our resources were nearly exhausted. Almost all our lances were sticking in his body, and our ammunition drew to an end.

The fight had lasted more than six hours without any result that could make us hope its speedy termination, when an Indian struck the cayman, while at the bottom of the water, with a lance of unusual length and size. Another Indian, at his comrade's request, struck two vigorous blows with a mace upon the but-end of the lance; the iron entered deep into the animal's body, and immediately, with a movement as swift as lightning, he darted towards the net and disappeared. The lance-pole, detached from the iron head, came to the surface of the water; for some minutes we waited in vain for the monster's reappearance; we thought that his last effort had enabled him to reach the lake, and that our chase was perfectly fruitless. We hauled in the first net, a large hole in which convinced us that our supposition was correct. The second net was in the same condition as the first. Disheartened by our failure, we were hauling in the third, when we felt a strong resistance. Several Indians began to drag it towards the bank, and presently, to our great joy, we saw the cayman on the surface of the water. He was expiring. We threw over him several lassos of strong cords, and when he was well secured we drew him to land. It was no easy matter to haul him up on the bank; the strength of forty Indians hardly sufficed. When at last we had got him completely out of water, and had him before our eyes, we stood stupefied with astonishment; for a very different thing was it to see his body thus, and to see him swimming when he was fighting against us. Mr. Russell, a very competent person, was charged with his measurement. From the extremity of the nostrils to the tip of the tail, he was found to be twenty-seven feet long, and his circumference was eleven feet, measured under the armpits. His belly was much more voluminous; but we thought it useless to measure him there, judging that the horse upon which he had breakfasted must considerably have increased his bulk.

This first process at an end, we took counsel as to what we should do with the dead caymau. Every one gave his opinion. My wish was to convey it, bodily, to my residence; but that was impossible; it would have required a vessel of five or six tons burden, and we could not procure such a craft. One man wanted the skin; the Indians begged for the flesh, to dry it and use it as a specific against asthma. Somebody else desired to have the fat, as an antidote to rheumatic pains; and, finally, my worthy priest demanded that the stomach should be opened, in order to ascertain how many Christians the monster had devoured. To satisfy every body, I sent for an ax, wherewith to cut off the head, which I reserved for myself, abandoning the rest of the carcass to all who had taken part in the capture. It was no easy matter to decapitate the monster. The ax buried itself in the flesh to half way up the handle, without reaching the bones; at last, after many efforts, we succeeded in getting the head off. Then we opened the stomach, and took out of it, by fragments, the horse which had been devoured that morning. The cayman does not masticate; he cuts off a huge lump with his enormous teeth, and bolts it entire. Then we found the whole of the horse, divided only into seven or eight pieces. Then we came to about a hundred and fifty pounds' weight of pebbles, varying from the size of a fist to that of a walnut. It was eight at night when we completed the cutting up. I left the body to our assistants, and had the head placed in a boat to convey it to my house. I very much desired to preserve this monstrous caput as nearly as possible in the state in which it then was; but that would have required a great deal of arsenical soap, and I was out of that. So I made up my mind to dissect it, and preserve the skeleton. I weighed it before detaching the ligements; its weight was four hundred and thirty pounds; its length from the nose to the first vertebra, five feet.

I found all my bullets, which had flattened themselves against the bones of the jaws and palate as they would have done against a plate of iron. The tongue-thrust which had slain the cayman, was a chance, a sort of miracle. When the Indian struck with his mace upon the but-end of the pole, the iron pierced through the nape into the vertebral column, and penetrated the spinal marrow, the only vulnerable part.

When this formidable head was well prepared, and the bones dried and whitened, I had the pleasure of presenting it to my friend Russell, who has since deposited it in the Museum at Boston.

M. de la Gironiera's description of a snake hunt on the Island of Luzon:

My dogs were dispersed along the brink of a deep ravine, in which was an enormous boa. The monster raised his head to a height of five or six feet, directing it from one edge to the other of the ravine, and menacing his assailants with his forked tongue; but the dogs, more active than he was, easily avoided his attacks. My first impulse was to shoot him, but then it occurred to me to take him alive and send him to France. Assuredly he would have been the most monstrous boa that had ever been seen there. To carry out my design, we had made nooses of cane strong enough to resist the most powerful wild buffalo. With great precaution we succeeded in passing one of our nooses round the boa's neck; then we tied him tightly to a tree, in such a manner as to keep his head at its usual height—about six feet from the ground. This done, we crossed to the other side of the ravine, and threw another noose over him, which we secured like the first. When he felt himself thus fixed at both ends, he coiled and writhed, and grappled several little trees which grew within his reach along the edge of the ravine. Unluckily for him, every thing yielded to his efforts; he tore up the young trees by the roots, broke off the branches, and dislodged enormous stones, round which he sought in vain to obtain the hold or point of resistance he needed. The nooses were strong, and withstood his most furious efforts. To convey an animal like this, several buffaloes and a whole system of cordage was necessary. Night approached; confident in our nooses, we left the place, proposing to return next morning and complete the capture; but we reckoned without our host. In the night the boa changed his tactics, got his body round some huge blocks of basalt, and finally succeeded in breaking his bonds and getting clear off.

Human beings rarely fall a prey to these big reptiles. I heard various stories from the Indians of their being killed and swallowed by them; but Indian stories are not to be implicitly credited, and I was unable to verify more than one instance—that of a malefactor who hid from justice in a cavern. His father visited him occasionally, to supply him with food. One day he found in place of his son, an enormous boa sleeping. He killed it and found his son in its stomach. The poor wretch had been surprised in the night, crushed to death, and swallowed. Upon the whole, however, the boa is one of the least terrible of the Phillippine serpents. There are small ones whose bite proves mortal within a few hours. Of an exceedingly venomous description is one which the Indians call dajon-palay—leaf of rice. Burning with a hot ember is the only antidote to its bite; if that is not promptly resorted to, horrible sufferings are followed by certain death. The alin-mo-sing is another sort, eight or ten feet long, and if any thing, more dangerous still than the "rice leaf" inasmuch as its bite is deeper, and more difficult to cauterize. Although so much abroad in forest and mountain, and sleeping but few precautions, was never bitten, though I had some narrow escapes. Once I trod upon a dajon-palay. I was warned by the reptile under my foot. I pressed hard with that leg, and saw the snake's little head stretching out to bite me on the ankle; fortunately my foot was on him at so short a distance from his head, that he could not get at me; I drew my dagger and cut off his head. On another occasion I noticed two eagles rising and falling like arrows among the bamboos, always at the same place. Curious to see what manner of animal they were attacking, I approached the place; but no sooner had I done so, than an enormous alin-mo-sing, furious with the wounds the eagles had inflicted on him, advanced to meet me. I retreated; he coiled himself up, gave a spring, and almost caught me on the face. By an inverse movement, I made a spring backward, and avoided him; but I took care not to turn my back and run, for than I should have been lost. The serpent returned to the charge, bounding toward me; I again avoided him, and was myself preparing to, to reach him with the edge of my lance, when an Indian, who perceived me from a distance, ran up, armed with a bough of a tree, and rid me of him.

Head and Heart.

Much is said in these late days about heart religion. That may all be very well. I wish we had more head religion—more intelligent, discriminating, comprehensive piety. There are a great many little, low, narrow notions, which possess some people, greatly to their own detriment, and to the injury of religion.

The New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Christian Advocate.

Terms: $1 50 per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

Saturday Morning, May 28.

Dedication.—The German Methodist Church, in Fourth District, on Saraparu street, will be dedicated on to-morrow week. This church is a plain, but neat building, thirty by fifty feet, in an eligible place for accommodating the Germans.

This part of our population is fast increasing in number and influence. Rationalistic and infidel preachers are busy among them. We chronicle, therefore, with peculiar satisfaction the opening another church of sound doctrine.

North Carolina Bishops.—The Fayetteville (N. C.) Observer, in referring to the recent election of the Rev. Thomas F. Davis, as Bishop of the Diocese of South Carolina, says:

"The Convention of South Carolina has anticipated that of North Carolina, which would most probably have chosen the same sound, able and pious minister, as Bishop of North Carolina.

There are now four natives of North Carolina in the House of Bishops, viz: Bishop Hawks, of Missouri, Bishop Green, of Mississippi, Bishop Polk, of Louisiana, and Bishop Davis, of South Carolina.

Clerical.—The minutes of the M. E. Church, South, show that nineteen traveling preachers died during the year, and two hundred and three were admitted on trial into the Conferences. Sixty-eight received locations.

Death.—The W. C. Advocate states that Dr. J. S. Tomlinson died suddenly, of heart disease, in Ohio, 14th instant.

Bastrop, (La.)—The North Louisianan connects some good advice with a sad picture thus:

"We are pleased to learn that several of our thorough going and enterprising young men, assisted by several ladies, have succeeded in not only organising a Sabbath School in Bastrop, but also a Bible Class, and for which laudable and praiseworthy undertaking, they deserve the highest encomiums from our citizens. It certainly would be more creditable to several young lads about town, whom we could point out, if it were necessary, that a Sabbath School would greatly benefit, instead of lounging about low dirty doggeries, and street corners, mimicking the debauchee, or children of larger growth, in their bacchanalian revelry. The young lads to whom we allude are from the ages of twelve to fifteen—some of whom carry revolvers and bowie knives, and swear, too, worse than troopers."

Southern Baptist Convention.—This body, composed of clergy and laymen of the Baptist denomination, in the Southern and Western States, convened in Baltimore, on the 14th instant, Rev. Doctor Howell, in the Chair.

Among the reports presented, was one on Foreign Missions, which gives some interesting facts.

The document is quite lengthy, and presents a clear, graphic, and interesting view of mission operations. It shows the amount of the receipts for the past year to have been $21,438 45; the disbursements for various purposes $11,429 25—leaving in the hands of the treasurer, together with the previous balance on hand, the sum of $11,694 11. The largest contribution made by any one State was by Georgia, viz: $5,545 92. The next by Virginia, $3,911 74; Maryland had contributed but $957 83, and Florida only $15 75.

A Canon.—At the recent Unitarian Convention, held at St. Louis, the following preamble and resolution was referred to a select Committee, who are to report to the next Conference:

"As there is a misunderstanding of the views of Unitarian Christians on important subjects, it is deemed proper to make some declaration in reference thereto:

"Resolved, That we regard Jesus Christ not as a mere inspired man, but as the Son of God—the messenger of the Father to man, miraculously sent—the mediator between God and man—the Redeemer of the world, and that we regard the miracles of the New Testament as facts on which the Gospel is based."

Railroad Jubilation.—The iron line connecting Columbus (Ga.) with Macon, and on with Savannah, is complete, and the first train between these two points came through on the 15th instant. On the 20th a grand rejoicing was had in Columbus over the matter. The train of the day before brought a Savannah deputation, a distance of three hundred miles between sunrise and sunset. Remembering the good old "merrie times" when thirty-five and forty miles was a fair day's journey, this is something to be merry over.

A very questionable hope of salvation is worse than none, for the reason that it is positively worthless, and stands almost fatally in the way of getting a better one.

THE REVOLUTION IN CHINA.

Like the chaffy cinders wafted from some burning prairie in the far off West, so have items of the rebellion in the Celestial Empire reached us from time to time.

Of the affairs of Central China there is a general ignorance, and therefore these occasional news-paragraphs about the revolution that has been developing there for four years have excited little attention. This distant and isolated people were left, without even the sympathy of the curious, to do their fighting. Our ideas of the sluggish, opium-enticing tranquility of the Celestials, have also assured us, that fight as long as they pleased, much damage wouldn't come it. But the popular idea on this subject is fallacious, for during the long term which we have mentioned, a war of the most vigorous kind has been progressing, which threatens to overthrow the reigning dynasty and all its official dependents.

The conquest of China by the Manchoo Tartars, (the race now dominant,) was effected about the middle of the Seventeenth Century, and from that time until the commencement of the present revolution, no attempt was made by the aboriginies to oust the intruders.

The present ruler, like all his predecessors since 1644, is a Tartar—an alien in race, manners, and belief. He holds his sceptre by the right of conquest. His race maintains the same relation to the Chinese as the Norman rulers of Great Britain to the conquered Saxons and Celts who supply their revenue;—it governs by the right of the strong, by the authority of victory, which in the course of time assumed the form of a hereditary prerogative.

Tein Tey, of Kwangsi, is the leader of this revolution. Calling his countrymen to arms for the avowed purpose of subverting the usurping dynasty, he soon had a sufficient force to meet the Imperial troops, and signalized the first movements of his army by a series of brilliant victories. His progress up through the country was necessarily slow, but he augmented the number of his men on the way, and steadily advanced on his Northern route. In November last they had got to Woochang, the capital town of the central Provinces, which stands on the great river Yantsee, the Tagus of China, and at that time their roll-list contained fifty thousand names of fighting men—a tolerably large squad of Celestial bruisers. The latest news informs us that Tienteh and his followers may be regarded as the undisputed victors; and a telegraphic dispatch in the London Times, of April 28, caps the climax by informing us that "Nankin had fallen into the hands of the rebels."

Intelligence received from Shanghai, as late as March 3, states that the Emperor had appealed to the British Consul for aid, and that the British residents there had stored a ship, and got all ready to leave on any emergency.

The overthrow of the Tartar dynasty is now looked for as hardly less than certain, and the restoration, in some form or other, of the old Chinese regime.

What effect upon the commerce of Nations this change may have is widely open to conjecture. The native Chinese is considered more civilizable than the Tartar,—better inclined to develope literature, trade, and art. A change can hardly be for the worse.

A question of profound interest in connection with this revolution is this: What effect is it likely to have upon Christianizing China? Statements have been made which, if true, give it a religious interest. Last year it was rumored that Tein Tey, or the chief leader, was a Chinese considerably enlightened in Christianity; that he had been a pupil of the late Doctor Gutzlaff, and that Christianity had some prospects, if he were to succeed, of his entire support.

What a wonderful chapter in the history of the Church may yet open up in that direction! Long years of missionary labor and patience have been counted as the cost of getting even a foot-hold for Christianity in this Empire. But this may be one of the marches of Providence, by a short route, upon a great end, and a Nation be born in a day!

Whether Tein Tey be a Christian or not, in any degree, some half probability of exceeding interest invests the subject. Some accounts represent him as another Constantine, dreaming his way into Christianity, and having seen its in hoc signo, unfurling his banner in its cause.

One of our Pacific exchanges, nearer this interesting theatre, and equally doubtful and solicitous as to the facts in the case, inclines to the opinion that the leader of this movement at least is favorable to Christianity. He quotes from the Rev. J. J. Roberts, Baptist missionary in Canton, and co-laborer of Dr. Gutzlaff, recognizing him as a former pupil. Under date of Oct. 6, M. Roberts writes the New York Recordor as follows:

"The chief in this affair, as I learned at Hong-Kong, turns out to be a man whose surname is Hung, name Sow-chuen. He came to Canton and studied Christianity for several months, some five or six years ago. And instead of raising a rebellion with the design of upsetting the Government, he seems rather struggling for religious liberty, and is really upsetting idolatry!

"He is a man of ordinary appearance, about five feet four or five inches high, well built, round face, regular featured, rather handsome, about middle-aged, and gentlemanly in his manners. While here he applied himself to the study of the Scriptures, daily committing them to memory, and maintaining a blameless deportment. He requested to be baptized, but left for Kwangsi before we were fully satisfied of his fitness. When he first came to us he brought some pieces of poetry and other essays, written by himself, respecting the Christian religion, the knowledge of which he professed to have derived, first from a tract received at one of the examinations in Canton, and secondly from a vision which he professed to have had while sick—which he said corroborated the doctrines learned out of the tract; and hence he believed in the true God, and came to Canton expressly to be instructed, and to learn the way of the Lord more perfectly from his own Word."

We shall what we shall see. Meantime we repeat of China religious, what is said of China political and commercial—a change can hardly be for the worse.

LARGE FINANCIAL MOVEMENT.

Since the Centenary movement of 1839, the Wesleyan Connexion in England has made no financial movement equal in its magnitude to one lately resolved upon and vigorously undertaken by them. Their various Connexional Funds had by one cause or other for several years been falling behind. The expenditures exceeded the income. As chief of these funds we may mention their "Contingent Fund" for providing for home missions and the necessities of poor and deficient circuits; "Chapel Fund" for building chapels in destitute places, and helping those in debt; the School Funds, etc.

These "Funds" have a history and work of their own. Their range of operation is well defined, and they are in charge of heavy Committees, whose management and reports make up a large part of Conference business. The Conference last year at New Castle passed the following minute:

"The Conference having been requested, by the Committees of the General Chapel and other Connexional Funds, to appoint a Committee to consider the state of their affairs, the President of the Conference is hereby authorized to call a meeting of such members of those Committees, and other friends, as he may select, to be held at such time and place as he shall direct; who are requested to take a comprehensive survey of the state and prospects of our various Connexional Funds, as well as of our Chapel Trusts, and to endeavor to devise means to relieve them from pecuniary embarrassments."

The meeting was called on the 22d April, and is described in the Watchman as a "numerous meeting of ministers and gentlemen from all parts of the Kingdom, in the Great Room at the Centenary Hall, Bishopsgate street, to devise for the better working of the financial system of Wesleyan Methodism, and to contrive plans by which to lessen the pecuniary obligations at present resting on Trustees."

It was resolved to get out of debt, and go no more in debt—make a clean sweep of it. £100,000 is to be raised. Their noble Head and Farmer were there and headed the subscription list with £1,000 each; nearly £10,000 were subscribed before the resolution was heard of out of doors. They have given themselves from this to the Conference of 1854 to raise the sum. Its relief must be great and happy, and also its moral impulse.

This is all well enough, but they compel us to a little boasting over them, and must therefore submit to it. One of the members of the meeting, and a speaker, too, being much enlarged by the generous discussion and contribution, and seeing things going on so finely, declared that they could do, if they were a mind to! Why, what could'nt they do? They had a few men that could "almost buy up the United States." This brought down the house in cheers.

Now, that meeting on Bishopsgate street, London, was not exactly the greatest Methodist meeting ever held in the world. One was held lately in Carondelet street, New Orleans, its size, preparation and circumstance considered, that beats it by large odds. What say you, friends, to this—you that are after buying up the United States, "almost?" Our Hill, alone, out-does your Farmer and Heald, both—only he does'nt make such long talks and pow-wows. And we have a few more coming on, of the same sort. Will John Bull-Wesleyanism accept the compliments of Brother Jonathan-Methodism, and please haul in his horns?

What Was It?

"Is it real affliction, ill health, disappointment, or the 'craving void that nohes within the breast,' for sympathies which perhaps earth does not afford—that wears us most from life? I think the latter. If we could only lie down to die as to sleep, how few would not willingly throw off what Wordsworth calls—

'The weight
Of all this unintelligible world!
And flee away and be at rest.'"

Money Getting Cheap.—This is the result of the discovery and influx of specie. On this subject an exchange paper has the following remarks, which are worthy of more consideration than (so far as we know) they have yet received of the Churches:

"The present season (a harvest for others) is a hard one for salaried men. How is it possible for our preachers, always so meagerly supported, to get along without an increase in their salaries? When the price, not of luxuries only, but mainly of the necessaries of life, is doubled, how can they, who barely lived before, manage to live at all now?"

"Formerly death appeared to me like a wide river, but now it has dwindled to a little rill, and my comforts, which were as the rill, have become the broad and deep stream."

STEAMBOAT RACING.

The Mississippi river seems to have been converted into a race course. Nothing appalled by the traveling disasters that within a brief time have filled the country with mourning, the reckless runners against time "fire up" and are cheered on.

The Eclipse left our wharf last week for Louisville on a crack trip. Her huge furnaces signalled her coming for miles to the towns along the river bank, and eclipsed them with clouds of smoke. The telegraph wires reported the hour and minute of passing each stand, and the newspaper boys, full of the excitement, cry out in the street, "Paper, sir? here's a paper gives time of the Eclipse."

In a few days the A. L. Shotwell started to beat her, and large bets, which net upon the boilers like barrels of pitch, are made. And now we are told she reached Louisville from here in four days, nine hours and twenty-nine minutes—beating the Eclipse two minutes! A third has taken the track, the Yorktown, which is to beat them both!

When, by and by, as the result of this racing, several scores of men, women and children are hurled, without a moment's warning, into eternity,—burned, mangled, drowned, scalded to death,—then what a virtuous indignation! The captains ought to be hung! the engineer ought to be hung! the pilot ought to be hung! the owners and the hetters lynched, fined, imprisoned—murderers, all! And where are the people that shouted them on?

The honor of reason, consistency and humanity, belongs to those who take the proper ground, both of feeling and action, against these racing steamboats, while yet they are "floating palaces," and not charred masses of wood—iron-ribbed skeletons, wrecked and dismantled hulks, saying to all passers-by,—Here, on such a day, so many human beings were murdered!

What man that travels or trades will have the self-denial and the principle to strike the Eclipse, the Shotwell, and the Yorktown, off his list—tabooed, henceforth. Give them no passage fare, nor freight. Bring a healthful public opinion to bear feelingly upon their owners. This will do more than all stringent statutes and post-mortem denouncement, to put an end to steamboat racing.

CHAPLAINS.

Petitions have been presented in the Senate of the United States to abolish the office of Chaplain in all its forms and uses, because the continuance of religious exercises in the various branches of the public service, is in effect, a religious establishment, and an infringement of the liberty of conscience!

The petition was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and Mr. Badger from the Committee made a calm, temperate report, against the prayer of the petitioners. The report concludes as follows:

"Our fathers were true lovers of liberty, and utterly opposed to any constraint upon the rights of conscience. But they had no fear or jealousy of religion itself, nor did they wish to see us an irreligious people; they did not intend to prohibit a just expression of religious devotion by the legislators of the Nation, even in their public character as legislators, they did not intend to send their armies and navies forth to do battle for the country, without any national recognition of that God on whom success or failure depends; they did not intend to spread over all the public authorities, and the whole public action of the Nation, the dead and living spectacle of atheistical apathy.

"Not so had the battles of the revolution been fought, and the deliberations of the Revolutionary Congress conducted. On the contrary all had been done with a continual appeal to the Supreme Ruler of the world, and an habitual reliance upon His protection of the righteous cause which they commended to His care.

"What has thus been done with modifications intended to suit external circumstances and particular exigencies, but in substance always the same from the beginning of our existence as a Nation—what met the approval of our Washington, and of the great men who succeeded him—what commands the general commendation of the people—what is it at once so venerable and lovely, so respectable and respected, and ought not, in the opinion of the Committee now be discontinued."

TWO KINDS OF RICHES.

A little boy sat by his mother. He looked long at the fire, and was silent. Then, as the deep thought began to pass away, his eye grew bright, and he spoke, "Mother, I wish I was rich."

"Why do you wish to be rich, my son?"

The child said, "Because every one praises the rich. Every one inquires after the rich. The stranger at our table yesterday asked, 'who was the richest man in the village.' At school there is a boy who does not love to learn. He takes no pains to say his lesson well. Sometimes he speaks evil words. But the children don't blame him, for they say he is a wealthy boy."

The mother saw that her child was in danger of believing wealth might take the place of goodness, or be an excuse for indolence, or cause them to be held in honor who led unworthy lives. So she asked him, "What is it to be rich?

And he answered, "I do not know. Yet tell me how I may become rich, that all may ask after me and praise me."

The mother replied, "To become rich is to get money. For this you must wait until you are a man."

Then the boy looked sorrowful and said, "Is there not some other way of being rich, that I may begin now?"

She answered, "The gain of money is not the only nor the true wealth. Fires may burn it, the floods drown it, the wind sweeps it away, moth and rust waste it, and the robber make it his prey. Men are wearied with the toil of getting it, but they leave it behind at last. They die and carry nothing away. The soul of the richest prince goeth forth, like that of the way-side beggar, without a garment. There is another kind of riches which are not kept in the purse, but in the heart. Those who possess them are not always praised by men, but they have the praise of God."

Then said the boy, "May I begin to gather this kind of riches now, or must I wait till I grow up, and am a man?"

The mother laid her hand upon his little head and said, "To-day, if ye will hear His voice; for He hath promised that those who seek early shall find."

And the child said, "Teach me how I may become rich before God."

Then she looked tenderly on him and said, "Kneel down every night and morning, and ask that you may love the dear Saviour, and trust in Him. Obey His word, and strive all the days of your life to do good to all. So, though you may be poor in this world you shall be rich in faith, and heir of the kingdom of heaven."

LITERARY NOTICES.

Periodicals.—This department of literature is so full, so various in knowledge and ably conducted, that one might read no books and yet be well read.

Our table, for this month, shows the National Magazine, (New York) for May; the Ladies' Repository, (Cincinnati) June; Ladies' Companion, (Nashville) May; Beauties of Holiness, (Pittsburg) May; Arthur's Magazine, (Philadelphia) May; Guide to Holiness, (Boston) May; Graham, (Phila.) June; Godey, (Phila.) May; DeBow's Review, (N. Orleans) May; Miscellany, (Memphis) May; besides Harper, and Putnam, and others already noticed.

Of the foreign supply which L. Scott & Co's enterprise gives us early, Blackwood, the London Quarterly, and the Westminster Review, April, have all come to hand. We note this striking evidence of their richness, that they furnish subjects for leading editorials to several of our cotemporaries of the weekly press.

Thirty-seventh Anniversary of the American Bible Society.—A meeting of this Society was held recently at Metropolitan Hall, Broadway, New York.

Hon. Theodore Frelinghuysen, President.

The meeting was opened by prayer by Rev. Dr. Goodall, of Constantinople.

The President then addressed the meeting, after which the Treasurer's report was read by Joseph Hynes, Esq., Assistant Treasurer, and the Managers' report by Rev. Dr. Bingham, and Rev. Dr. Holditch. The following is an abstract of these reports:

In course of the past year three of the Vice Presidents have been removed by death—Hon. James Whitcomb, of Indiana, Hubert Van Wageuen, Esq., of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and Hon. Duncan Cameron, of North Carolina. Two of the Managers, James W. Dominick and Samuel S. Howland, Esqs., have also deceased.

Rev. Dr. Stiles, Special Secretary of the South, has resigned, and re-entered the pastoral life; and Rev. James H. McNeill, of North Carolina, has been appointed Assistant Secretary.

Sixty-five life directors, and 1318 life members, have been constituted during the year. Sixty-seven new auxiliary societies have been formed, most of them in the new States and Territories.

The receipts of the year are $346,542 62—an increase of $37,797 61 over those of the previous year. The number of Bibles and Testaments issued has been 799,370, being an increase of 132,355 copies over the issues of the previous year, and making 9,088,352 since the formation of the Society. Of these issues of the year, 63,772 have been as donations; and very many others sold, to be paid for when re-sold by the auxiliaries.

Thirty-two agents have been in service, two of whom, Rev. Dr. Bond, of Missouri, and Rev. Mr. Pollock, of Alabama, have died, much lamented.

Grants of money have been made toward printing and circulating the Scriptures in France and Russia, and at twelve foreign missionary stations, to the amount of $24,000.

On the whole, the past year has been one of prosperity to the Society. Much more has been accomplished in preparing and circulating the Scriptures than in any previous year.

British and Foreign Bible Society.—The 49th annual meeting of this society was held on the 4th of May, in Exeter Hall, the Earl of Shaftesbury, President of the Society, in the Chair.

The financial statement showed that, exclusive of the Jubilee Fund, the receipts of the year ending March 31 amounted to 109,160*l.* 10s. 8d., being an increase of 711*l.* 9s. 10d. over those of last year. The receipts applicable to the general purposes of the Society amounted to 54,687*l.* 11s. 6d., including 36,523*l.* 15s. 11d. fee contributions from auxiliary societies, being a clear increase of 2,422*l.* 16s. 11d. on that item.

The amount received for Bibles and Testaments amounted to 54,572*l.* 19s. 2d., being an increase of 2,807*l.* 6s. 5d. The issues from the society's depots were—home, 840,552; abroad, 328,242; making a total of 1,168,794; being an increase of 14,152 over those of last year.

The total issues of the Society from the commencement, amounted to 26,571,103 copies. The expenditure of the past year was 95,930*l.* 9s. 10d., and its present engagements were 55,239*l.* 3s. 10d. The Jubilee Fund exceeded £17,000.

American Sunday School Union.—The 29th anniversary of this institution was celebrated in Philadelphia on Tuesday evening, the 17th inst. Its receipts during the past year amounted to $217,014, which, with the exception of $115, was all expended. The liabilities of the institution now amount to $65,424, but the stock on hand is valued at $103,241. It has 157 missionaries, who have established 1704 new schools, visited and revived 2308 others; total scholars, 193,350; teachers, 20,907. During the year, $150,910 worth of publications were put into circulation. [N. Y. Evening Post, May 13.

American Society for Meliorating the Condition of the Jews.—The annual sermon was preached before the American Society for Meliorating the Condition of the Jews, on Sunday, the 15th, in New York, by the Rev. Dr. West. The society's receipts during the year amounts to $13,269, showing a handsome increase. The annual report states that the Gospel has been preached to the Jewish people throughout the United States, during the year, more than ever before. The missionaries have preached to them in the highways, in their dwellings, in their synagogues, and in Christian churches, in fifteen cities, besides in large towns and villages. There have been employed nine regular missionaries, besides from five to seven colporteurs, all converted Jews. Fourteen Israelites have professed the Christian faith during the last three years. Of the 20 converts mentioned, one is a missionary, two are colporteurs, two are students preparing for the missionary work, and one a missionary teacher. Of the 15,000 or more Jewish converts in the world about every one in sixty is a preacher.

Embalming the Dead.—A chemical process for embalming dead bodies has recently been discovered by Dr. Thomas Holmes, who was physician to the coroners for many years. This medical gentleman has been engaged a long time in trying a series of experiments to perfect the object sought to be obtained by skillful chemists in various parts of the country. In the store of Edward A. Senior, in Carmine street, many he seen the body of a child embalmed by Dr. Holmes's process, which has remained several months without decomposition or any alteration of the features. [N. Y. Evening Post, 18th.

THE PACIFIC CONFERENCE.

Brother McTyeire:—The Pacific Annual Conference met in San Jose, April 13, 1853. Several of the preachers were absent, being detained in San Francisco by the explosion of the steamer Jenny Lind, on the 11th, while making the trip from San Jose to San Francisco, a disastrous and heart-rending occurrence—killing at once some eighteen or twenty persons, and scalding and injuring in various ways forty or fifty others—many of whom have since died.

Several prominent citizens of San Jose were among the unfortunate sufferers. The remains of one of these was returned, and brought into the church during the session of our Conference, where a large congregation of friends, relatives, and acquaintances, joined in the funeral services.

Had the explosion been two days sooner, or one later, a crowd of our preachers would have been on board on their way to Conference. This accident made the land route the only means of conveyance, which was insufficient to accommodate all our party, hence the detention of several until the following day.

Wednesday morning, nine o'clock, Bishop Soule took the Chair, and opened session by reading the Scriptures, singing and prayer, and following these exercises by some touching remarks. In these he alluded, in a most feeling manner, to the length of time he had been engaged in the work of the ministry—an entire generation of Methodist preachers had passed away since he began; the extent of his labors—preaching in England, Ireland and France,—in the Canadas, and from Maine to Louisiana, from the Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico. And now God had granted the earnest desire of his heart in permitting him to stand on the shores of the Pacific, and preach the Gospel to the multitudes who throng this far off coast.

A. M. Wynn was elected Secretary, and John Mathews, Assistant.

The several Committees were appointed, and the regular Conference business taken up.

Franklin G. Gray was admitted, and M. M. Moore, and B. T. Crouch, Jun., continued on trial.

Nineteen local preachers and nearly six hundred members were reported. The Sunday School report was encouraging, and all resolved that it should be still more so at our next session. Over seven hundred dollars had been collected for missions within the bounds of the work.

Sunday, at eleven o'clock, Bishop Soule preached us an able sermon, which was well received, and doubtless made a fine impression upon all who heard it. Although we were ordained by, and received two previous appointments from Bishop Soule, it had not been our privilege to hear him before. The sermon itself did not surprise me, but such force of delivery I was not expecting. Such energy and power of expression, continuing for an hour and twenty minutes, from one so advanced in age, was to me a matter of astonishment.

After the sermon B. T. Crouch, a transfer from the Memphis Conference, was ordained a Deacon.

The anniversary of the Conference Missionary Society was held on Monday night. Speeches by John Mathews, and J. H. Bristow. Over five hundred dollars was collected, making the amount for the year nearly thirteen hundred dollars.

The Conference adjourned on the 20th. The closing remarks of the Bishop were impressive as they always are on such occasions; especially when remarking that in all probability he would never again close an Annual Conference for us, and when we parted it would be to meet at the last day. Inquiry for the Minutes.

We have heard in this District, that the Minutes of the Alabama Conference have been published, and we live so very far off from every other part of the Conference that the supply of copies for our District have not yet come to hand. I still hope they will get here before we leave for our next Annual Conference. Can you tell us how we can make sure of that?

THE MOTHER'S LAST LESSON.

"Will you please teach me my verse, mamma, and kiss me and bid me good night?" said little Roger L——, as he opened the door and peeped cautiously into the chamber of his sick mother; "I am very sleepy, but no one has heard me say my prayers."

Mrs. L—— was very ill; indeed her attendants believed her to be dying. She sat propped up with her pillows, and struggling for breath; her lips were white; her eyes were growing dull and glazed. She was a widow, and little Roger was her only, her darling child. Every night he had been in the habit of coming into her room and sitting in her lap, or kneeling by her side, while she repeated passages from God's holy word, or related to him stories of the wise and good men spoken of in its pages.

"Hush! hush!" said a lady who was watching beside her couch. "Your dear mother is too ill to hear you to-night!" As she said this she came forward and laid her head gently upon his arm, as if she would lead him from the room. Roger began to sob as if his little heart would break.

"I cannot go to bed without saying my prayers—indeed I cannot."

The ear of the dying mother caught the sound. Although she had been nearly insensible to every thing transpiring around her, the sobs of her darling aroused her stupor, and turning to a friend desired her to bring her little son and lay him on her bosom. Her request was granted, and the child's rosy cheek and golden head nestled beside the pale, cold face of the dying mother.

"Roger, my son, my darling child," said the dying woman, "repeat this verse after me, never, never forget it; 'When my father and mother forsake me, the Lord will take me up.' The child repeated it two or three times tearfully, and said his little prayer. Then he kissed the cold, almost rigid features before him, and went quietly to his little couch. The next morning he sought, as usual, his mother, but he found her stiff and cold.

This was her last lesson. He has never forgotten it; he probably never will. He has grown to be a man, a good man, and now occupies a post of much honor and profit in Massachusetts. I never could look upon him without thinking about the faith so beautifully exhibited by his dying mother.

The New York Journal of Commerce says the Anniversaries of the great religious and benevolent institutions, held in that city were closed on Friday, the 13th inst. It adds:

Fifteen of our most important religious and benevolent institutions have held meetings, and have drawn together large audiences, of which from one-third to one-half were from the country. The attendance, on the whole, has probably been as numerous as on any previous session of this character. According to the reports presented, there have been received and disbursed in the course of the year, by these institutions, at least $1,500,000. In almost every instance their receipts have increased, and there has been a corresponding enlargement of the scale of operations. Accounts of the usefulness of these various enterprises are generally favorable.

Literary.—The curiosity of the literary world has been stimulated by the intelligence that the famous Epistles of Cyprian, one of the main bulwarks of the Puseyite heresy, are, after all, a forgery. The Rev. E. I Shepherd, M. A., a clergyman of the Church of England, and an ecclesiastical historian, "in considering the character and identity of Cyprian in the investigation connected with the history he has written, had the conclusion forced upon him, that the far-famed and much-relied-on Epistles of Cyprian were not of his composition, nor of his age, but were the fiction of a later period, and some other person." Having been challenged to the proof, he has responded in a series of letters. The last has just appeared. [London Co-respondence of the Congregationalist.

Death of Tieck, the German Poet.—The last arrival from Europe brings intelligence of the death of the venerable German poet, Ludwig Tieck, which took place at Berlin, on the morning of April 28. Tieck has justly been called "the last of the great poets of the great poetic age of Germany." He was born in Berlin, May 31, 1773, and had accordingly nearly completed his eightieth year at the time of his death.

Ex-President Tyler.—We do not hear from Mr. Tyler often, but the last news from him is too good a joke to be lost.

It seems that last winter or spring the county court in the county where Mr. Tyler lives, being composed of politicians, who wished to whip him a little for his political peculiarities, and conduct while President, appointed him overseer of a road with the intention of enforcing the duties or imposing a fine.

The law in Virginia limits no time for working the roads, but requires that the roads be put in order and kept so.

Mr. Tyler, who knew their intention, was seen riding through the neighborhood and ordering the hands on to the road.

The road runs through a rough and broken country, and he commenced such a plowing down of hills, such a grading, filling up and Macademizing as Old Virginia never saw before.

Day after day and week after week this work went on, until the joke on the part of his political enemies became a very serious one. The farms and crops were going to ruin.

A public meeting was called, and the petitioners unanimously asked Mr. Tyler to desist and let the hands go home.

To this Mr. Tyler replied that "the law made it his duty to put the road in order and keep it so, and there were yet a great many hills to cut down and ravines to be filled up, and that he felt it his duty to work on." He further stated that "he should dislike to be presented to the Grand Jury for neglect of duty."

The men who appointed him then went to him and told him that "if he was presented or complained of, they would excuse or defend him."

But he replied, "that he preferred to present himself above the clemency of the court."

The persons who had appointed him then begged him to resign.

To this Mr. Tyler replied, "that offices were hard to obtain these times, and having no assurance that he should obtain another he would not think of resigning."

Of course nothing could be done with Mr. Tyler, the man who had so often dodged the leaders of the nation, and so the farmers, planters, etc., were under the necessity of retiring to their homes alone, while their hands worked at the plowing, scraping, ditching, filling up, and thus making a good road and keeping it in order.

At the end of two months Mr. Tyler succeeded to desist for the time, and he then sent the hands to go home.

That road is said to be the best in the State, and it will hardly need repairing in twenty years.

Washington Races.—Some democrat, with a jovial spirit and a sharp sense of the ridiculous, writes from Washington to the Newport Union. He laughs at the endless crowd of office hunters, gives a graphic description of the army of hungry customers who haunt the Attorney General's office, and narrates the following incident:

The other day a short, fat gentleman from Essex South, attempted to stop General Cushing as he was starting for another part of the city on special business. This is the story, all in dialogue:

Applicant—"General Cushing!"

Gen. C.—"Ah! glad to see you—the whole matter—have the greatest respect for you—can't stop now. Good morning."

A.—"Just one minute; I want to see you very much."

Gen. C.—"Shall be back in half an hour, you must go with me," running.

The applicant, an old stager, declares he will go with him, and out they shoot from the front door, over the gardens, the fat man panting and trying to talk, and the Attorney General striking a bee-line for his destination. At last the asthmatic catches a breath and cries out:

"Can't stand this any longer! must give up!"

"Sorry to lose your company," replies the General, "but business is pressing." The fat man holds a post, gasps two or three times, has a terrible night succeeds, and declares he will not be found on the turf again, pitted against such mettle.

OBITUARY:

DIED—On the 5th of March, 1853, at Tombigville, Alabama, Brother A. M. SORSBY, aged 52 years.

The deceased was a firm follower of the Lord Jesus. He had been a very useful and active member of the M. E. Church for 24 years, and as he had always lived at his post, so death found him there. The Sabbath before he died he attended class. Then he said his peace was made with God, and he was only waiting his Master's call. The house was the home of the poor itinerant, where he always found a kind reception.

T. Y. ARMSTRONG.

DIED—In Columbus, Mississippi, April 7, 1853, in her thirty-fifth year, Miss SUSANNA R. MURPHY.

She professed religion in 1845, under the ministry of the late Rev. G. P. Spurks, of the Alabama Conference, then preacher in charge of this Station. There was ope peculiarity in her case that may be of service to mendon. Though her conversion was clear, her life was inconsistent, yet she suffered much from doubts, even to despondency. But when attacked with her last illness her doubts were all removed, and her mind kept in perfect peace.

On the day of her death I inquired into the state of her mind: she answered, "Happy in God." The tide of joy continued to rise until her pure spirit ascended to the home of her Father in heavon—

"The palace of angels and God."

Little FRANK NEWMAN, son of Rev. J. L. and Mary A. Newman, of the Alabama Conference, died in Livingston, Ala., May 21, 1853, aged ten months and two days.

An opening flower at rosy morn,
Nipped by a chilling blast;
It bloomed with innocence adorned,
But now the leaves are cast!

He smiled, but 'twas a passing smile,
Which was not meant to stay;
He's gone! he lingered here awhile,
And blossomed to decay!

And loving hearts have cluster'd 'round;
And many a throbbing breast
Feels sad, and leves the little mound
That marks his place of rest.

His crumbling ashes earth may have—
That's all she dares to claim;
His spirit soars above the grave—
A bright, undying flame!

That Saviour my shepherd shall be,
Who has taken my Lamb to His arms.

MARY A. NEWMAN.

DIED—On the 16th April, in Cadde Parish, Mrs. NANCY SCOTT, consort of Mr. Josiah Scott, in the fortieth year of her age, and twenty-third of her wedded, and the fifteenth of her Christian life.

From the commencement of her sufferings she had a presentiment of her approaching death. A devout and humble Christian, and were her views of the purity of God, and the grandeur of eternity, that her mind became painfully solicitous on the subject of personal holiness, and a fitness to appear in the presence of God. The trial was fearful fiery, but through faith in Him, who is the resurrection and the life, the victory was won, and God was glorified.

Our beloved Sister Scott was blessed with a gentle, confiding spirit. Humility and meekness were prominent traits in her character. The social, relative, and religious duties were performed by her with exactness, and in the fear of God. The apostolic precept, "Let each esteem other better than themselves," was boantifully illustrated in her humble life.

She left eight children, five affectionate brothers, and a truly disconsolate husband, to mourn their irreparable loss. May the merciful God bring this interesting family to meet at last where there are no tears.

"Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints."

Further Particulars of the Loss of the Bark William and Mary.

We find in our eastern exchanges still further particulars concerning the loss at sea of the bark William and Mary. One of the crew, in describing the scene, when it became evident that the vessel was sinking, says:

"Some who had the evening previous been boasting of their infidelity were the first upon their knees, and loudest in their cries for God to have mercy upon them. It now seemed evident to all that the ship would go down immediately. Men who, before this, had acted their part nobly, now ceased to make any effort to save themselves or others. Some went to a cask of liquor that was between decks, and there forgot their dangers and troubles."

After describing the launching of the life-boat and crowding it with as many as it would hold, into which the captain reluctantly jumped, he adds:

When the passengers saw him leave the ship, they knew there was no longer any hope, and became perfectly frantic with despair. As soon as the captain left, six of the crew, who still remained in the ship, got ready the long boat, into which several of the passengers jumped indiscriminately. I never saw anything in my life so fearful. One of the crew who was in the long boat was compelled, with a hatchet, to keep off the passengers who were crowding into the boat, and who, if allowed to enter it, would undoubtedly have sunk it.

HORRIBLE.—Early Friday morning, April 29, some of the people on the Ives Farm on Potowomut Neck, discovered a sail boat aground with the sail up, on the East side of the Neck. On going to it they discovered a man lying in the water by the side of the boat dead, and on getting into the boat they discovered one Daniel F. Essex, who resides somewhere in the vicinity, asleep. After some effort Essex was roused from the stupor brought on by sleep and drink, and from what could be gathered from his account, it seems that he and the deceased, Archibald Congodon, of West Greenwich, were returning from Providence the evening before in the boat, and having a fresh supply of liquor on board became intoxicated, and Congodon fell overboard, and Essex was too drunk to get him into the boat, and finally between them they got a rope around Congodon's body and towed him. Congodon told Essex two or three times he could not live so, and he must get on board, but Essex took more liquor, and finally fell asleep and let the boat drift, and nothing more is known, until the boat was found as above. "When, after the birth of an illegitimate child, his parents have intermarried, or shall afterwards, and his father has acknowledged, or shall after the marriage acknowledge him as his child, such child shall be considered as legitimate to all intents and purposes."

General Intelligence.

DIRECT FOREIGN COTTON TRADE.—The National Intelligencer of the 18th says:

We have been shown an important letter addressed to C. G. Haylor, Esq., late United States Consul at Amsterdam, and editor of the Cotton Plant, by the President of a powerful and wealthy European Commercial Company. This letter is in conclusion of a correspondence which has been going on for some time between Mr. Baylor and European influences in regard to the importance of a Continental Depot for cotton. From the language and tone of the letter before us the most favorable disposition is manifested, and the President has notified Mr. Baylor that one of the company was to sail for America in time to be at the Memphis Convention. At Memphis the plan of a tour will be agreed upon. His tour is to enable the gentleman, as the confidential friend and agent of the European Company, to inform them of the condition of the cotton-growers, and their disposition to participate in any general movement such as is contemplated by direct trade. The object will also be to give certain assurances to the planters of the determination of European capital to cooperate in the formation of a Continental Depot of Cotton. This tour must prove interesting, not only on account of the opportunity it will give intelligent European society to judge of our Southern friends, but also in regard to a change in the destination of that portion of the cotton crop which now goes circuitously to the manufacturers of the continent.

SEARCH FOR SIR JOHN FRANKLIN.—The last number of the London Quarterly Review contains an article sketching the results of the various expeditions which have been dispatched in search of that commanded by Sir John Franklin. There is, however, but a passing, and not very hearty notice taken of the American searching expedition. In the course of the article, the reviewer reproduces an interesting extract from a letter written from Disco Island, July 12, 1845, by Commander Fitzjames, who sailed in the Erebus with Franklin. The letter is written to his wife, and he tells her that "it may be from five to six years—it might be into the seventh—ere we return, and should it be so, do not allow any person to dishearten you at the length of our absence; but look forward with hope, that Providence will, at length of time, restore us safely to you."

There are grounds to hope that some, at least, of the adventurous companions of Franklin still live, imprisoned in some unexplored part of the icy regions of the North. All accounts are pretty unanimous in the opinion that food to prolong life, if the regular supplies should fail, can easily be procured in the Arctic regions; and it is contended that the sudden wreck of Franklin's two vessels, and the total destruction of both crews, is a probability so unprecedented, that we are not warranted in holding such an opinion.

"Sir E. Belcher is engaged in a survey of Wellington harbor, while Capt. Kellett is probably safely anchored in Winter Harbor, the old quarters of Parry. Each has a well-stored ship, with an attendant steamer, while the North Star, within reach, no doubt, of parties from either vessel, remains in Franklin's anchorage at Beachey Island. On the Pacific side, the Plover, we may presume, is advanced to Point Barrow. We have an intelligence of McClure since, under a press of canvas, he stood for the pack-ice off Icy Cape, in August, 1850; nor from Collinson, since he passed Behrings Strait in July of the following year."

THE LOSS OF THE WILLIAM AND MARY.—The Boston Journal, which is usually well informed in all marine affairs, says that there must be either some misstatement in Captain Stenson's account of the loss of his vessel, or some mismanagement at the time of the occurrence. According to that statement the ship struck on a rock on the northern part of the Great Bahama Bank at half-past 7 in the evening, beat a hole in her bottom, and began to leak badly. The ship was immediately anchored in ten fathoms water, and remained in that position until the next morning at 8 o'clock, when she sunk, with some two hundred persons on board, who could not be taken off in the boats. At that time, the Great Isaacs bore E. S. E. seven miles distant.

There is no "danger" laid down in this position in any chart of the Bahamas, nor is any rock or other danger mentioned in Blunt's Coast Pilot; and this part of the Bank is traversed almost every day by large vessels bound through the New Providence Channel and the Gulf Stream to Cuba or the Gulf of Mexico. The Northeast Rock is situated about one mile and a half N. E. from the Great Isaace; but this can hardly be the ledge on which the ship struck, if the ship was brought to anchor immediately after striking.

The precise spot on which the ship struck may not, however, be of much consequence to the public, excepting as a warning to other navigators; but it is singular that, with a strong breeze, the ship, instead of being anchored, was not kept under way through the night, and every possible effort made to get further on the bank into shoal water, where the chances of all on board being saved would have been infinitely greater than while the ship remained in ten fathoms water.

All the indications point directly to the railroad between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of the United States as a fixed fact. A Washington correspondent of the New York Courier says:

"Four expeditions have been organized under the appropriation of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, for the survey of a practicable route for the Pacific Railroad. The first, under Gov. Stevens, late of the corps of Topographical Engineers, will start from St. Paul, Minnesota, and move west, across the upper branches of the Missouri, through the South Pass, thence to the Columbia river. The second, under Lieutenant Whipple, of the Topographical Corps, is instructed to survey the route from Memphis or Vicksburg, by way of Fort Smith, Arkansas, and Albuquerque, New Mexico, thence to the frontier of Californium. Lieut. Williamson is directed to leave San Diego with a surveying party, and meet Lieut. Whipple at Walker's Pass, in the Sierra Nevada. Capt. Gunnison is ordered from Milwaukee to Washington, to take charge of the fourth party, which will rendezvous near Council Bluffs, and attempt to explore the central route—that taken by Col. Fremont in his last expedition, which failed so disastrously. This party is organized under the recommendation of Mr. Benton. Mr. Kerr, one of Col. Fremont's men, will accompany this last party. Each party will be escorted by 35 troops, mounted men or infantry."

SARDINIAN CONTRIBUTION TO THE WORLD'S FAIR.—A Sardinian frigate, with the articles intended for the Crystal Palace exhibition, arrived at New York on Sunday, the 15th instant. She exchanged salutes with the fort on Governor's Island. She is a fine vessel, called the San Giovanni, and brought several passengers who visit this country for the purpose of attending the fair. The frigate has been 44 days on her voyage from Genoa. She carries 24 heavy guns and has a crew of 278 persons, and will remain at New York about a month. She brings over 84 Italian exiles, including several ladies and gentlemen of wealth and rank. Most of them, however, are of the industrial classes, and among them are no less than 22 tailors by trade.

EXPLORATION OF AFRICA.—It is known that Captain Lynch, of the U. S. Navy, was sent to the West coast of Africa, some time since, with a view to determine preliminaries connected with an exploring trip into the interior of Africa. A letter from President Roberts, of Monrovia, under date of 14th of March, says:

"I have seen Captain Lynch, and made a short excursion with him up the St. Paul river. He is equally pleased with the country, and I think has made up his mind to strike out into the interior from Millsburg. He is now on his way to the United States, via England, to make arrangements, I believe, to return to the coast in a few months to commence his explorations."

Father Gavazzi was presented, at Matropolitan Hall, New York, on Friday evening, the 14th inst., with a check for $1000, and an Italian and English Bible. The present, it is stated, is intended as a testsmonial of esteem on the part of his friends. Rev. Dr. Cox made the formal presentation in the presence of a large audience, who were admitted at 25 cents each, which amount is to be devoted to building a church for Gavazzi. A gentleman present on the occasion pledged himself to give $1000 toward erecting the church.

From Texas.

By the arrival of the steamship Perseverance, we are placed in possession of Galveston papers of the 17th inst., and dates from the interior as late as due. The papers are barren of news.

The Texas gold mine fever is still raging. The Victoria Advocate of the 14th says:

Several persons from this neighborhood have recently started for the gold region.

The accounts from Austin this week are certainly more favorable than we had anticipated. We copy the following from the State Gazette of the 30th ult.:

A considerable excitement is prevailing throughout Western Texas, on the subject of gold discoveries in our neighborhood; and we have had several letters, and observe notices in our exchanges asking information on the subject. That there is gold, and in great quantities, on the tributaries of the Colorado, a short distance above this city, we can no longer entertain a doubt, for some specimens shown us are of the most beautiful character. The number of persons now at the mines is very considerable, set down by reports at from 200 to 500, most of whom are greatly encouraged by their success. The district of country in which gold has been found is a very extensive one, and easy of access from this city.

The editor of the Indianola Bulletin publishes a great variety of historical and other facts tending to show that there is gold in great abundance in the mountains above Austin. The disclosures of a few weeks will remove all speculation on the subject.

There was a severe hail storm in Washington or Austin counties or perhaps both, on the 7th inst. The Reager says;

On the 7th inst., a portion of Austin county was visited by a severe and destructive hail storm, accompanied by a strong wind and heavy rain. Some of the hail stones were as large as eggs, of every shape imaginable. The surface of the earth was covered in a short time from the rapidity in which they fell. The storm passed from South to North, over the plantations of Shelby, Black, and others, seriously injuring the corn and cotton crops.

YELLOW FEVER AT RIO JANEIRO.—The New York Tribune has the following particulars respecting the ravages of the yellow fever at Rio Janeiro:

It has been especially fatal to foreigners recently arrived in the country, although many of the old residents as well as natives of Brazil have been carried off by its violence. Among the victims are Mr. Henry Southern, the English Minister to Brazil, and Mr. Shaonin, the Austrian Secretary of Legation, a young man in the flower of his youth. The people in the house where he lived were so frightened that they forsook him and left him entirely to the care of the negroes. The most severe suffering has been among foreign seamen, including both masters of vessels and crews. It is greatly to be regretted that the Brazilians are so familiar with the visitations of this scourge, that with the exception of a hospital on the other side of the bay for yellow fever patients, neither the Government nor the municipal authorities have taken the slightest measures against the numerous local influences which promote the development of the pestilence, such as the filthy state of the streets, the public squares and the wharves, which present a frightful spectacle to the new comer. With the thermometer at 95 deg. it is very easy to imagine what emphitic vapors must poison the atmosphere, when dead animals are every where exposed to the burning rage of the sun. The first visit of the yellow fever in 1849 had one good effect, in causing the prohibition of interments within the walls of the city, a measure which the municipal authorities had been trying for in vain for almost thirty years; but now, after the first panic is over, the Brazilian yields to a certain oriental fatalism, and finds it quite as natural that people should die of the terrible yellow fever as any other disease.

THE NEW SLAVE TRADE OF GREAT BRITAIN.—While Mrs. Stowe in Great Britain is receiving ovations and penny subscriptions, designed to mark the condemnation of Great Britain for American Slavery, and its reverence for Slavery's great illustrator, we learn from the Liberia papers of the 2d of March, some news with reference to Great Britain and Slavery which would not harmonize very well if appended to the congratulatory address to Mrs. Stowe. The nature of the intelligence to which we refer may be gathered from the following proclamation of the President of the Liberian Republic:

Proclamation.—Whereas, Messrs. Hyde, Hodge & Co., of London, contractors with her Britannic Majesty's Government, to furnish laborers from the African coast for the West Indies, have sent some of their ships to the coast of the republic, offering an advance of ten dollars for every person who may be induced to emigrate; and whereas, the extinction of the slave trade has left large numbers of predial and other laborers in the possession of the chiefs and principal men of the country. While the offer of the ten dollars each is nearly equivalent to the amount formerly paid for slaves during the prevalence of the slave trade, and which operated mainly in producing and sustaining the wars, by which the country was distracted; and whereas, certain refractory chiefs are reported to have engaged with the agents of said Company to furnish a number of laborers, and are further known to have in concealment near Grand Cape Mount, a number of the unhappy victims of their predatory excursions; and whereas, complaint has been made to the Government that persons are held to be sent off without their voluntary consent or the consent of their natural guardians; therefore, to prevent the abuses and evils which might otherwise result from the enterprise:

Be it known by this proclamation, to all whom it may concern, that the law regulating passports must be strictly observed—that vessels carrying or intending to carry away emigrants must come to this port with their emigrants on board, to obtain passports, in order that an opportunity may be presented to the government to ascertain whether the emigrants be free or constrained. Every violation of the law regulating passports will be visited with the utmost penalty of the law in that case made and provided.

Done at Monrovia, this twenty-sixth day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-three, and of the republic the fifth. J. J. ROBERTS.

[L. S.] By the President:

H. TEAGE, Secretary of State.

The meaning to be derived from the above document is simply that Great Britain is engaged in a new kind of slave trade; the new feature being, that the flesh and blood which she buys for the West-Indies, she now calls emigrants and apprentices, instead of the old and legitimate term of slaves. FRANCE AND THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.—The French demands on the government of the Sandwich Islands are:

1. That the duty on brandies shall be reduced from $5 to $1 50 per gallon.

2. That the prohibition on the introduction of spirituous liquors by whale ships shall not be enforced against French whalers.

3. That a board of superintendence be appointed for each rallgion; that Catholic schools be under the sole control of Catholic inspectors, and that the fund arising from the school tax be proportionally divided between Catholics and Protestants.

These claims are based upon the treaty of 1846, of which the second article guarantees to French residents in the Islands the same rights and privileges which are now, or which hereafter may be, granted to the subjects of the most favored nation. Article six declares that French productions shall not be prohibited, or subjected to a duty greater than five per cent. ad valorem—except in the case of wines, brandies and spirituous liquors, which may be subjected to any equitable duty which the government of the Islands may see fit to impose—on condition that this duty shall never be sufficiently high to become an absolute prohibition to the importation of the said articles.

TERRITORIES TO BECOME STATES.—Utah would make twenty States of the size of New Hampshire; Nebraska, fifteen; Indian, twenty; North-west, sixty-five—total, one hundred and twenty-six States. Should these territories have an equal population to the square mile with New Hampshire, they would contain a population of above thirty-eight million souls. What a destiny awaits our country! And what a demand upon this generation to meet the next with all appropriate moral, education and religious influences! The child is the father of the man in respect to society, and nations as well as individuals.

THE LEADERS OF THE CHINESE REBELLION. Letters from Canton state, that of all the stories connected with the great rebellion in China, none has been so persevered in from the commencement as that assigning leadership and influence to foreigners; and there really seems many grounds for the belief. They are called by many, the "Christians," the "God-worshippers;" and it is said that they observe Sunday. The latest takes this form:

"There are four men, wearing the Chinese dress, but not talking the Chinese language well, who are at the head of the rebel council of war; and without whose sanction no step is taken. These men are generally supposed to be French Jesuits; and if Catholicism forms an element of the combination, the further north they go the stronger they become, as that religion is more widely diffused in that quarter. Their success in battle against the Imperialists, and the military skill which has characterized some of their movements, give additional strength to the supposition of foreign aid."

The loss of life at Wu-chang-fu, when taken by the rebels, said to have been very great, and the captors were especially bent on demolishing temples, with their idols.

SINGULAR.—It is stated that Mrs. Newall, the mother of David B. Newall, of Newport, N. H., who was killed on board the New Haven cars at Norwalk, did not hear of her son's death until last Wednesday. He was a consumptive young man, and was returning from the South. He had previously written to his mother that he was going to return, and she had gone on to Georgia to take care of him on his passage back. He got the start of her, and they passed one another on the way, she going entirely through. She then immediately set out on her return, and, holding no associations on the way did not hear of the accident. After getting upon the New York and New Haven railroad, last Wednday, a fellow-passenger politely handed her a copy of the New York Illustrated News, which contained an illustrated account of the accident. In this she became interested, and had commenced reading a list of those killed, when suddenly she dropped the paper, and raising her hands, exclaimed—"My God! my God! my son is killed!". This was her first intimation of her bereavement, and her son had already arrived at home and been consigned to the grave. [New Haven Palladium, 18th.

To persons having the care of steam engines, the following, from the Lawrenceburg Register, may be valuable:

"Mr. Ira Hill has informed us that he has accidentally made a valuable discovery, by which the deposit of lime upon steam boilers may be obviated. Two or three shovels of sawdust are thrown into the boiler; after which process he states he never had any difficulty from lime; although using water strongly impregated with it. He has always found the inside of his boilers as smooth as if just oiled. Whether the lime attaches itself to the floating particles of sawdust instead of the boiler, or whether the tanic acid in the oak sawdust forms a salt with the lime which will not attach itself to iron, remains to be explained. The sawdust was placed in the boiler for the purse of stopping a leak. The experiment is cheap and easily tried."

STEALING A WIFE—Action in Law Therefor. The Ontario County (N. Y.) Times gives the particulars of a rather singular matrimonial case which was before the Court in that county a few days ago. The facts are: That, on the 29th of August, 1852, Eliza R. Smith, of Macedon, went with Addison J. Bennett to East Macedon, where the parties were married. Returning, they were met on the highway at Victor by the father and mother of the bride, and Thomas Wright, where a kind of "come round" occurred, during which the bride was spirited away. On the same evening the bride and her friends took the cars and proceeded to Philadelphia. They were followed by Bennett to Philadelphia in the course of some four weeks, and he being discovered in the streets of that city, the party at once took the cars again and put back to Macedon. The suit is brought by Bennett for the recovery of his wife, and also for abduction and assault and battery. It is a singular case—the more strange from the alleged fact that the bride in question stays away from her wedded lord of her own choice, and not, as she says, from undue influence or compulsion.

DYING DECLARATIONS.—An interesting and important question of evidence has been decided by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, now sitting at East Cambridge, in the trial of Thomas Casey for the murder of Ouvra Taylor and his wife, at Natick:

Taylor, it will be recollected, was dead when found, and Mrs. Taylor, although speechless and mortally wounded, was conscious nearly up to the time of her decease. She was well aware, by the assurance of her physicians, that no hope was entertained of her recovery; and on being repeatedly requested, under these circumstances, by Doctors Whitney and Hoyt to squeeze their hands if Casey was the man who committed the deed, she did give the sign as directed. She was asked other questions, to be answered by the same sign, if the response was affirmative, but to desist from pressing the hand if the response was negative. These questions were asked to test the mental consciousness and sanity of the dying woman; and the answers were such as to entirely satisfy the physicians that she had full use of her mental faculties.

By the well known rules of evidence, the dying declarations of a person fully aware of his state are admitted in courts of justice, and allowed all the credit of testimony given under the solemnity of an oath, on the ground that an individual conscious of his immediate departure to the presence of the Deity would be very unlikely to make a false statement.

The question in this case is, whether the answers given by signs, as directed, would come under the denomination of dying declarations? The affirmative was earnestly pressed by the Attorney General, and as earnestly resisted by the priso

"GOOD-BY."

[illegible] good-by, is a lovely sound,
[illegible] always brings a sigh,"
[illegible] Where we lay down in the ground,
[illegible] Friends and friends around,
[illegible] Like with tenderness filled four
[illegible] Softer utter heart-felt tear, [illegible] breathe a last good-by."

[illegible], what a meaning in that breath:
[illegible] last, last, last good-by.
[illegible] the presence of pale Death,
[illegible] the lips that once had breath,
[illegible] utter within our hearts to pray,
[illegible] our choked voices can but say,
Good-by; sweet friend, good-by.

[illegible] from our land and home we'll stray,
[illegible] friends will pass us gayly by,
And with a passing glance they'll say,
"We'll meet again some other day:
But ah! when comes the day of Death,
This fit our kindred friends bereft,
Will breathe a last good-by.

New Orleans, May 17, 1853. WILLIE ELLIS, JR.

THE RETURN OF INTEMPERANCE.

Mr. —— and his young wife took up their abode in apartments near my first residence. I owed my acquaintance to an introduction of [illegible], in which I was associated for the benefit of one of our dispensaries. Anatomy and the physiology of the viscera were my subjects, and I observed from his excessive paleness, that he was afflicted with some internal congestion, or that his circulation at any rate was not of a high order. A great degree of curiosity on the subject of enlargement of the liver from the excessive use of brandy, with a desire to know the earliest indications rendering abstinence indispensable to preserve life, gave me a hint of the reason of his listlessness, and the cause of his inattention to business. He was a lawyer, and had a few years before been actively occupied in the lower courts; going home one night at a late hour from one of my midnight enterprises, where the good rule of "cash on delivery" meets no favor with our poor patients, notwithstanding the abundance of the commodity delivered, I observed him staggering before me in such a manner that I feared my aid would be necessary. He was excessively proud and tenacious of his character, and I therefore avoided his observation, walking slowly behind him until a violent fall compelled me to interfere, and raise him; being obliged, indeed, almost to carry him to his house, a small and barely decent residence, to which his habits had reduced him, and the rent for which, as I subsequently learned, his delicate wife paid by painting maps and prints for the booksellers.

My first impulse was to leave him as soon as I should hear the approach of the servant in answer to my summons. I did not anticipate the possibility of the absence of the single servant I knew they had some time kept, but their poverty had obliged them to discharge her, and the bell was almost instantly answered by the gentle being who knew, poor child, the nature of the [illegible]. She was in her day dress, and had not removed it, as she told me, for several nights, having been obliged to watch the return of [illegible] should have been her hope and her [illegible], and whose strong arm should have interposed between her and all harm. [illegible] had dimmed the lustre of that eye that once looked so kindly on her, and naught remained for both but the quiet grave. We mine if we imagined how near it was. Never shall I forget the look of heart-broken anguish with which her gaze met mine, as the flame of mutual light fell upon us. Those tears are imprinted on my very soul; nor do I think any man, with a spark of humanity in him, would not have answered them in kind. I carried him to his chamber, and after examining and dressing the wound on his forehead received from his fall, and knowing that my absence would be most acceptable to the true wife, I took my departure, begging her instantly to send freely for me in the event of any trouble or new misfortune. I did not repeat my visit, well knowing what her sufferings must have been, and that she wished to bear them unnoticed and alone.

Two or three days before I again saw them; and I fondly hoped, from a short appearance of renewed attention to business, and seeing his wife occasionally walking arm-in-arm with him, plainly but respectably clad, that he had turned over a new leaf in the blackened and desolate volume of his life. But alas! he soon relapsed into a lower state than ever; and often staggered by my office, occasionally looking in, and uttering some maudlin nonsense. I was powerless; he was like many others addicted to the loathsome vice, and had not mind enough to appeal to. He resented the least hint for reform; and once gave me to understand I would do well to concentrate all my mental powers on my business, assuring me (and God knows I felt the truth of his remark) I would find no superfluous ability. The poor fellow never forgave me for carrying him up stairs, though his suffering wife avoided mentioning my name to him unless in a medical light.

A few months after the incident which brought me into this family, the cholera of 1832 came on. It was soon apparent that the disease continued its most fatal ravages to the wretched and debilitated. None will forget the sickening and heart-rending scenes of that awful visitation. The Angel of Death did, indeed, spread his wing on the blast; but he did not always fan away the demon of pain from the couch of poverty, as I have often remarked. True, the spirit of the spirit was often fearfully speedy and painless in the wretched and intemperate, but the strong man struggled fearfully against the terrible and unknown enemy, and the nerves of the dying frame were racked, and let loose the strong muscles, till they played terrible antics before the powerless physician. One often thought of the Laocoön, but looked in vain for the Serpent.

One evening, at five o'clock, or thereabouts, I had thrown myself exhausted from my horse into my office chair, after a visit to my little deaf mutes in the Asylum, and was indulging in my favorite luxury, a cup of green tea, which I preferred taking away from my family, for the simple reason that no man whose heart was in his profession could take time to make himself an acceptable guest at the tea table with such fearful music still ringing in his ears; few of us, indeed, paid needful attention to our own personal comfort. Whatever be our quarrels, to our credit, as a body, be it said, we shrink not when the seals that close the pestilence are removed and the poor demand our aid. I was hastily sipping my tea, when my poor young friend, with his feeble body and sickly laugh, thrust his head into the office door, and carelessly asked how the cholera came on; remarking, with the usual flippancy of the thoughtless, he supposed that we were "not particularly desirous of its disappearance." Poor man! his remark grated upon my ears, for I knew the condition of his delicate wife, and that their chances would be at zero from the first they should be attacked. Something about his face, that every experienced medical eye could at once detect, and all will remember, told me the blood was at work within him. I arose, and, asking him to be seated and take some tea, questioned him a little, and intended to advise a remedy. He soon detected my fears, and hurriedly desired me not to be "looking so sharply for business." Poor man! such business was not desirable; our fees were mostly paid in tears.

I made my evening visits, and on my return found a message from his wife, requesting my immediate presence, as her husband "had been attacked an hour before." Not one hour could have elapsed since his conversation with me! Why prolong the tale? Every thing was done that three of us could suggest; one or the other of us was with him till midnight, when he died; his poor wife closed his eyes, herself as fearless, and almost as corpse-like as the cold form before her. Anticipating trouble, from her evident feebleness, I asked her condition. She replied calmly and with that extreme self-possession, only to be accounted for when the soul, subdued by sorrow, and triumphing over apprehension, looks for death as a boon from Heaven; "she was perfectly well, and as soon as we had accomplished the last sad offices she would try and get some rest."

The next day, on my return from the cemetery, where a few of the neighbors conveyed him, I called in to see the widow, and found her already past the first stage of the frightful disease. She had informed no one, and evidently wished to die. Oh! how expressive was her sad smile when I again questioned her. Again I caressed my brethren; again we went through the hopeless routine. Scarce a groan escaped her, her only seeming anxiety being the trouble she gave us. Poor child of sorrow! her young hours of life was indeed early clouded. Before midnight she also found rest in Heaven.

SIXPENCE TOO LITTLE.

While over in London, during the Industrial Exposition, my attention was one day attracted by a small crowd which had congregated close by the Church of St. Martin's in-the Fields. Now, any popular meeting has always a singular attraction for me, and whether it be two boys looking for a cent which has rolled in the gutter, or the more serious array which gethers around the detected pickpocket, or the maimed form of the man run over by the hatcher's cart, I am always sure to be in the midst of it. On the present occasion the crowd was rather an insignificant one in number, but interesting in its elements. It consisted chiefly of a laborer out of work and in distress; a nursery-maid holding an unhappy, silent child over her shoulder until it began to look purple and artificial about the face; two charity boys who were taking alternate sucks at a watery orange; a pert doctor's boy who endeavored to appear entirely above drugs, and a pale listless man dressed in fragile black, who looked so chronically hungry, that if St. Paul's Cathedral had been suddenly converted into a seed cake, one might easily have imagined him walking into it, and devouring it up to the halcony. Small as this congregation was, the temptation overtook me, and I joined the group. In the centre of the little ring formed by the spectators stood a small, shrewd looking man, holding a mouse-trap with three hen's eggs in it, in one hand, while with the other he gesticulated gracefully as he delivered the following address:

"Ladies and Gentlemen: I do not solicit your attention for the purpose of frivolous demonstrations or common-place imposture. The little exhibition which I will have the honor of placing before you, is se unpretending in its means as it is wonderful in its results, and would long before this have seemed my independence but for a series of unhappy circumstances too long and too complicated to mention. Ladies and gentlemen, you behold this mouse-trap. These eggs, ladies and gentlemen, are perfectly sound and natural—for I scorn artifice—and what is more singular, they are fresh!"

A laugh from the nursery-maid, and a hungry glare from the thin man, who, I could see, had already fried them—in imagination. The speaker having thus excited the curiosity of his auditors, went on:

"Eggs, ladies and gentlemen, are, it is well known, composed of calcareous substance for the shells, and albumen mingled with alantolde, urea and other matter for the yelk. You will perceive then that these eggs contain all the rudiments of an animal, and would, with time and proper treatment, develop themselves into gallinaceous offspring, if by a certain power, of which I am the sole possessor, the destiny of Nature was not arrested, and her designs forced into another channel. In short, ladies and gentlemen, if you will contribute the small sum which shall compensate me for my expenditure of time and labor, you shall see these three white, fresh, real, downright eggs and no mistake, changed into three white mice before your own eyes, and all in the short space of two minutes and fifty-six seconds! Eggs changed into white mice, visibly, naturally, and by aid of no necromantic delusion whatever, upon the contribution of a small sum which shall compensate for my labor!"

This tremendous announcement, accompanied as it was by an air of considerable importance, made a great impression upon the audience. The nursery maid fumbled for a refractory pocket with one hand, while with the other she held the purple child by one leg, until I thought its head would burst. She eventually produced from some secret recess among her clothes a very disguised penny, which she fluug to the magician; other coins flowed in. The doctor's boy gave his half-penny, and I think the charity boys made up a farthing between them. I was anxious to see how the fellow would get out of the dilemma, and determined, as I thought, to cover all expenses, throw him a shilling. Stragglers joined the group, and as the wizard still kept repeating his speech, picking up the pennies all the while, they pitched him coins also, until at length I calculated that he must have gotten three shillings (sterling.) But the thin man gave nothing. He seemed ashamed, and fumbled awkwardly in a pocket in which he knew there was no money, and then endeavored to look as if he had nothing but large notes about him. The magician, however, still went on with his speech and his collection, but gave no indication whatever of any intention of performing his promised feat. Presently murmurs began to be audible, and the charity boys, on the strength of their joint farthing, observed that "they'd likes to know if he was a comin' to the pint?—cos, if he warn't he might as well give back the 'browns.'" The latter suggestion was received by the crowd with considerable applause, and the medical young gentleman who carried the haskst declared emphatically that if was "all in his eye," but whether he meant the eggs, the magician, or the great Ego of which Emerson discusses, he did not take the trouble to explain. The demonstration demanded an explanation from the egg-sorcerer, who, without any further exorcism, explained himself accordingly.

He commenced by giving a short dissertation upon the value of labor, in which his took occasion to advert to the agricultural distress then prevailing, and wound up by declaring that, though he placed as small value on his exertions as any man, nevertheless his labor was worth a certain sum, under which he could not think of performing his little transformation. He regretted to say that, notwithstanding the liberality of his kind friends—here he nodded gently at the medical young gentleman, whom this condescension seemed to propitiate, for he immediately commenced whistling a popular melody, as if his mind had been suddenly relieved from some dreadful burden—he regretted that es yet the necessary sum, trifling as it was, was just sixpence short. A subdued groan of disappprobation followed this climax, and the charity boys declared vehemently that he was a "do," and that "if they had their money back" —— the coming resolve, whatever it might have been, was suddenly lost in the interior of the watery orange.

At first I was tempted to give the fellow the sixpence, and see how he would get out of the affair; but on reflection, having a natural sympathy and admiration for humbugs, I thought it would be a pity to interfers with the clever rogue, and so desisted. A few straggling halfpence were now thrown in by over-curious people with vague hopes that still the transformation would be performed; but their calculations were vain. The magician pocketed the coins, and still regretted that "there was sixpence too little." This was repeated three or four times in succession, until the audience, disgusted at this cabalistic sum, which no amount of halfpence seemed to reach, grew gradually less and less, as the bystanders wandered away, until at last the propriety of departing myself struck me forcibly; but as I turned the corner of St. Martin's lane, I looked round and saw the magician still explaining with exemplary patience to the two charity boys who alone remained, that unfortunately there was "just sixpence too little."

It is always the same, thought I, as I wended my way to the coffee-house where I usually dined—every man is sixpence short. Fortune seems to be an infinite spiral; with many resting places on the way, that men disdain, and go on climbing—climbing after the ever-receding sixpence, until they grow dizzy from the grandeur of their position, or make a false step, or tread upon a weak spot and tumble to the earth, grieving piteously after that visionary point which an immutable law of their own natures forbids their ever reaching. Russia was Napoleon's sixpence, and in pursuing it he lost a crown. Fouquet, not content with being the most powerful man in France, next excepting the King, had some visionary sixpence which led him to his ruin. White Colbert, whose sixpence at first ended where Fouquet's began, strove upwards to the prize; but when he had reached it, and pushed his rival from the seat, lo! another sixpence danced before him in the future, and his pilgrimage recommenced. Nations join in the chase. Cuba is our little sixpence. Russia's sixpence mightily resembles a Turkish piastre. And there is a little coin once lost on the field of Waterloo, and shining across the British channel in the eyes of France, for which Napoleon the Third would gladly give stout John Bull change. A YANKEE SHOEMAKER.—"You hain't no occasion for a jer nor uothin', I spose," said a jolly son of St. Crispin from the land of wooden nutmegs, as he entered a shoe establishment with his kit nicely done up in his apron.

"Wonder if I hain't," was the reply of the boss. "Why, I should like a dozen if I could get 'em; but what kind of a shoe can you make?"

"Oh, as to the matter o' that," said the snob, "I reckon as how I can make a decent sort of a craft."

"Spread your kit, then," said the boss; "I'll gives you a pair to try, and if your work suits me, I can give you a steady seat of work."

Crispin was soon hammering and whistling away, as happy as an eleam, at high-water, and the boss was called away on some business which detained him two or three hours; meanwhile, the tramper-jer had produced a thing which here some faint resemblance to a shoe, and feeling somewhat ashamed of it, hid it in a pile of leather-chips that lay on the floor, and proceeded to make another, which he had barely time to finish, when his employer entered and began to examine it.

"Look here, mister," said he, "I guess you needn't make the mate to this; it is the greatest botch that was ever made in my shop, that's a fact."

"P'raps you'd like to bet a trifle on that," said the snob.

"Bet!" responded the boss; "why, I'll bet a ten dollar bill against a hand of tobacco that there was never a shoe made in this shop half so bad as this."

"Done," said Crispin, at the same time casting a sly wink at his shopmates; "but, stop, let me see if I've got so much of the weed with me. Oh, yes; here's a whole hand of Cavendish," and laying it on the cutting-board, he ventured to suggest the propriety of having the suet-skin laid alongside of it, which was no sooner done than he proceeded to draw from its hiding-place the other shoe.

"Here, boss," said he, "you must decide the bet; say, which of the two shoes is the worst?"

"Well, I guess I'm fairly sucked in this time," replied the boss, pushing the Cavendish and shin-plaster towards the rightful owner, and throwing a ninepence to the youngest apprentice. The boy needed no farther instructions as to his duty, but was off in the twinkle of a bed-post, and soon returned with a quart of black-strap. After all hands had sufficiently regaled themselves, the shrewd Yankee put his sticks together, and bidding the boss a hearty good-by, started again on a tramp, very well satisfied with his forenoon's work.

"THE INFIDEL MOTHER."—Can it be? can you look back into the depths of those clear, blue eyes, that seek yours in such confiding innocent trust; can you deck those dimpled limbs, so "fearfully and wonderfully made?" can you watch with him the first faint streak of light, that ushers in another happy day? can you point out to him the gold and purple sunset glory? can you look upward with him to the shining host? or place in his eager hand the field flowers that bend their dewy eyes with grateful thanks, and never name "Our Father!"

When at dead of night you watch beside his sick couch; when you hush your every breath to listen to his pained moans; when every gust of wind makes your cheek grow pale; when you turn with trembling hand the healing drops; when every tick of the clock seems beating against your heart, when the little pallid face looks beseechingly into yours, for the "help" you cannot give; oh! where can you turn the suppliant eye, if you see not the "Great Physician?"

When health slowly returns, when the eye brightens and the red colors lip and cheek; when the vacant chair is filled; when the little feet are again busy! when loving arms in playful glee twine around your neck; comes there from that woman's heart of thine no burst of grateful thanks to Him who notes even the sparrow's fall?

Suppose Death comes! You fold away the little useless robes; you turn with a filiing eye from the toys and books and paths those little feet have trod; you feel over the shadowy clasp of a little hand in yours; you turn heart-sick from the happy mothers, who number no missing lamb from their flocks; a sunny ringlet, a rosy cheek, or a piping voice, gives your heart a death-pang. You walk the busy street and turn your head involuntarily when a little strange voice calls "Mother!" Oh! where can you look for comfort, if you believe not that the "Great Shepherd" folds your lamb to His loving breast?

There is perfidy at your household hearth! there are broken vows, which you may not breathe to human ear. There is treachery reaped for trust! Childhood looks on with a sad wonder; you must go backward and cast the mantle of evasion over the moral deformity. Whence shall strength come to your slender shoulders to bear this heavy cross? How silence the ready tempter's voice? Where shall all those warm affections now be gathered up? (if not in Heaven!)

Oh! you have no anchor! no rudder or compass! your little bark is adrift, at the mercy of every pitiless gale; the sea is dark and fearful; the billows mountain high; the sky black with darkness, if you turn from the Great Pilot!

TERRIBLE DISASTER AT SEA—Loss of Nearly Two Hundred Lives.—We have to record today another fearful calamity, the founderiug of a vessel at sea, with the probable loss of nearly two hundred lives.

Captain Forbes, of the brig Reuben Carver, from Sagua la Grands, brought into port this morning the captain, mate, and six of the crew of the ship William and Mary, of Bath, Maine, who were picked up from a boat at sea, in lat. 27 30, and long. 79 20, having been wrecked near Stirrup Key, among the Bahama Islands, on the 3d of May.

Captain Stenson, of the William and Mary, has furnished us the following particulars of the loss of his vessel, which was on the passage from Liverpool to New Orleans, with a cargo of railroad iron and two hundred and eight passengers, chiefly emigrants. At seven o'clock A. M., on the 3d of May, during cloudy weather and strong breezes blowing from the south-east, they passed the Hole-in-the-Wall, which is the southern part of the little island of Abaco, one of the Bahamas, nearly north of Nassau. At noon they made Stirrup Key, and then bore off about ten miles in a southerly direction. The weather grew thicker all the while, and the wind stronger, while the sea began to roll at a fearful rate. At sunset nothing could be seen of the Key, and the captain supposed he was well to the north of it, having steered west by north since meridian. At eight A. M., when he judged himself sufficiently to the north and west of the Great Isaacs, he put the ship west by south and commenced heaving the lead, but found no bottom in twenty fathoms.

About half-past eight, P. M., the vessel struck upon a sunken rock, where she hung for some time, with ten fathome water all around. After pounding heavily for fifteen minutes she got off, but immediately struck another rock within a few rods of the first, where she again pounded for some time, and again went off. It was then thought expedient to let go the anchor and prepare the boats for launching. The ship was taking in water very fast, and though the passengers worked for life at the pumps, they found it impossible to keep her free. At midnight there were four feet water in the hold, and at four A. M., with both pumps going, eight feet. The weather was very black and squally, and the sea tremendously high. Shortly after daybreak they found ten feet water in, and the vessel apparently going down. The consternation of the crowded decks at this period may be imagined, but can not be described.

All the boats, five in number, were then made ready and launched, but two of them were stove on touching the water, leaving only a small boat, and one long and one life-boat. These were manned by the captain, his mates and the crew, together with as many passengers as could be crowded into them. The remainder of the passengers were left on board, and in a few minutes after, i. e. about eight o'clock, A. M., went down with the vessel. How many perished it is impossible to ascertain, but from this account of the captain, we infer that not less than one hundred and fifty persons, men, women and children. At the time, the Great Isaacs was bearing east by southeast, about seven miles.

The several boats were separated after leaving the ship, but the captain saw, from the boat in which he was, a bark, apparently bound to Europe, hove to in the direction of the long and life boats, and he surmises that the people in them were picked up. But there is no certainty of this; and, supposing them also to have been lost, the total number of deaths will be over two hundred. The cook and steward of the William and Mary, together with two of the seamen, were among those left behind, when the small boats put off. Captain Stenson has no memorandum of the names lost, which we are consequently unable to give.

This is one of the most dreadful wrecks that we have had occasion to record for many years, and, coming so soon after the late railroad calamities, fills us with emotions of horror and gloom. [New York Evening Post, 16th.

Arrival of the Atlantic.

FOUR DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE

The U. S. mail steamer Atlantic arrived at New York on the 14th instant, in the very short run of nine days and twenty-two hours from Liverpool—bringing advices to the 4th inst.

The Cunard propeller Andes, from New York, 18th ult., arrived out on the evening of the 30th, in eleven days and twenty-two hours, mean time. The Europa, from New York 20th ult., arrived out May 1, at 11 A. M., having made the trip in ten days, fifteen hours and fifteen minutes.

Cotton at Liverpool remained quiet, but steady at previous quotations. Breadstuffs were dull, with a partial decline, in view of a thin attendance of buyers, and more favorable weather for agriculture.

The Diario Espanol says that Santa Anna has sought aid from Spain to repel an anticipated filibuster expedition from the United States.

The circular of Baring Bros. says that there is no change in American stocks, with only a moderate demand. It gives the following quotations: United States 6's bonds 110¼a111; ditto inscriptions, 109¼a110; Massachusetts sterling 5's 98a99; Pennsylvania State 5's 87a89, ditto bonds 93; Boston City 4½'s sterling 101¼.

As mentioned per Cambria via Halifax, the Earl of Aberdeen, in the House of Lords, on Friday evening 29th ult., moved the second reading of the bill for removal of Jewish Disabilities, and strongly urged the removal of the most intolerant restriction on the civil liberties of British subjects. The Earl of Shaftsbury opposed the bill, and moved it be read that day six months. He trembled at the consequences to Christianity, if Jews were admitted on a civil equality with Christians. Such measures would not expel Christianity from the earth, but they might destroy it in Great Britain. The Earl of Albermarle, the Archbishop of Dublin, and the Bishop of St. Davids, supported the bill, while the Bishop of Salisbury, Earl of Darnley, Earl of Harrowby and others, opposed it on religious grounds. A division took place, when there appeared contents (for the bill) 115; non-contents 104; the bill was therefore lost by 49 majority.

On the evening of the 2d inst. the Lord Mayor of London entertained at dinner the judges, and other legal dignitaries, and a few literary men. Mr. Ingersoll and Mrs. Stowe were present. Mr. Ingersoll made a speech. Justice Talfourd made an oration complimentary to Mrs. Stowe, to which Charles Dickens replied in the name of that lady. Mrs. Stowe is at present the guest of the Duchess of Sutherland.

Lundy, Foote & Co., the celebrated snuff manufacturers, have addressed a remonstrance to the Chancellor of the Exchequer against the proposed reduction of the duty on foreign manufactured tobacco from 9s. 6d. per lb. to 3s 6d. They say the measure, if carried into effect, will totally ruin those engaged in tobacco manufacture in Britain.

Their pecuniary embarrassments arise from the failure of the Monmouthshire and Glamorgaushire Bank, in which they were somehow entangled with respect to trust funds. The Rev. Bishops intend to pass through the insolvent court.

Twenty-seven thousand emigrants embarked at the port of Liverpool for America and Australia during the past month of April, being a larger number than in any preceding month, the increase being mostly of Irish, Germens and Dutch to America, owing to less favorable accounts by recent arrivals from Melbourne.

PRUSSIA.

The first Prussian Chamber lately voted the exclusion of Jews from all public employment. On the 26th ult., a petition on the subject, bearing the names of a thousand influential citizens, was presented to the Second Chamber. The petitioners, conspicuous among whom was the veteran philosopher, Alexander von Humboldt, demand full freedom of religious opinion, and the admission of Jews to civil offices. The reading of this petition was strenuously opposed by the Cavalier party, but the majority of the Chamber decided that it should be entertained.

SWITZERLAND.

In its sitting of the 25th ult., the Swiss Federal Council received the answers of the governments of Ticino and the Grisons, respecting the concessions to be made to Austria. Both cantons refuse, in the most positive terms, to abandon the right of asylum, and insist that the Federative Government has no power to deprive them of that right. Ticino further denies all participation in the Milan plot.

Vienna letters of the 27th says that such a vast quantity of snow and rain had fallen during the last two months in parts of Austria, that it very late, if not a very poor harvest, is inevitable. TURKEY.

Letters from Constantinople to April 18, via Paris, state that the Russian negotiations were still enveloped in mystery. It was, however, known that the united efforts of the representatives of France and England were directed towards a peaceful solution of the difficulty, and tended towards a final settlement of the Holy Places protectorate, by joint treaty between Russia, England, France and the Porte.

There had been no riot or massacre of Christians at Brousa. The foundation for the story was the discovery of a plan among the softeen, or Turkish students of theology, who at this season of the year roam about the country begging—to preach a sort of crusade against Christianity. For once the Turkish government acted with unusual energy, and 150 of the softeen were shipped off to Asia Minor.

Letters of March 24 bring details of the affray that took place on Palm Sunday, in the church of the Holy Sepulchre. These letters say that the English missionaries were turned out of the church because they behaved in an unseemly manner when the Procession of the Host passed on Good Friday. A missionary named Crawford preached a sermon outside the synagogue, while service was going on within, and indulged in invectives against the Talmud. One of the children of Israel, incensed at this, hurled a dead cat in the face of the reverend gentleman. Mr. Crawford's friends came to the rescue, the Jews supported the defender of the Mosaic rites, and a fight ensued. "It rained mud and rocks," the letter says, and the missionary and his friends were obliged to seek safety in flight.

PROGRESS OF THE CHINESE REBELLION.—The dates from China are to March 22. Nankin fell into the hands of the rebels on the 19th of February, and they have now got so far north as to threaten Shanghai, and are stated to have a force of 50,000 within a few marches of that port. Sue-Kwyng-Tsin, appointed by the emperor the chief military command of the combined attack which had been ordered on the rebels, has been worsted, and has fallen, according to some accounts, by his own hand, according to others by that of the enemy. Altogether, the affairs of the dynasty are considered to be in a most critical state, though the young emperor is endeavoring to meet the emergency with a degree of energy and disregard to antiquated Chinese maxims, which proves him to be far in advance of his predecessors.

He has appealed to his people in an edict, which printed on yellow paper, is now posted up in every public place of resort in the empire. In this remarkable document he openly acknowledges that, during the three years he has reigned, his utmost efforts have been unavailing "to restore to his people the blessings of peace;" that though two years have elapsed "since he put his army in motion" against the rebels, he has been unable either to dislodge them from the provinces they originally seized, or even to prevent their continually gaining ground; and he dwells much on his deep concern, "for the indescribable sufferings" of his people, "the rehabitants of the ravaged provinces;" he remarks, "partial victories as well as defeats are matters of common occurrence in military life;" but he attributes the frequency of their previous reverses to a slothful and trifling spirit on the part of the local officials, absence of discipline in the army, and want of union, energy, and public spirit among all classes.

He commands that all in authority should forthwith use their utmost endeavors to remedy these abuses, and to give effect to his plans for the safety of the Empire; but he remarks that it is essential to the proper conduct of affairs that he should be correctly informed of all that occurs, "without heightening or lessening the importance of facts." "Above all," says the edict, "it is necessary, in reporting to us, to state the truth without the least glossing over of facts." The Emperor details the military movements he has ordered for the annihilation of the rebels. The militia were to be organized, each village or township forming its own band, the expense being paid by the gentry and head men, who were to have the management of the force, which was not to be employed in offensive operations, but simply for self-defence. The Emperor alludes to the heavy drain on his treasury which the war has caused, but says he has that day directed the treasury to send fresh assistance to the army, and that measures will be taken (by the levying a tax on opium) for supplying ample means hereafter.

AUSTRALIA.

Advices from Melbourne are to the 25th January. Commercial accounts were satisfactory. The yield of gold continued about an average. Produce market high; provisions falling rapidly, especially flour. Price of labor was rather lower. There was no political news of any import.

One single fact, says the New York Tribune, exhibits with force the position of California, in regard to the older States. The space which the news from that quarter occupies habitually in our columns, is as great as that required by European intelligence. The demands upon our typography are thus suddenly doubled. With additional territorial annexation we shall be puzzled to accommodate the voluminous details of enterprise—the standard number of hideous disasters, showing that humanity is not deemed as precious as gold—the deadly encounters—the gigantic projects, which such policy begets.

The Norfolk Beacon states that a gold mine which promises to be very rich has recently been discovered in Tyrrell county, North Carolina. This is the first discovery of gold that has been made in the lower part of the State.

Lieutenant Jerome Napoleon Bonaparte, of the United States Army, it is said, will not visit Europe until he has served the usual term of service required of graduates of the United States Military Academy.

Col. Benton, it is stated, is to leave Missouri shortly with his family for Washington, where he designs pursuing his labors on his forthcoming work, entitled "Thirty Years in the Senate."

NIGHT SONG.

FROM THE GERMAN.

Heart, be still!
In the darkness of thy woe,
Bow thee, silently and low,
Comes to thee whate'er God will—
Be thou still!

Be thou still!
Vainly all thy words are spoken;
Till the word of God hath broken
Life's dark mysteries—good or ill—
Be thou still!

Sleep thou still!
'Tis thy Father's work of grace—
Wait thou yet before His face,
He thy sure deliverance will—
Keep thou still!

Lord, my God!
By thy grace, O, may I be
All-submissive, silently,
To the chastenings of thy rod—
Lord, my God!

Shepherd, King!
From thy fullness, grant to me
Still, yet fearless faith in thee,
Till, from night the day shall spring;—
Shepherd, King!

SUNDAY SCHOOL REPORT

Of the Franklin Street Church, Mobile, Ala., April 30, 1853.

Published at the request of the Quarterly Conference.

Mr. President and Brethren:—Through the blessing of Providence, I am able to be in my place in our Quarterly Meeting. Severe sickness prevented me from the pleasure of hearing in your last meeting, and of presenting the Sunday School Report, demanded of me by the Discipline of our Church.

Within the quarter none of our teachers or pupils have fallen by death, and our school is in a healthful condition. Our Superintendent is faithful, and greatly beloved by both teachers and scholars. He has for many years occupied his honored post.

We have a large college of intelligent, pious, laborious teachers. Their works abundantly praise them. The school, all acknowledge, is no excellent one, as to numbers and conduct. There is one thing, however, to be deprecated, and that is the small number of advanced boys, and young men, and women, engaged in the Sunday School. The question often arises, where are the children of our church-members? Where are the teens on the Sabbath day? The teens of our city, where are they? What have our pious fathers, and praying mothers, done with their sons and daughters?

It is my serious conviction that, from the present tendencies of ethical literature, the political, if not atheistical proclivities of some of the leading devotees of natural history, and more than either, the unparalleled efforts of Popery, throughout Christendom, to overturn the free school system, to inhibit the Bible from the youth of the age, and to banish it from institutions of education, give to the Sunday School institution an importance never before possessed.

Why this simultaneous effort of Catholicism, just at this time, in Europe and America, to get control of the school funds? Why this relentless crusade of Popery, first against the Bible in the common schools, and then against the schools themselves? Why is it we have in our midst, fostering under the shade of our "liberty tree," the subjects of a foreign spiritual and political despot, so devoted to him, and so averse from us, that they will not allow their children to mingle with ours, even in infant schools? Why is it that their priests and teachers, and hooded nuns, are all foreigners? It must be that they are the servants and satellites of the driveling despot of Italy, maintained here to wage exterminating hostility against our world-renowned educational system.

If Popery succeed in her warfare upon the Bible, and our system of common education, and the result followe which history and observation present us with, wherever she holds the power, our dear-bought religious, political and social institutions, and liberties, will soon be exchanged for an iron-heeled despotism like those of Italy, Austria, Sardinia, Spain and Cuba. See, as a specimen of what Popery will make any country, the lovely island of Sardinia.

"There the sky forever smiles,
But the oppressed forever weep."

Sardinia is the largest island in the Mediterranean Sea, North-west of Italy; has been for centuries under the government of Catholicism—for ages the centre and residence of hordes of priests and Jesuits; what they asked was granted—what they willed was law. The soil of Sardinia is not surpassed in point of productiveness; a more salubrious climate the world does not afford; it abounds in mineral wealth; in short, if we may believe what writers have written, the Sardinians, under a government and religious institutions which would admit of human development, would be a wealthy, happy, and intelligent people. But what do we see? In Catholic Sardinia, where a Protestant sermon has never been preached, "heretics" have never had the chance to "pollute the mind of youth, by the dangerous teachings of the Bible," there where they have things just as they will them—only fifteen persons in a thousand are capable of reading! Sardinia presents a Catholic state of things! Is it not a little too much, when such is their own showing in a country pre-eminently their own, to bear all their solicitations and their denials. The facts there contrasted with the protestations here, should open our eyes to all their prating about "conscience in education."

But I have no idea that even the triumph of this "conscientious" crusade against the Bible, and education, would result in the establishment of Popery in North America. A people have never been known to exchange a good religion for a bad, at once. People may, by the advancement of intelligence, leave off a bad system for a better one. But when the change is downwards it is from the religion which is seen to be false and corrupt, to Infidelity—Delsm—Atheism.

In France, in the days of her Robespierres, Marats, Dantons, disciples of Voltaire, Diderot and Mirabeau, it was not a choice between Popery and pure Bible Christianity, but it was a choice between Atheism and Popery, and they chose the former.

If it be our resolution to maintain the religion of our fathers, at Methodist Christians, to resist the usurpations of Catholicism, and all other specious forms, and wily presentations of error, parents must be aroused to a solemn sense of the fact that the salvation of our youth and the maintainance of the Bible, largely depends upon the efficiency of Sunday Schools.

The Bible is what Popery hates, and would conceal or destroy. Popery brings man into the priest's and confessor's presence, the Bible into a personal intercourse and communion with and accountability to God. In the nunnery, in this vicinity, the daughters of Protestants have been made to "do penance" for reading the Bible. Such is the state of the case between all real Protestants and Papists.

But, as Methodists, believing in a knowable, spiritual regeneration, we need our Sabbath Schools to guard against a species of quasi Protestantism, dressed in flowing gowns, speaking great swelling words of vanity, substituting Baptism for regeneration, setting up and pretending to exclusive church prerogative, prating about orders in the ministry, assuming that the Saviour never intended but one church on earth—one cannot consist of many—we are but one, have always been one, therefore we are the only church. They may be readily recognised.

Instead of going out into the high-ways and hedges to bring in the maimed, the halt, the blind, they creep into houses, seeking to disparage the standard of piety entertained by the "Sects," to unsettle the faith and proselyte the members, especially wealthy and influential females; they talk eloquently of the "Service," are opulent in pamphlets and tracts—"Reasons why I am a Churchman," "Methodism as held by Mr. Wesley," "Letters to a Methodist," "Cause and Cure of Schism," etc. So far as they do any thing for the salvation of sinners, we render them all honor.

Then, again, the cause of truth has much to fear from a growing laxness of doctrinal theology. Especially the tendency to compromise the doctrine of human depravity, which seems to be gaining ground in the pulpit, and amongst the masses. It cannot be conceded that the inclination to get away from the soul-searching facts, and self-abasing doctrines of the Scriptures is making progress. There is a growing disposition to soften the holy truths of God. To gain worldly applause, and the approbation of the self-secure, impenitent multitudes, it is feared men are tempted to hide the cross amidst the mists and sounds of modern "sciences falsely so called." It is undeniable that that form or pretence of religion which makes the fewest demands upon its votaries, and grants them the widest indulgences meets the readiest reception from the world.

Children, the younger as well as older, are prone to sinful indulgences, and restive under restraints. Those parents who allow their sons and daughters to grow up in neglect of Sunday Schools are only yielding them up to vice and irreligion. When parents are seen in the Sabbath sanctuary, whose offspring do not love and attend the Sabbath School, nor tread with them the sacred threshold of the temple of worship, the sad conclusion irresistably forces itself upon us, either they do not believe the Word of God, or the children have no respect for their parents, no regard for the God they adore.

Not so Joshua felt when he said, "As for me and my house we will serve the Lord." That father who, like Eli, when satisfied of the wickedness of his sons, is content, in cruel kindness, at saying, "Nay, my sons, it is no good report I hear of thee," may look for a disgraceful end of his sons, and sorrow for himself. The wayward must be restrained, the timid stimulated. If the right course of reason and restraint be used, the obedience of children will be cheerful, and such course of conduct as good parents point out, will afford them more pleasure than all the paths of sin and folly.

The sad tendency is to throw away the good old-fashioned system of restraints, coercions, discipline, catechism, under which men of renown, giants in intellectual power and moral character, were reared up in days of old.

Under the names of—"Some privileges to the young,—allow them a little latitude. What is the use of such strict regulations? O, let the young gratify their innocent curiosities! Other people's children go to the theatre, circus, dancing school, and masked ball, and mine wish to go, and I believe it is as bad to wish to do a thing as to do it;" this is working to the present injury and eternal ruin of all that is dear and sacred. My soul within me is sickened as I behold the blighting influence which are gaining foothold in many families in our Church—the carelessness about the spiritual salvation of the children. The family altar, the sacred conservator of home religion, in many families has fallen into utter discredit. Ministers in their pastoral visits are sorrowfully told, by aged, afflicted, pious (!) mothers, "It is not convenient this afternoon for us to have worship, as my daughters have company in the parlor;" "It is not convenient to have worship," in a family in which the altar fires once burned every rising and setting sun. Great God, have no family worship! Why, what has God done to that family, that He should be thus neglected—insulted—banished? "My daughters," my theatre, show, ball-going, frivolous, silk and gold-bedizened "daughters, have company" of their own sort, and therefore the pastor cannot see them, nor hold prayers with the disease-smitten, aged, pious mother! Prayer cannot be permitted in the house, even by her pastor, lest the company of the hopeful daughters should learn, to their chagrin and mortification, that they were in one of those vulgar abodes called "a Christian home." The old family Bible, that lay on the stand, is "hid out"—ignored; its place occupied with volumes of love-sick poetry, or silly novels, or "History of England," (a chess-board.) But this specimen of a Christian mother it is seen, now attends the place of worship alone. The daughters for whom she prayed in better days were engaged at entertainments, exhibitions and parties, every night, and receiving and paying calls all the day, so really when Sunday comes, they cannot get out of bed in time for Sunday School or church. It was said, "Sister .... was pale and tremulous, from weeping, when last at church." By those tears, (I have seen such in Mobile,) there hangs a story which I will relate: She has a son, an only son. Her soul was bound up in that boy. Nine years ago he became too big to spend his Sabbath mornings where little boys and girls were studying Union Primmers and Wesleyan Catechisms, laid his grievances before his gentle, good mother, and was kindly allowed to follow the bent of his will, and select his own Sunday companions and amusements. He was true to the instincts of a boy-man of thirteen years. In a few Sundays he had found his way to the cock-pit, rum-hole, race-ground and gaming table, and though he is only in his 21st year, he is a degraded drunkard and vagabond—a common street nuisance. And a few more spells of delirium tremens will change the sad scene—the mother's gray hairs will bow in sorrow—the petted son will fill a drunkard's grave!

You may censure the neglect of pastors, the inefficiency of superintendents, the want of punctuality in teachers, if you will, you may mourn over the stinginess which robs our Sunday Schools of valuable libraries, and interesting papers and periodicals, if you will, but I am more and more convinced the cause of the want of success in winning all the young people to the Sunday School, must be sought elsewhere. The parents have yielded up their children to amusements—fashion—sin! The angels would sing a new song in heaven, could they witness such a sight as one or two hundred of the parents and wards of our city, seated in God's house on the Sabbath morning in the centre of a thousand sons and daughters ranged in Sunday School classes.

If we are to believe God sincere, when instructing holy men what to write for our good, though "foolishness," gross depravity, be bound up in the heart of a child; the parent holds in his hands, if wisely used, the means of driving it far from him. [See Prov. 12: 15.] More than this: God, whom St. Paul has declared naturally and morally incapable of lying, "Commands fathers to deliver the souls of their sons from hell."

Pastors, as is my custom, may do all in their power, even to stopping children on the streets, and soliciting them to come to the Sunday School—pastors, superintendents and teachers, and vigilant committees, may do much; but unless they are aided, and constantly co-operated with by parents, failure will be the result. Our Sunday Schools will finally be closed, and our little army of Sunday School scholars will be scattered as sheep having no shepherd, to be an easy prey to the wolf of perdition.

Parents and guardians, awake to this work, and come up and engage in it heart and soul, or the rising race will forsake the Sabbath School—will seek fascinating amusements in evil company—become vicious in practice, degraded in taste, and ruined in the end! The salvation of the child is scarcely second to the desire which springs up in every regenerate soul to escape the horrors of the worm that never dies.

I would that, instead of the P. Elder, and these stewards and leaders, I had a thousand of the Bible-neglecting parents of the wayward youth which throng our streets on the Sabbath day, while no man cared to save their souls, before me—I would attempt to set before them the demands of this cause.

Cain captiously asked, "Am I my brother's keeper?" but it admits of no question as to our childrens' keeper. With every child born there comes the injunction from its Creator, "Take this child and nurse him for me, and I will give thee thy wages." Every parent is every day "nursing" for heaven or hell.

A word spoken, an example set, an impression made, is an influence infinite in its duration, and eternal in its consequences. The failure of a parent properly to discipline and educate a child, does not injure that child as an individual, alone, but sends him out an element of evil to become its propagating agent; the fatal infection spreads till, like a plague-spot on the body politic, the whole community become diseased. Like an hereditary infection, it descends from father to son, and from generation to generation.

No mortal can compute the harvests of good to man, and glory to God, resulting from the conception of Sunday Schools. Who can tell the millions of souls, directly and indirectly, owing their salvation to them. Multitudes who, but for Sunday Schools, would have been lost, have been converted there, and gone to heathen lands as heralds of salvation. Heathens have been saved through their instrumentality, and others again by these.

Many shall "blissfully, eternally reign," as the happy result of Mrs. Wesley's firmness, and prudent piety in the culture of her sons. We, ourselves, brethren, in our hopes of salvation, are but the first epistles of her praise.

I have lately seen a mother, in full communion and fellowship in the Church, and the daughter of Methodist parents, who were also present, engaged in card playing before a large and promiscuous crowd on board a steamboat. The game was not one between ladies, but between a Christian (!) mother and an irreligious young lady, who has not seen her sixteenth summer, and such gentlemen as were disposed to the "refinements" of public steamboat card playing.

Pastors, superintendents, and teachers, might doubtless make greater effort in this work than most of us do; but unless we can command the hearty co-operation of parents, the cause must drag out a sickly and dying existence. It is mainly to them we must look. If they do not second our efforts we cannot hold their children. The only hope of the Sabbath School cause lies in a suitable appeal to parents; they must feel their relations to this work—its bearings upon the existence of religion in the world.

It is a fearfully solemn thing to live, and to give life to other beings who must exist eternally, and all that eternity of being, whether of bliss of woe, must take its coloring from us! Let us feel the weight of our personal responsibilities, and then urge all parents to engage heartily in the more than angelic work of saving the rising generation from worse than orphan's woe! Effort! effort! should be the universal watchword. Eternity alone can unfold the endlessly enduring series of gracious results flowing from united and well directed effort in this work. A man is never more like Him who went about doing good, than when in the centre of a circle of youth teaching them the lessons Jesus taught. The work of inspiring in the bosoms of our children a love for the Bible, the Saviour, the Sunday School, may be fitly compared to some feebly dripping rill, amid distant and darkly shaded rocks, on some towering mountain summit, from which some of earth's greatest rivers flow. It is first a few trickling drops, then a streamlet, which a thirsty ox might consume at a draught, or a man turn at will. So the efforts of patiently enduring parents, pastors, superintendents and teachers, in their beginnings narrow and humble, swell, widen and deepen, till in the end they yield largely increasing revenues of untold bliss to man, and glory to God.

Allow me, Mr. President, and Brothers of the Quarterly Conference, to close this hasty report with a few suggestions:

First, Let every family which patronizes the school he visited once a month, if possible, by superintendent or teacher, and if practicable, let the pastor be in company. Take an exact account in every family of the number who attend Sabbath School; the number that do not attend; the number who will not attend, and the reasons why not. Let the results and records of those visits form a report which shall be read to the school once a month. This will give valuable information to the scholars, and excite a general interest every where. Parents will be more likely to send, children will be less inclined to stay away.

Second, Keep the school in session as short a time as possible; give short lessons, read short passages, sing short hymns, and make short talks. This will save the school from weariness.

Third, Constantly urge all parents to come themselves, and especially send their children. And Fourthly—

Let all the instructions be made to bear upon the spiritual well-being of the children. Direct efforts made for the immediate conversion of their souls in every lesson, if practicable. Children love the very name of Jesus; they love to hear that he loves them; they will love those teachers most, who tell them most of the Saviour's love. They love to be loved.

Fifth, Let the practicability and scripturality of infant conversion be fastened upon every mind, and labored to, and trusted in, and believingly prayed for. The New Testament plan of salvation is so plain that in order to experimental salvation the knowledge of a few simple facts, easily understood by children, is all that is needed. Indeed, the teachings of the Old, as well as the New Testament, plainly and strikingly show that infant salvation is the plan and intention of God. If the whole Church would, at once, engage and act upon this great leading principle of revealed religion, the millenium would soon burst upon the world. That in this I am not in error, you need only remark that in every case in which a Gentile was converted to Judaism, he, his children, and servants, were circumcised the same day. In each and every instance in which a man joined the Christian Church, in apostolic days, he and all his were instantly baptized.

All that is now needed to make our school all we could desire it, is a few hundred of the Sabbath-breaking teens of the city; the countenance and prayers of the parents—a few hundred additional volumes to our library, and the smiles of God upon us.

Respectfully submitted,
J. S. HUGHES, Pastor.

The best safety-valve to a boiler is a sober engineer. Congress may legislate until doomsday, but as long as the officers carry too much steam, the boats will follow after.

JOHN G. SAXE did this:

"Because you flourish in worldly affairs,
Don't be haughty and put on airs
With insolent pride of station!
Don't be proud and turn up your nose
At poorer people in plainer clothes,
But learn, for the sake of your mind's repose,
That wealth's a bubble that comes and goes!
And that all proud flesh wherever it grows,
Is the subject of irritation."

JEWISH CEREMONIES.

BY A JEW.

MR. EDITOR:—Amidst the various topics discussed from week to week in your widely circulated journal, it may not prove unacceptable to your readers to learn something of the doings of an ancient people. The subject I propose to treat is, "The customs and ceremonies of the Jews, of the present day, as they exist in central Europe." Some of your learned readers may, perhaps, be disposed to grumble and say, "Have we not Fleury, Wall, John, Allen, McCaul, Margolouth, and a whole host of writers on this subject?"

True, and my efforts are intended rather to furnish information in a more accessible form to the mass of readers, than add to the erudition of the learned few. I am at present entirely devoid of any serviceable text-book, and must draw on a somewhat treacherous memory for my material.

Ere I proceed, I think it also due to my Christian readers, to tell them that I am a very prosy, matter-of-fact man, and although the subject under discussion would afford fine scope for reflection, I must forewarn them not to expect any, inasmuch as my pen utterly refuses to note down ought but what came under the immediate observation of the writer.

Let us take the SABBATH for our first sketch. The preparations for this day usually begin on Thursday night, when—

"The busy house-wife plies her busy care,"

in the shape of kneading the dough for the Sabbath bread; for my brethren give a somewhat gastronomic interpretation to that part of the thirteenth verse of the fifty-eight chapter of Isaiah, which bids us to "call the Sabbath a delight," and the great and various culinary skill of the Hebrew matron is laid under contribution to honor the day by a goodly number of choice viands, and as the commandment in Ex. xvi. 23; "To-morrow is the rest of the holy Sabbath unto the Lord; bake that which ye will bake to-day, and seethe that ye will seethe," still holds good, the baking and the seething are objects of anxious care and earnest solicitude to every Jewish house-keeper, from Thursday night till Friday evening.

Sabbath eve is the Jew's most cheerful time—the white marks in his calendar. The poorest of them even thinks it obligatory that he should provide a good repast for this festal night; and he spends morn for a shad, a salmon, or some other fine fish, to form a Friday night's entrée, than would support his family for the ensuing three days. Nor would I have you to imagine that a love of good cheer is the sole motive for such prodigality. No, sir, the son of Abraham is too thrifty for that; he thinks he is performing a highly meritorious act, and that every cent he spends for that meal will be entered on the credit side of his sheet in "the Book of Life," where it will bear interest.

In one of the Sabbath Evening Melodies, (a species of Hebrew literature, equally authentic and instructive with the "Golden Legends" of the Catholics, which I recollect to have sung many a time, and the story of which is even now implicitly credited by the mass of the people,) we are gravely told that once upon a time there was a very poor and pious man, named Joseph, who was so hard pushed that in order to gratify his holy zeal for the honor of the Sabbath, he had to sell his little all to purchase a fish, and trust to Providence for the next week's supply. And sure enough so pious a man was not left in the lurch; for, on coming home and opening this said fish, it was found to contain a large and brilliant diamond, that dazzled the eyes of the poor Joseph—now no longer poor, but rendered independent for life.

Oil for the Sabbath Lamps, (a curious contrivance suspended from the ceiling, and having usually from six to eight lights,) is also requisite to complete the arrangements of the evening. This lamp must be lit in every household, and those who from indigence are unable to purchase the necessary oil, are told to ask it of their more favored neighbors. About sunset the pater familias, together with the male scions of his house, repairs to the synagogue, leaving all wordly cares behind: at least, he is supposed to do so. Here the Hazan or Reader commences the service by chanting a hymn, in which the Sabbath is welcomed as a bride. I shall not stop here to give the details of the Ritual—this some other time—but anticipate their arrival at home. Here the careful mother has consecrated the Sabbath by lighting the lamps, and with her daughter anxiously waits for the return of her lord.

Now he comes and blesses his children by laying on of hands, and saying to the boys, "May God make you as Ephraim and Manasseh;" to the girls, "May God make you as Sarah, Rebekah, Rachel and Leah." Then he chants a hymn, in which he welcomes the different angels, (six orders of them,) for the Talmud informs us that they preside over the Symposium on Sabbath eve, and are then very propitious to their entertainer. After this, in compliment to his better half, no doubt, (whose sex, entre nous, is sadly calumniated by the worthies of the Talmud,) he recites part of the thirty-first chapter of Proverbs, beginning with, "Who can find a virtuous woman, for her price is far above rubies?" and continuing to the end of the chapter. This accomplished, they take their seats around the well-spread supper-table, and the Baal Habayith (master of the house) pours out a glass of wine, and sanctifies the Sabbath by reciting a long prayer, and consecrating the wine. Then the cup is passed round to all the members of the family, [Hebrew] domestics included. The "breaking of bread" is then disposed of in a similar manner. The latter takes place before every meal. Untrammelled by any further ceremony, they address themselves to do justice to the dainties and substantials provided for the occasion. The meal is concluded by a grace, or thanksgiving, long enough for the Archbishop of Canterbury. It certainly would cover one of your columns. This is followed by several hymns, or rather songs, for they are more of a merry than a devotional cast. And this usually coincides Sabbath eve.

Reading is not allowed on this evening, lest one should be tempted to snuff a candle, or touch the lamps—a precaution which the Talmudists call "a hedge round the law." You recollect the commandments, "Ye shall kindle no fire throughout your habitations upon the Sabbath day," Ex. xxxv, 3. This is most strictly adhered to, and considered more binding than almost any other law; why, I cannot tell. They have Gentile servants to attend to the lights and fire, who receive their instructions before the Sabbath commences, for to bid the servant light a candle is considered be much against the law as to do it yourself; and if a candle should be extinguished by accident, and no Gentile near by, they must manage to get along in the dark. You will say this is straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel. Perhaps it is, but at all events I beg you to reserve your surprise and indignation a little longer, for we will give you ample cause yet to exercise them both to your heart's content. You will then know what St. Peter meant when he said, "Why tempt ye God, to put a yoke upon the neck of the disciples, which neither our fathers nor we were able to bear?" And also the good ground for that accusation of Jesus that they rendered the Word of God of none effect by their vain traditions.

I shall continue the subject of the Sabbath in my next; and if you think I can benefit your readers in my humble way, shall send you, from week to week, descriptions of their various festivals, weddings, funerals, etc. Meanwhile, Adieu,

Louisiana. JOSEPHUS.

FATHER TAYLOR, THE SAILOR'S PREACHER.

You have never heard Father Taylor, the Boston seamen's preacher? Well, you should go down to his church some Sunday. It is not at the court-end of the town. The urchins in the neighborhood are guiltless of shoes or bonnets. You will see quite a sprinkling of police at the corners. Green Erin, too, is well represented, with a dash of Africa, checked off with "dough-faces."

Let us go into the church. There are no stained-glass windows—no richly draperied pulpit—no luxurious seats to suggest a nap to your sleepy conscience. No odor of patchouli, or nonpareil, or bouquet de violet will be wafted across your patrician nose. Your satin and broadcloth will fail to procure you the highest seat in the synagogue—they being properly reserved for the "old salts."

Here they come, one after another, with horny palms and bronzed faces. It stirs my blood, like the sound of a trumpet, to see them. The seas they have crossed, the surging billows they have breasted, the lonely, dismal, weary nights they have kept watch, the harpies in port, who have assailed their generous sympathies, the sullen plash of the shooted dead in its vast ocean sepulchre, what stirring thoughts and emotions do their weather-beaten faces call into play! God bless the sailor! Here they come, sure of a welcome—conscious that they are no intruders on aristocratic landemen soil—sure that each added face will send a thrill of pleasure to the heart of the good old man, who folds them all, as one family, to his patriarchal bosom.

There he is! How reverently he drops on his knee and utters that silent prayer. Now he is on his feet. With a quick motion he adjusts his spectacles, and says to the tardy tar, doubtful of a berth, "Room here, brother," pointing to a seat in the pulpit. Jack don't know about that. He can climb the rigging when Boreas whistles his fiercest blast; he can swing into the long-boat with a stout heart, when creaking timbers have parted beneath him; but to mount the pulpit, Jack doubts his qualifications, and blushes through his mask of bronze. "Room enough, brother," again re-assures him; and with a little extra fumbling at his tarpaulin, and hitching at his waistband, he is soon as much at home as though he were on his vessel's deck.

The hymn is read with a heart-tone. There is no mistaking either the poet's meaning or the reader's devotion. And now, if you have a "scientific musical ear," (which, thank heaven, I have not,) you may criticise the singing, while I am not ashamed of the tears that steal down my face, as I mark the effect of good Old Hundred (minus trills and flourishes) on Neptune's honest, hearty, whole souled sons.

The text is announced. There follows no arrangement of dickeys, or breeches, or eye-glasses. You forget your ledger and the fashions, the last prima donna, and that your neighbor is not one of the "upper ten," as you fix your eye (with me) on that good old man, and are swept away from worldly moorings by the flowing tide of his simple, earnest eloquence. You marvel that these untored truths of his, never struck your thoughtless mind before. My pen fails to convey to you the play of expression on that earnest face, those emphatic gestures, the starting tear, or the thrilling voice, but they all tell on "Jack."

And now an Infant is presented for baptism. The pastor takes it on one arm. Oh, surely, he is himself a father, else it would not be poised so gently. Now he holds it up, that all may view its innocence, and says: "Is there one here who doubts, should this child die to-day, its right among the blessed?" One murmured spontaneous "No," bursts from Jack's lips, as the baptismal drops lave its sinless temples. Lovingly the little lamb is folded, with a kiss and a blessing, to the heart of the earthly shepherd, ere the maternal arms receive it.

Jack looks on and weeps, and how can he help weeping? He was once as pure as that blessed innocent! His mother, [illegible] covers her, often invoked heaven's blessing on her son; and well he remembers the touch of her gentle hand, and the sound of her loving voice, as she murmured the imploring prayer for him, and how has her erring boy redeemed his youthful promise? He dashes away his scalding tears with his horny palm, but, please God, that Sabbath, that scene, shall be a talisman upon which memory shall ineffaceably inscribe:

"Go, and sin no more!"

PRAYING TO SAINTS.

Adam Clarke thus comments on the account of the rich man calling on Abraham:

"He cried and said, Father Abraham, have mercy on me," etc. There was a time when he might have prayed to the God of Abraham, and have found mercy; now he dares not approach that God whom in his life-time he had neglected, and he addresses a creature who has neither power nor authority to bless. This is the only instance in the Bible of praying to saints, and to the confusion of the false Popish doctrine, which states it to be necessary and available; let it forever be remembered, that it was practised only by a damned soul, and then without any success.

Burdens Imposed on Catholics.

WHAT PART OF THE SCHOOL FUND BELONGS TO THE ROMAN CATHOLICS?—The Cincinnati Gazette to solve this problem publishes the following statistics respecting the pecuniary burdens borne by "good Catholics" in Auburn, New York:

"The whole amount of taxes assessed on the people people of Auburn, in 1852, was eleven thousand two hundred and thirty-nine dollars and seventy-seven cents. Of this sum the Roman Catholics paid only two hundred and twenty dollars and thirty-four cents! During the same year nearly four thousand dollars were expended by the Overseer of the Poor, and he states that more than two thousand six hundred and seventy dollars were distributed among the Roman Catholic paupers of the petition for relief from grievous oppression and persecution; they have suffered in being taxed to support the Common Schools!

"The whole amount paid by town of Auburn, in 1852, for the support of Common Schools, was two thousand seven [illegible] and twenty-nine dollars and [illegible] three cents, and of this sum the Papists paid [illegible] three dollars and fifty cents!

"Thus it appears, says the Gazette, that for every dollar the Catholics have paid into the treasury of the town of Auburn, they have received twelve dollars and eleven cents from the Overseer of the Poor, and for every dollar they contribute to the Common School Fund, they have received six dollars and a half in return. These are facts of general application, and will be substantially true of our whole country, though there may be a few cities and localities where the result would not be quite so disproportioned."

Well may the editor add, "Yet is it left to the effrontery of Jesuit priests to complain of a system by which Protestants are heavily taxed to give an education to the children of Catholics. They insist on having [illegible] to pay for educating children in the despotic principles of Rome."

A Bow Drawn at a V[illegible]

Some time since as I was passing along the street, I saw an acquaintance standing upon a corner reading very attentively one of the glaring theatre bills which are every where posted. Stepping up behind him, I exclaimed in an earnest tone of voice, "Look to God!" and passed on, raising my heart to God in earnest prayer that the Holy Spirit would lead him to renounce his sins, and look in earnest the salvation of his soul. [illegible] time after this I saw a man on the opposite side of the way crossing over to meet me. When we came together, he said, Do you recollect addressing me at the corner of the street one day, with the exhortation to "look to God!" Yes, I replied: Well, said he, that has done me more good than all the sermons I ever heard. That sermon, "Look to God," went to my heart. I had been in the habit of visiting theatres, but I have never been since, and never mean to go again. By the grace of God I trust I have abandoned my sins, and by looking to him have found salvation to my soul. I am now a member of the Evangelical church. [N. Y. Observer.

STATE TEMPERANCE CONVENTIONS.

Two of big character in their representation, and great weight in their future influence, were held the past month: That of Mississippi, in Jackson, May 4, composed of nearly two hundred members; and that of Alabama, in Selma, May 18, in which between twenty and twenty-five counties were represented by upwards of one hundred and fifty delegates.

The Southern Organ, from which we derive our information, represents them as harmonious in spirit, and full of the right kind of spirit. The names of those engaged speak for themselves, and show that the Liquor Reform, in these two great States, is led on by the right men.

The President of the Mississippi Convention was Gen. P. Henry, of Madison. A State Reform League, consisting of twenty-five, was appointed to memorialise the Legislature, and procure the passage of a law, the main points of which are embodied in the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the present license system, instead of remedying, seems to nonrish and strengthen the vice of drunkenness—is demoralising and injurious to the public peace, while the unrestricted trade in ardent spirits would be still more fatal and ruinous; we, therefore, deem it necessary that all retail drinks at bar-rooms, and tippling-houses, should be prohibited; and that no license to retail spiritous liquors shall be granted by the corporate authorities of any town or village, unless the applicant shall present with his application for license the written recommendation of a majority of the voters and female heads of families within such town or village—nor by the Boards of Police, unless such applicant shall present with his application for license, the written recommendation of a majority of the voters and female heads of families within five miles of the place at which he proposes to retail liquors."

The Alabama Convention was ably presided over by Hon. Price Williams, and a similar State Reform League appointed. Of course this Convention stood to the "Alabama Law." And they are already inquiring into the opinions of candidates for the next Legislature on the subject. These movements are indeed auspicious, and we cannot allow ourselves to think otherwise than that they will have the hearty coöperation of Christians and philanthropists. Who of them favors the great evil they seek to destroy? Let him stand out!

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

TABLE RAPPINGS NOT SPIRIT RAPPINGS.

Dear Sir:—Inasmuch as great mischief has been done, and many still humbugged upon the subject of table-rappings, I feel it a duty that I owe, at least to my friends, to present this subject, as I conceive, in its true light, that they may be prepared to detect imposition.

That the table will perform astonishing feats is a fact beyond a doubt. And that it will answer questions is equally true. But that it will answer always correct, is not.

That it is done through the agency of spirits or ghosts is an absurdity too daring to be countenanced by thinking people. That it is a subject easy to be understood you will agree when you test it.

I have experimented upon the table rappings to my entire satisfaction, and to the satisfaction of scores of others. I have often placed a man upon the table, and caused it to rise, and stand upon one leg. I have caused it to move through the house, dragging a man weighing two hundred pounds. I have caused it to rise on one side when a gentleman or lady would place their entire weight on the side raised, and thus bring them up.

Now we will speak of answering questions. There is no certainty in answering questions. It is possible, however, to answer questions correctly. To explain this we must give the principle, as we conceive, upon which the tables act:

First, a table is placed on the floor, around which some half dozen persons stand or sit, and place their hands upon the table, for some twenty-five or thirty minutes. The table will become charged with electricity, and every body may become what is termed mediums, and impart electricity.

When the table is charged there is a close connection between the minds of the mediums and the table, so much so that the wills and mental efforts on the part of the mediums will cause the table to act.

For instance, you will place your mind upon a definite number—the mediums keeping their minds off of any number, and simply will it to rise, and tap the number mentally. Upon this principle it will tap correctly every time. There must be concentration of mind.

The secret in answering questions is this: one who asks questions gives his own answers. He wills the number of taps requested to answer his own questions. A counteraction of mind will confuse the answer.

And now, sir, for what I have said above in regard to the table acting, my reputation stands pledged. And when I am not on my work, I am at home in Orion, prepared at any time to demonstrate all that I have said.

If you think it will do any good to publish this do so, if not just lay it under the table, and let the table act upon it.

L. P. Golson.

Note by Editor:—Don't know that it will do any harm. It takes the sheet off the ghosts, and that is a good service to nervous people that have heard of these rappings. Meantime, we hope to be pardoned for saying that "mediums" are many and misleaders few. Rapping-tables may not be meant, but there is a standing text on this wise: "It is not reason that we should leave the word of God and serve tables." Acts 6:2.

LETTER FROM ENGLAND.

[Special Correspondence of the Advocate.]

Financial Movement.

London, May 5, 1853.

[The introductory remarks of our Correspondent, touching the calling and character of the financial meeting of the 22d and 23d of April, have been anticipated by an Editorial of last week, and are omitted here. He proceeds with a detailed and interesting account.]

Owing to the extra demands and somewhat shorter supplies of the period of agitation during which we have passed, several of the Funds of Methodism are heavily burdened with debt, especially the Contingent or Home Mission Fund, the Worn Out Ministers' Fund and the Childrens' Fund. The Law Expenses of the Body have risen, also, to about £7000; and the erection and furnishing of New Kingswood School has not been effected without leaving a debt of between £6000 and £7000. Altogether the liabilities of the Connexion and accumulated to the amount of £30,779, exclusive of Chapel Debts.

In several particulars, also, our existing financial system has been found to work badly. Some five and twenty years ago, in consequence of a deficient supply of houses in the circuits for the married ministers, an arrangement was made by which a circuit, incompetent to support a married minister, might be allowed to pay a junior married minister appointed to labor in such circuit only the allowance of a single man, the Contingent or Home Mission Fund adding £24, £35, or £40, according to the number of years the minister had been in the work. This regulation, however, had been found to work very badly. Circuits, instead of making an effort to find houses for married ministers, have been very content to have the labors of a married and more competent man for the allowance of a young unmarried man, and have loaned on the Contingent Fund for aid in such a case; while the hardship to many excellent men, moving from place to place, with no house found for them, and a very scanty allowance, has been very great.

This evil has been aggravated since the existence of the Theological Institutions, which came into operation seventeen years ago. The ordinary term of instruction in these Institutions is three years; but the third year at the Institution has been hitherto reckoned ne one year traveled. So that all the ministers educated at the Institutions (a large proportion of those recently called out,) have, in fact, been eligible to marry after three years labor in the circuits, instead of four. When none were eligible to marry who had not traveled four years, the circuits did not meet the demand for houses for the married ministers. Of course they were less likely still to do so, when many of them married after but three years of actual labor. The operation of these two causes together has begun, of late, to tell fearfully upon the proportion of houses to married men, and upon the funds of the Contingent Fund. Last year 133 married ministers were appointed to circuits without houses, to whose maintenance £5056 have been, or will be, paid from the Contingent Fund for the year—the total income of which is estimated at £9522, (exclusive of the Reserve Fund for Special Afflictions, Additional Traveling Expenses, Current Law Expenses, and other Extraordinaries.) So that there have remained for the present year only £4770, to be divided among poor and dependent circuits applying for aid. Thus more than one-half of the "Yearly Collection" has come to be diverted from its original Home Missionary objects. And what makes the matter worse is, that many of the circuits to which these junior married ministers are appointed, if they had not had the connexional arm to lean upon, would, as they could, long ago have provided and furnished preachers' houses, and supported, without or with much smaller assistance, their additional preacher as a married man. To the ministers themselves, also, the hardship has been very great. Of the 133 appointed last Conference, 16 had traveled ten years and upwards, and several more than sixteen years; and yet no house was provided for them.

For the ensuing year the prospect is still worse. It is estimated that there will be 153 married ministers without houses, and that £5675 will be required to meet their case.

It is clear that this cannot go on. Something must, before long, be done to stay the growing evil; and the sooner the attempt is made the easier will be its accomplishment. Houses must at once be provided for the married ministers, and the number marrying, year by year, should, if possible, be reduced. The circuits, too, which have lately had the services of an experienced and no longer recently married man for the pay of a single man, should make an effort to maintain, as far as possible, the wife of their minister. As for the children, they have for many years been all supported out of a common fund, raised in equitable proportions by all the circuits together. £6 6s. are allowed for the maintenance of each child, and the cost of the whole number is divided among the circuits according to the proportion of members in each. This plan has worked admirably. But, as in consequence of the third year spent at the Theological Institution being counted to the student as if it had been actually spent in labor on the field, the number of married ministers has increased beyond its former proportion to the total number of preachers in circuit-work, and to the number of members in the Connexion, it is plain that the charge upon the circuits towards the maintenance of the children must have been gradually increasing for years past.

For a similar reason the number of children eligible for education at the two schools for preachers' children, and (if not at either of the schools, which are far too small to meet the requirements of the Body,) receiving an allowance for education from the Childrens' Fund, has also increased beyond its former ratio. No wonder, then, that, on these two accounts, the Childrens' Fund, that is, the fund for maintaining and educating the preachers' children, is in arrears. These causes would all have operated, if there had been no agitation, and indeed had made themselves seriously felt before the agitation commenced. But, of course, the agitation has exceedingly aggravated the disturbance which they had begun to produce in the financial relations of the Body. We have lost 80,000 members, and many circuits which formerly maintained two or more married ministers, have been, or must soon be, compelled either to give up one or two of their ministers altogether; or, where they had maintained a married minister, to take only a single man. There are as many ministers to support, as many children to maintain and to educate, but 80,000 fewer members to do the work.

It will be needful, then, in order to remedy this state of affairs—not only that some circuits, which have hitherto relied unduly on Connexional aid, should exert themselves to maintain a married minister, as such, instead of merely paying him as a single man, which, notwithstanding the agitation, not a few are well able to do—but that, in some way, a check be put upon the disproportionate increase of marriages among the ministers. But to accomplish the former of these objects as speedily as desirable, it will be necessary to have a fund to aid circuits in furnishing houses for married ministers, as it is not to be expected that, within a year or two, especially under present circumstances, 153 new houses should be furnished, without such aid. For a few years, also, some of the circuits which shall be induced to furnish houses for their married minister, instead of paying him as if he were a single man, will need more or less help from the Connexion, until their ordinary and home revenue has grown up to their demands.

Chapel Debts, also, formed another and a principal subject of conversation and discussion at the late meeting.

Of old time, it was an accepted doctrine among Methodists in England that a man-agenbls debt was rather a good thing. Some gloried in our debt, as John Bull has often boasted of his unwieldy national debt. Now, however, this doctrine is exploded, and debts are decided to be evil, and only evil. Unfortunately we have an immense amount of Chapel Debts. It is earnestly desired that, by means of a capital fund to begin with, and to be lent, without interest, and in certain porportions to the money raised locally, the repayment to be by yearly instalments, provision may be made for the gradual but final extinction of all chapel debts, and also a fund established to assist in the erection of chapels, free from debt.

Such were not by any means all, but the principal, points brought under the notice of the late meeting.

To do any thing to meet the present emergency, it was plain that deeds, as well as explanations and arguments, were required. At first it was thought of raising £50,000 to pay off all existing debts on Connexional Funds, and leave a comfortable margin, or rather, I should say, a pretty sum in hand, with which to commence operations in endeavoring to readjust our system. Eventually, however, and almost by acclamation, at the suggestion of the Rev. William Arthur, the figure was raised to £100,000, in order that the Chapel Debts, as well as Connexional Funds, might be dealt with.

The meeting was opened by the President (Rev. John Scott,) in a luminous and admirable expository address. Our honored and beloved President, however, is, I grieve to say, again, as at this time last year, in a precarious state of health. The weight of these financial arrangements and anxieties, added to the general responsibilities of his Presidential office, and his duties as Principal of our Normal Institution, have proved too much for him. This affair over, however, we have good hope that he will rally again. He was unable to be present throughout the deliberations of the Committee, and in his absence, Dr. Bunting presided. The Doctor was himself, as in his younger days. The vigor of his mind, wisdom of his counsels, and precision and felicity of his language, have seldom been exceeded in former times. By way of giving your readers a taste of the Doctor's racy manner, when engaged in free conversational discussion on matters of business, I insert an extract from one of his speeches while in the Chair, as excellently and very characteristically reported in the Watchman, whose report of the whole meeting is capital:

"Now, with regard to the Contingent Fund, the great answer to the question as to what measures had been taken to prevent further debts was, that it proceeded to stop a great leak, which for years past had been existing, to stop the system of circuits throwing obligations on that fund which should be met by their own collections. At the same time, it was a matter of considerable anxiety that, during what he might call their transition state, there would be difficulties. He owned some apprehension about that. It was not quite clear that the relief would be so general as could be wished; but a great deal would be done. And, until then, they must make up their minds, as members of the connexional committees, and those of them who were ministers, as members of the Conference, to act sternly and rigidly on that great principle, and not allow themselves to be influenced by clamor, or something like clamor. Suppose a circuit should ask for assistance, if it were shown that that circuit could not and would not readily support their ministers, they must, without two hours' talking, be put an end to! (Hear.) They must resist the professers and practisers of the 'pathetic.' (Hear, hear, and others.) It must be a matter of dry consideration, as to the justice and the honesty of the thing. He hoped they would learn a lesson of that sort from the obligations which had come upon them. He had no notion of the thing being thrown entirely upon the laity. He hoped they all would do their duty, and, having done it, that it would be a good discipline for them, and have a very useful effect upon them. Every man then would ask, whether each and each a circuit should have an additional minister, without its being proved that the expenses can be met; and the party would remember that each was bringing on himself an obligation. It was a mortgage on his own pocket, which, if he was an honest man, he was bound to look after. The great part of this difficulty had been created by an undue increase in the number of ministers; more especially during the paroxysms of pleasure and zeal, and every thing good, called forth by the great Centenary movement. They had begun to imagine that they might go on to any length. He was not against going on, (hear) but let there be means for going on. If, instead of going on till they got a large debt, they had diminished the number of ministers, they would not now have been in such a difficulty. In a spirit of enterprise, they might look on a certain locality, and send it a preacher; but some other locality had perhaps been tried for ten, twenty, or even thirty years, and had rendered nothing like a proof that it ought to have any continuance of such assistance, and let it, therefore, be removed from the latter to the former sphere of labor. That was Old Methodism. The doctrine was laid down in the Minutes drawn up by John Wesley himself, and there they would find it advocated again and again."

The principal part, however, in the discussion was taken by the laymen, especially by Mr. Heald.

Resolutions were passed embodying the views of the meeting on all the points in question. A subscription was immediately commenced, which rose, in the course of the consultations, to £10,000. Mr. Heald subscribed £1000; our noble and humble Mission Treasurer, Mr. Farmer, £1000; Mr. Wilkes, of Wolverhampton, who gives seven guineas a day to the Missions, promised 1000 guineas; and many smaller, but very handsome, subscriptions followed. Several of the gentlemen said they were resolved that the £100,000 should be raised, and if this was not done at the first course of meetings, they must be called together a second time, "and go at it again."

The debts (nearly £40,000) are to be paid off; £7000 are to be set apart as a fund to assist circuits, at this present emergency, in furnishing houses for married men. From the Conference of 1854 the present plan of circuits receiving married men, on the allowance of single men, aid being granted to these "single married men" (as we technically and amusingly call them,) from the Contingent Fund, is finally to cease and determine. For a few years, indeed, some of the circuits will thus have to maintain these married men, as such—instead of paying them single men's allowances—will require some help, in so doing, from the Contingent or Home Mission Fund. But, on the whole, after the Conference of 1854, the Contingent or Home Mission Fund is to be reserved ("extraordinaries" excepted,) for pure Home Mission work; that is, the aid of really poor circuits in thinly populated parts of the country, or in dark and uncultivated neighborhoods. No doubt this will materially help the Fund itself. Besides which, it is proposed, whenever convenient, to hold a Home Missionery meeting (as well as one for Foreign Missions) every year. And thus, no doubt, the revenue of the Fund immediately and exclusively devoted to Home Missionary purposes, will speedily rise to £15,000 or £20,000. This will enable us more fully to "preach the Gospel to the poor."

It is also resolved to request the Conference, for the future, not to allow any young ministers to receive allowance as married men, from any source, until they have actually labored four years in circuits. Yet those who have passed three years at the Institution previously to being appointed to a circuit, will be ordained and received in full as ministers, after three years labor in circuits, this being considered for them as ample probation.

And, for the present, it is advised that the number of ministers in the field be not increased, but rather that it be allowed gradually to go down, until there is an easy proportion between the number of ministers and that of members.

The time allowed for the completion of the £100,000 subscription is till the Conference of 1855. Next Conference will revise and determine finally the details of the plan now proposed; and a sub-committee has been appointed to prepare the plan fully for consideration by the ensuing Conference.

Presentation of Mr. Farmer's Portrait to the Connexion.

This matter was taken up twelve months ago by a few of the leading laymen of the Connexion. It has been managed very quietly—no minister being allowed to take part in it—and the result is a superb portrait, painted by Mr. Grant, perhaps the first portrait painter in the Kingdom, which, the evening before the great meeting of which I have given an outline, was publicly presented, in honor of Mr. Farmer, to the Connexion, to be hung in the great room of Centenary Hall, and to be confided to the custody of the General Missionary Committee. That was a beautiful meeting. Dr. Bunting, in the absence of the President through indisposition, presided. Mr. Edward Corderoy, who you may remember was the chief speaker at the meeting held in the same room, twelve months before in honor of Drs. Bunting and Newton, was also the principal speaker on this occasion. And a more chaste, true, and beautiful eulogy, than that which he on this occasion pronounced, it will not be easy to remember. I regret to say, however, that Mr. Farmer's health seems to be failing.

Great Annual Missionary Meeting.

This was held on Monday last, after the usual preceding services both upon the Sunday, and some days of the foregoing week. James Heald, Esq., took the Chair. The meeting was very crowded,—very deeply moved—piously enthusiasted. Very many friends from all parts of England were present, making it a truly central and representative, I may say a truly connexional-meeting. It was throughout good. Dr. Hannah, as usual, led off after the reading of a very admirable and deeply interesting report; and a first speech from Dr. Hannah always gives a fine tone to a meeting; and the following speakers well sustained, and indeed warmed up to an extraordinary height this good feeling. Two of our younger, indeed of our quite junior ministers, took part in the meeting; and the eloquence and power of their speeches speak highly for the endowments of our younger men. Mr. Rattenbury's speech, however, was the most piously impassioned, and produced the deepest and intensest feeling. He is perhaps our most popular preacher. Dr. Newton spoke, in the position he always occupies, before the collection. He told the meeting he was "on the bright," not the shady, "side of seventy." The proceeds of the collection are not yet announced. But the Chairman gave £500 towards the China Mission, and several minor but handsome donations were presented. No doubt the collection was in advance of last year. In the evening of the same day a lovefeast was held in City Road Chapel, which was distinguished by a remarkable influence and unction.

So closed a most hopeful anniversary. Be assured that Methodism is again rising, and in more consolidated strength than ever. All are hopeful, very many are prayerful. Our God will help us. Of the state of the mission work I have not left myself space to give even a sketch.

A CHILD'S THOUGHTS.

The idea which runs through these lines, and which is so beautifully and naturally carried out, it is said was expressed by a little boy five years old. The whole piece is true to a child's fancy.

O, I long to lie, dear mother,
On the cool and fragrant grass,
With nought but the sky above my head,
And the shadowing clouds that pass.

And I want the bright, bright sunshine,
All round about my bed,
I close my eyes and God will think
Your little boy is dead!

Then Christ will send an angel
To take him up to him;
He will bear me, slow and steadily,
Far through the ether dim.

He will gently, gently lay me
Close to the Saviour's side,
And when I'm sure that we're in heaven,
My eyes I'll open wide.

And I'll look among the angels
That stand about the throne,
'Till I find my sister Mary,
For I know she must be one.

And when I find her, mother,
We will go away alone,
And I will tell her how we're mourned
All the while she has been gone!

Oh! I shall be delighted
To hear her speak again—
Though I know she'll never return to us—
To ask her would be vain!

So I'll put my arms around her,
And look into her eyes,
And remember all I said to her,
And all her sweet replies.

And then I'll ask the angel
To take me back to you—
He'll bear me, slow and steadily,
Down through the ether blue.

And you'll only think, dear mother,
I have been out to play,
And have gone to sleep beneath a tree,
This sultry summer day.

METHODIST PRESS.

A New Abolition Agency.—Uncle Tom's Cabin is now generally regarded as a successful political pamphlet. Foreignors have taken it up and are using it as a powerful anti-American ally. Its party is looked on as the friends of every country but their own. What will our readers think when informed that the California Christian Advocate, the official organ of the M. E. Church, North, has constituted itself an agent for this fiction. The Advocate of 27th April, in an editorial on the subject says a large supply of Uncle Tom has been procured, and announces to Californians:

"The genuine article, complete in one volume, a copy of which we will give to every new subscriber to the Californin Christian Advocate for one year from the 1st of May next. We will give it to old subscribers who wish it for fifty cents. The work will be mailed to any part of the State, or it can be had at our office, next door to Adams & Co's Express, San Francisco. The postage on the book will be only ten cents to any part of the State. This offer is made on our sole responsibility."

"The terms of subscription to the paper are $5 in advance per year, when taken at the office or by mail, and six dollars when delivered by carriers. Persons sending us five dollars may have the Advocate mailed to their address, and shall receive a copy of Uncle Tom's Cabin gratis."

And is the Methodist Church, North, degenerating into an Abolition Society? We observe that the secular press in California, administers a scorching castigation to the Northern organ. The abolition sign has been too hastily run up and will have to be taken down.

The Towline.—A corrospondent of the S. C. Advocate, and member of the S. C. Conference, thus works up the courage of his Conference brethren to the missionary collections. Let those "whom it concerns," be warned in time to "come out full and fair, and far ahead:"

"Shipmates, don't you remember how an officer of a certain noble craft, the Alabama by name, twitted us, and offered us a towline last winter? And do you remember how the planks we tread shot on and came out full, and fair, and far ahead? But see now how we are put to disadvantage; and see too that the Alahama after seeing our best done will have six good long weeks in which to bring up should she find herself astern. I shudder when I think of the towline; for that little officer with specs on nose has a tongue as well as an arm, and I should not like to hear the words in which, methinks, he would make a second tender of his tow. What a field for emulation, noble emulation, is here! But seriously, brethren, I fear our missionary collections will fall far behind, unless there be a strong effort, and a long effort, and an effort together!"

Obit et Hic Jacet.—The following bit of news is from the Wes. Texas Banner, of May 28. Verily, there is a fascination in the thing we dread! Rev. Mr. Rottenstein was editor of the Banner. Rev. R. W. Kennan, member of Texas Conference, give notice of changes in the following brief article:

"We are requested to state that Rev. Geo. Rottenstein will hold Episcopal service at the Courthouse on Snbbath next at eleven A. M." [San Antonio Ledger.

"We beg leave to be excused, as we have not yet found silk which will not rattle for a gown."

"The above appeared in the Banner of the 12th March. I suppose the gentleman has found the requisite article, or concluded to take the 'rattling silk,' as he has resigned his credentials as a Methodist E. minister, and applied for orders in the Episcopal Church.

"In this connection I would state that the Banner will be regularly issued and sent to its subscribers, and though Mr. R. is no longer editor, I trust that the friends of the paper will find no reason for complaint. Rev. S. B. Cameron will take charge of the editorial department for the present, assisted by Rev. F. S. Potway, and others; rest assured that it will be faithfully and efficiently attended to."

A correspondent, of the 19th May, writes: "The Southern Baptist Convention, which adjourned yesterday, resolved to make New Orleans the central point of a mission which is to bear on the whole Valley of the Mississippi, and $25,000 is to be raised for the purpose of giving the project vitality—$4000 of which was immediately pledged by the members of the Convention. The mission is especially designed to operate against the progress of the Roman Catholic Church in that section, and the Rev. Dr. Fuller, one of the most distinguished Baptist divines in the Union, and the pastor of a flourishing congregation here, was recommended as particularly calculated for the charge of the mission; but the report, at Dr. F.'s intercession, was finally adopted without this recommendation."

METHODISTS AND EPISCOPALIANS.

The Episcopal Recorder has taken an airing in the person of its editor, or a contributor, and seen some things, and brought home sound reflections and put them in print:

"In travelling lately through a retired section of the country which, about the time of the revolutionary war, was almost entirely in the hands of Episcopalians, we were struck with the fact that scarcely an individual of our communion is now to be found. In several neighborhoods where Episcopal Churches once flourished, their very existence has become a tradition; and in others where the material fabric still remains, a mournful and dilapidated monument of the past, the spiritual edifice has passed away entirely. Indeed, so completely and remarkably is this the case, that in some of these very communities there are persons past middle age who have never witnessed the Church service, or heard an Episcopal minister, or had the opportunity of doing so. And yet this region is not one hundred miles from two of our large cities, where our Church is found rising in wealth, and invested perhaps with greater influence in proportion to her members, than any other society of Christians.

"It must not be supposed, however, that the section of country to which we have referred is entirely destitute of religious privileges, or religious influence. On the contrary we doubt whether there is any part of the United States which, in proportion to its population, is better supplied with places of worship. In conversation with a very intelligent physician, residing in a small town that is embraced within the range of country of which we have been speaking, he counted some twenty-five of those little rustic sanctuaries within a circle whose radius does not extend more than twelve or fifteen miles from his house. The fact is that the whole country is full of them; and we were acquainted in any part of the world where there are so many professing Christians in proportion to the population. A gentleman, at whose house we spent the night, told us that six out of eight of the persons whose lands immediately adjoin the plantation on which he resides are Church members. He himself is one; and we observed, in riding the country that about every second man he met was addressed by him as 'brother.'"

The Recorder thinks, (and we agree,) considering the common stock derivation, the likeness of doctrine, the relations of Methodists and Episcopalians should be those of amity. Surely they ought. Those of all Christians ought to be. But the bellicose and proselyting hyper-church-manship of the parties makes it otherwise; and will, as long as there is anything in Methodism worth contending for. For this we are responsible, unless we are to incur a responsibility, that of letting judgment be taken against the truth by default.

The Recorder says some things in this article we beg to commend to our nearer neighbors. May it sink into their minds:

"We have often thought that it would greatly extend the usefulness, and add to the efficiency of the Episcopal Church in this country, if she could be prevailed upon to adopt some modified form of itinerancy. Our laborers are almost exclusively parochial. It is true that our bishops are itinerants of a very high order, and a large portion of their aggressive power is due to this fact. We want to have itinerant missionaries, also, but then our missionaries are exclusively, we believe, local in their labors. Why this is so we cannot tell; and we would respectfully submit to the wisdom of those who have such matters in their charge, whether a corps of travelling preachers might not, in a sparsely settled population, and amidst the difficulties of frontier life, render most important and effective aid, in extending, what some of us are so much disposed to boast of, and value so highly—'the Gospel in the Church.'

"Why is it that the laborious and self-denying men to whom we have referred, in every where throughout our country the pioneers of the Christian faith? What if in this broad land is so very secluded and desolate, that it has never been visited by some Methodist herald of the cross? Why shall we look with indifference upon the labors of those brethren?

"Nay, what is worse, shall we with contemptible fastidiousness sneer at their illiterate zeal, and scorn their rough, but sometimes effective eloquence, because it sometimes speaks false grammar? Ah, how many communities are there in these United States which the glad tidings of salvation have never have been proclaimed if the work had depended exclusively upon 'the ministers of apostolical succession?'

"We are far from undervaluing our advantages in this respect, but surely there is such a thing as placing an undue estimate upon them; and thus sacrificing the substance for the shadow.

"Our opinion is that the best thing which our Church can do at this time, would be to emulate the zeal, and imitate the plan of far-reaching onterprise of the Methodist itinerancy."

Colored Church Members.

The Methodist Church, South, reported in 1849, as the whole of the colored Members.....137,
Baptists, in 1847, had.....100,
Presbyterians.....15,
Other denominations.....200,

which we presume is now at least three hundred thousand. Taking the adult slave population, it will be found that the report of the professors of religion is as great among them as the whites.

Wise men say nothing in dangerous times. The lion called the sheep to ask her if his breath smelt; she said "Aye," and he bit off her head for a fool. He called the wolf and asked him for flatterer. At last he called for the fox and asked him. "Truly," said he, "I have got a cold and cannot smell."

HYMENEAL:

MARRIED—At Robinson Springs, Ala., on the 19th April, by the Rev. Olin Capers, Mr. JOHN ZEIGLER to MARTHA EMMA, daughter of Rev. John Salo.

OBITUARY:

DIED—On the 27th of March, 1853, in Winston, Miss., Rev. SAMUEL AVERY, in the full triumph of faith.

He died as he lived, a Christian and minister in the M. E. Church, South. He served as a volunteer in the last war with Great Britain. He moved in 1820 to Alabama, where he sought out the missionary, who at that time was Rev. R. Paine, (now Bishop,) or else Samuel Patton, I being too young to recollect which was first. His house became the preacher's home.

In 1835, or '36, he moved to Mississippi, where he finished his career. He was cluss leader from my first recollection—was soon licensed to exhort, and then to preach—in all of which he sustained himself as a meek Christian. He has left a large family to mourn his loss, with an almost heart-broken widow. Forty years, if not more, he spent in the Church as an active member.

H. AVERY.

DIED—Of congestive fever, on the 9th May, Mrs. ALABAMA SMITH, of Noxubee co., Mississippi.

She was born in 1825, and "born again" in 1840. Unexpectedly, both to herself and friends, on the third day of her illness, she found that she was nearing the thundering cape of death! "Is it possible that I am dying!" said she to her weeping husband, "I cannot realize that I am, I feel so quiet and free from pain." Being assured that she was dying, she lost no time, and forthwith made known her wishes to her husband in relation to her little ones—charged him to keep them together, and train them for God and the Church.

She then called for each child by name, and left her dying blessing with them, in the form of an exhortation, to be good children and meet her in heaven. The babe was then brought to receive her blessing. She took it to her cold bosom and commended it to God, and with an unearthly composure took leave of that fond circle that she had so long cherished, and announced herself ready to go. Wrapt about with the garment of salvation she descended step by step to the cold waters of the Jordan, singing, though in a faint whisper, the Christian victor's song, "Glory to God."

ROBERT S. FINLEY.

DIED—In Jefferson county, Ala., on the 23d day of April, 1853, Mrs. MARGARET TYLER, in the seventy-ninth year of her age. She was born in South Carolina, and professed religion under the ministry of the Rev. James Richardson.

About 1817 they moved to Jones's Valley, Ala. Soon after Rev. Ebenezer Hearn came along as missionary, and when forming his classes, he found her ready to enroll her name as a Methodist.

She was liberal in supporting the Gospel, feeding the hungry, and relieving the distressed. Although long a widow, her house was a home for our preaching men, and she never failed for fifteen to twenty years to spread her table at camp-meeting at Pleasant Hill.

She spent much of her time in reading the Bible, and in secret prayer. She was also happy at home as well as at Church. For many years previous to death, she became so deaf as scarcely to be able to hear the loudest voices, yet she filled her seat at Church as an example, and, as she said, to enjoy the enjoyments of others.

A CORRECTION.

"Every man shall bear his own burden."—Gal. 6.

Dear bro. McTyeire, In the N. O. Christian Advocate of the 21st inst., over my signature, appears the obituary of Mrs. Eliza Dunwoody of Rapides Parish La—And, as it stands in print, it is ridiculous both to her friends and to the common reader,—This can be done by pruning off the names of her parents with several other items, inserted by request. It makes her a wife while she lived, and a "Miss" Dunwoody at her death—The articles as it left my hands made her the wife of John Dunwoody of Rapides Parish La., but the Daughter of Robert—and Mary Fenwick from Aberdeen Scotland.

I make this correction with a copy of the original before me. Hope therefore, that you will admit it, in punctuation, syllable and letter.

Most kindly,

Alexandria La, May 1853. T, J, LACY

NOTE BY THE EDITOR:—It is so admitted. We know our good Brother is a reasonable man, and will allow us to quote the passage from his text which saith, "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ." Editors have a heavy burden to bear in obituaries. Ever and anon some of our contemporaries groan forth in an editorial. Recently one of them says, in apology to the relatives of the offended, that if all obituary notices were published as sent him, a whole side of his sheet (and it is a large one) would be filled every week with them. Then the subscribers would complain, and with good reason, too. So there is a cross-fire. The subject is a delicate one, and turn which way we will, there is embarrassment. Will our readers help us to bear this burden?

THE CHURCH-YARD....A FRAGMENT.

BY ALFRED WARD.

Blow soft, ye winds, above the dead;
Break not the silence by your strife!
Press ye the ground on which ye tread,
Beside those most dear to us in life?

Hast thou hast tasked thyself in vain
To ponder dearer those who sleep!
Friends who have followed in thy train,
Turn from the cheerless pomp and weep.

Those flowers that spring on yonder knoll,
Dotting the green and fertile sod,
Are emblems of the pure in soul,
Whose only dwelling place is God.

Those willow and the cypress wave
Their branches meekly o'er the tomb;
But Hope that's planted in the grave
Will flourish in immortal bloom.

NEW ORLEANS AND LOUISVILLE MAIL.—We find the following in the Washington Union of the 27th ult.:

The Postmaster-General, having had under consideration the important mail arrangements between Louisville, Ky., and New Orleans, has concluded to modify the acceptance of his predecessor, made on the first March last, so as to dispense with the restriction of the service to low-pressure boats, and with the way mails between Cairo and St. Francisville; the compensation to be adjusted by the standard of the lowest bids received under the advertisement therefor.

The contract is therefore concluded with the Messrs. Glover and Mather, who are the lowest bidders at the recent letting, for the daily express service between Louisville and Cairo, and between St Francisville and New Orleans, at an annual compensation of $207,975, from the 1st of December next, or as much earlier as practicable; the Postmaster-General reserving the right to require the supply of six additional offices by the express line, without additional pay. The entire service is to be performed in safe and suitable steamboats.

THE DANGERS OF TRAVELING.—The recent disasters to vessels and on the railroads call loudly for stringent reforms in the management of railroads, and for more care in those having charge of passengers. The real extent of these calamities is not known; but the New York Times compiles a summary statement of the disasters, as received between the dates of April 1 and May 18, which we subjoin, as painfully interesting:

VESSELS—Steamer Independence.—Wrecked and burnt, February 16, near Margareta Island, in the Pacific, 167 miles north of Cape St. Lucas—129 lives lost.

Steamer Tennessee.—Went ashore March 16, near San Miguel, on the Pacific. Six hundred passengers on board—all rescued.

Steamer Jenny Lind.—Exploded April 9, while on the way from San Francisco to San José—31 lives lost, 19 persons injured.

Steamer S. S. Lewin.—Went ashore in the Pacific, near Bolinas Bay, April 9. Four hundred and forty passengers on board—all saved.

Steamer Albatross.—Lost in the Gulf while on her way from New York to Vera Cruz, April 10.

Steamer Ocean Wave.—Burned on Lake Ontario, Saturday, April 30—37 lives lost—passengers 21, crew 16.

Bark William and Mary.—Wrecked on reefs in Bahama Channel, May 3—170 lives lost.

RAILROADS—Camden and Amboy Railroad. Afternoon train from Philadelphia, Saturday, April 23, ran off the drawbridge at Rancocas creek.

Michigan Southern and Central Railroads. Collision at the crossing, April 25—16 lives lost, many persons injured.

Boston and Maine Railroad.—One man run over and killed, April 28, at Reading Depot.

Reading Railroad.—One man killed, near the Falls of the Schuylkill, May 5.

New Haven Railroad.—Morniag express train from New York, Friday, May 6, ran off drawbridge at Norwalk—45 livce lost.

New York and Erie Railroad, Ramapo Broneh.—Collision on Monday, May 9—2 lives lost.

Taunton Branch Railroad.—Train thrown off, Saturday, May 7—15 persons injured—cause, a broken axletree.

New York Central Railroad.—Collision, near Syracuse, May 3, between passenger and cattle trains—engineer hurt.

Hudson River Railroad.—Child killed, in this city, Monday, May 9.

TOTAL.—Loss of life, during three months, on sea and river steamers, 307; on railroads, 66. Aggregate loss, 433.

From this statement, it will be seen that upward of four hundred persons have lost their lives, during the transit from place to place on our various routes of travel, in the short space of three months. Beside the wrecks of sea-going vessels, attended with loss of life, no less than three first class steamships have foundered—each containing a large number of passengers, varying from one hundred and fifty to six hundred persons on each vessel. These were rescued by strenuous exertions; but, under less favorable circumstances, they might have been added to the list of dead. These results indicate a lamentable laxity of discipline, a want of energy, and an absence of foresight, which demand the most vigorous investigation.

SEAMEN WANTED.—The Secretary of the Navy has issued the following general order, under date of May 23:

In consideration of the difficulty of procuring seamen for the Navy, and the inconvenience to which the public service is thereby subjected, a bounty of thirty dollars to each able seaman, and twenty dollars to each ordinary seaman, will be paid to such as may enlist for the naval service on and after the 1st day of June next.

The usual advance of the three months' pay will be continued, but no payment on account either of bounty or advance pay will be made until the recruit shall be received on board and duly entered in the books of some receiving ship.

The general order of January 4, 1853, allowing a bounty, will apply to such persons only as shall have enlisted for the navy previous to the 1st of June, 1853, and is rescinded with regard to those who may enlist after that date.

APPOINTMENT OF NATURALIST TO THE KANE EXPEDITION.—W. H. B. Thomas, formerly a newspaper carrier in Cincinnati, it is stated by the Commercial of that city, returned from Washington a few days ago with a commission as Naturalist to the Kane Arctic Exploring Expedition. Mr. Thomas is quite young, and while serving as a newspaper carrier in 1848, his unusual knowledge of Botany, Geology and Zoology, was the subject of general remark. Subsequently he was employed as an assistant teacher in a public school at a salary that barely enabled him to support himself and mother. In 1851 he took a prominent part in the proceedings of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, and by his talents attracted the attention of Prof. Beard and Prof. Henry, of the Smithsonian Institution, and through the latter gentleman he has now received his commission as Naturalist to the Arctic Expedition.

Here is the statement of the donations granted to the new States, and extracted from a public document, and which we believe is authentic:

Important News.

SAFETY OF MOST OF THE WILLIAM AND MARY'S PASSENGERS.—By the arrival of the British mail steamship Coewny, at Savannah, the News has Nassau papers to the 25th ult., inclusive.

The most gratifying intelligence from Nassau is that one hundred and sixty-four of the emigrant passengers on the wrecked ship William and Mary have been saved, and carried into Nassau. It appears they were saved through the exertions of Capt. Sands, of the wrecking schooner Oracle, and the majority of them were in a very destitute condition. A committee of ladies of Nassau, in a truly benevolent spirit, were administering to the necessities of the unfortunate emigrants by providing and superintending the making up of articles of clothing for the most destitute at the public buildings. Collections in behalf of the emigrants were made at the various places of worship on Sunday, the 22d ult.

The Nassau Herald learns by an arrival from Turks Island, that no salt had been raked this year up to the 14th ult., but that the prospects were good. The Nassau Guardian of the 21st ult. says:

The Government schooner Experiment arrived from Inagua and the other islands in her interinsular route this morning. We are glad to learn that the prospects of the salt producing islands are very cheering, little rain having fallen at any of them.

LATE AND INTERESTING FROM CENTRAL AMERICA.—We have advices from Costa Rica to the 7th inst. Juan Raphael Mora, the President, in his message to the Congress of Costa Rica, says the country is prosperous, enjoys peace, and maintains its credit among foreign nations. The Port of Punta Arenas, he says, has an importance now on the map it never had before. A steamer contract with a rich United States capitalist, to touch there, aggrandizes it. He congratulates Costa Rica that it is at peace with all other States. The old spirit of dividing and subdividing the Central American States, he hopes, is gone, and he urges union among them. France is negotiating for a reduction of duties on coffee. England and the United States have offered their mediation with Nicaragua, as to boundaries. The Washington cabinet came handsomely to the aid of Costa Rica in defending her from the attacks of obscure agents. Negotiations are going on with the Holy See, also with Austria, Tuscany and Sardinia. With Peru, there is particularly a good understanding. With New Grenada, boundary difficulties end dangers are impending; a happy settlement of which is hoped for.

We have also later advices from San Salvador, which declines making any further efforts to restore the Central American confederacy—from Honduras, which has laid an extraordinary tax to provide means of war in case the boundary troubles with Guatemala are not amicably settled, of which there are now some prospects—and from Nicaragua, the Chambers of which had been opened by an address from the Director of the State. THE ITALIAN TROUBLES IN NEW YORK.—The officers of the Serdinian frigate at New York, on Friday, gave full permission to the police to come on board, when two of the sailors were arrested and taken before Justice Bogart, on a charge of kidnapping, in seizing and carrying on board the frigate the Italian, Martin Franchi, and confining him in irons. The latter has been two years and a half in this country, and has declared his intention to become a citizen. The examination was postponed. It is said the sailors mistook Franchi for one of the refugees brought over in the ship. The officers express much regret at the unpleasant affair, and are anxious to settle it promptly, that they may sail on their return home. The New York Day Book thus explains the matter:

"This affair seems to have occurred entirely without the knowledge of the officers. The boats which conveyed the passengers to the shore were in charge of their coxswains only. The complainant spoke offensively of the officers of the vessel, and also indulged in sundry insulting expressions regarding the King of Sardinia. The crew being exasperated, and not knowing what else to do, carried him on board to await the arrival of the captain, who had gone on shore to pay his respects to the Mayor, and who was shortly expected back. Upon the captain's arrival he immediately discharged the prisoner and severely reprimended the crew. After the prisoner's discharge he made complaint at the police office, and was sent back with two officers to identify the offenders; but, on the arrival of the boat, at the vessel, the captain, not understanding why they called, refused to allow them to come on board, but stated that, if they would go to the Sardinian consul and state the case, he would be happy to do all in his power, but, neither party understanding each other, the officers construed it into a resistance of the law, and reported so accordingly. The captain and consul deeply offer to make a full statement to their minister, and instruct him to make an apology to the administration at Washington."

Gambling has become an evil of enormous magnitude in Cincinnati, and a call has been made for a public meeting in order to take energetic measures for its suppression. An illustration of the evil took place in the Police Court, a few days since, at an investigation relative to an affray which occurred in a room, where a man named Cleophus Goddard was severely stabbed by Theophilus Pettit. Goddard received three stabs in the breast and groin. The defendant, Pettit, was also beaten in the head badly—alleged to be done by Jos. Smith. Goddard, during his examination, mentioned the names of sundry persons, who, he said, he knew were guilty of gambling at the place, he was requested by the Court to stand up and point out such as were present who had been implicated. As soon as this suggestion was made, a rush was made for the door by several, which produced great excitement. The officers pursued and overtook the fugitives, and brought them into the presence of the Court, much to their confusion. The Court ordered them not to leave unless by permission. He also implicated many young men in the city who have heretofore not been suspected as being engaged in such occupations. Subpœnas were issued for their appearance. Upwards of one hundred persons are named.

COMPARATIVE HEALTH OF CITIES.—The report of the Board of Health of the city of New York, for the year 1852, shows an aggregate of 21,556 deaths, while the report of the Philadelphia Board of Health, for the same year, gives the total number of deaths in that city at 10,245. Thus, New York, with a population of 515,507, had one death to every 24 persons, and Philadelphia, with 409,000 inhabitants, had one death to every 40 persons. New York has a large foreign population, among whom poverty and want breed sickness and death; but it appears by the statistics that the chances of life are stronger against the native population in New York than in Philadelphia. The deaths in New York, during the year 1852, of persons born in the United States amounted to 14,871, or one native in every thirty-five of the population, while the whole mortality of Philadelphia, native and foreign, during the same year, was but one in 40.

The New York Art Union Investigation has resulted in the complete explosion of all the charges of mismanagement made against its managers.

NEW ORLEANS IN A BUSINESS POINT OF VIEW. The following interesting sketch of our city in a business point of view is from the pen of one of the editors of the New York Express, E. Brooks, Esq., an intelligent, observant, and well traveled gentleman. There are some predictions in the closing paragraphs that should command especial attention:

The Levee at New Orleans is the greatest commercial spectacle I have ever seen. There are miles of ships and acres of steamboats lining the extended crescent, and ranging far above and below the city limits; many more at Algiers, and hundreds more always on the river above and below the city. The ships lie from two to five and six deep, and present a picture of trade and commerce, at one view, such as can be seen at no other port in the world. I have walked more than once over the whole length of the Levee, from Jefferson City and Lafayette to the lower end of the city, and have seen there, thousands and tens of thousands of bales of cotton, and visiting the cotton presses, cotton yards, and cotton storehouses near by, I have seen thousands and tens of thousands of additional bales. Steamboats are unloading their cotton from the upper countries, and enormous ships are receiving it for Europe. The South and Southwest grow the cotton and the North and East carry it to Europe. It would be impossible almost for planters to be shippers, and hence there seems to be a Providence almost in this sectional division of capital and labor, which brings distant people to the same country into frequent, social, and business intercourse. As I have gazed upon those many thousand bales of cotton, and 20,000 are sometimes sold after dinner, here by one or two persons for shipment, (every one of which was worth $40,) I have thought that the much abused Cotton Party of the United States was a very important and respectful body of persons. It is a party which raised one hundred millions of dollars a year in American produce for a European market, and a party which contributes just so much to pay off a debt incurred by the United States abroad.

But it is not the number of ships and steamboats, nor the quantity of cotton raised and brought here which alone amaze me. The picture of thrift and industry, of private spirit and general animation is unsurpassed. You see, in the miniature of those, many steamers panting, pulling and groaning with the burdens they bring from afar, which thread all the water courses of our western world, a foreshadowing of the inland commerce of the United States. It connects with a country, and that our country, which in the article of grain alone could, if need be, feed every mouth in the world. You see, at times, too, nearly a thousand ocean vessels ready to bear away this inland commerce to all parts of the civilized globe. You behold for miles and miles, amidst little colored flags and numbered stalls, betokening the ownership of property, a wide spread levee, and generally much greater in width than the Bowery and Broadway together, covered in the busy season of the year all over with articles of home produce or of foreign and domestic merchandise. I have seen no such a picture before, and had no comprehension of the magnitude of such a growth and trade as this. New Orleans may well boast of such a commerce and of such a highway to the ocean as the mighty Mississippi.

Let me enter a little into detail in regard to two of these productions—cotton and sugar. The last is a crop almost peculiar to this State, and as such Louisiannians ought to appreciate it. The first is common to a vast section of country, and this is its greatest market.

From New Orleans there were shipped in the first two months of the present year, 313,567 bales of cotton, which brought an average per bale of $40 67, and produced an aggregate in value of $12,754,306. This city has exported 149,000 bales of cotton more thus far in the present fiscal year than the last. The estimated differences in value from September 1 to April 20, have been over nineteen million of dollars, and this amount will be increased to $29,561,888, if the crop now going forward is included. The value of cotton exported to the close of the last fiscal year, 30th of June, was nearly $88,000,000, at an average of $31 90 per bale, and in amount 2,444,000 bales. Taking January and February, 1853, for examples, the value for the present year will be $40 67 per bale. The cotton crop exported this year, therefore, is worth vastly more than one hundred millions of dollars.

The Sugar crop is one of growing importance and already of immense value. A thousand acres in cultivation upon one plantation is a common estate, and vastly larger ones are seen in all directions. Sugar has been a great product with Louisiana for more than a century and a quarter. The Jesuits introduced the cane from St. Domingo in 1726, and planted the Malabar and Creole Canes in the suburbs of St. Mary's. The Ribben Cane, from the East Indies, is now the favorite plant, and it thrives earlier and later than any other Sugar plants. There was a suspension of planting when Louisiana was ceded to Spain, but it was resumed soon after, and the crop amounted to 25,000 hhds in 1818, to 36,000 hhds in 1822-'23, to 70,000 in 1832-'33, to 125,000 in 1842-'43, and to 321,934 hhds in the season of 1852-'53. There are 1000 pounds not in each hhd of Sugar, and this yields from forty to fifty gallons of Molasses. The crop of the past season was the best ever known, and 70,000 gallons of Molasses per 1000 pounds of Sugar was the product. The aggregate amount reached 26,700,000 gallons. The 321,791 hhds raised last year also averaged 1125 pounds net per hhd, and gave a grand product of 368,120,000 pounds. Of this amount 32,480 hhds came from fifty-one plantations, and was manufactured by the improved processes which promise to revolutionize the manufacture of Sugar. Already Louisiana has 1481 Sugar-houses, 913 of which are regulated by steam apparatus, and 538 by horse-power.

This sugar estates line each side of the Mississippi river and its legion of bayous, upon an average of two and two and a half miles in width; and it is now known that the low lands are susceptible of drainage, and the chaparel lands of clearance and cultivation. Beyond the memory of man, on this, the only river in the world, the tide has flowed from the river to the forests, until the people are frequently made to tremble at the devastation of the floods. From New Orleans to the mouth of the Ohio is a distance of over 1000 miles, and there is 100 miles of river land below the city. On these 1100 miles nothing of any great consequence is grown but cotton and sugar, and with the lands improved as they may be, no one can well realize their capacity for production or their value in soil.

This city is to depend hereafter more upon the local and Southern interior trade than upon the great river tributaries which have hitherto made New Orleans what she is. Northern and Eastern enterprise, the Virginia Road at Wheeling, the Pennsylvania Road at Pittsburgh, the Erie Road at Dunkirk, with the railroad routes between Indiana, Ohio, Michigan and the lakes, have changed the current of trade. Memphis will ship her cotton and tobacco up river instead of down, and the river planters, so far down the Mississippi, found a better market at home this year, than by forwarding their produce to New Orleans. Thousands of up the country cattle have hitherto found their way to this market, and they have been among the finest in the world. But now they go towards the mountains and lakes to the great Eastern cities. The owners of the Mississippi boats complain especially of the loss of this branch of trade. New York is to receive even Southern cotton and tobacco by the Northern routes.

Louisiana Interior.

We learn from the Baton Rouge Comet of the 28th inst. that on the evening previous the coroner was sent for to hold an inquest on the body of a man found about ten miles east of that place, on the Comite road. So horribly mangled was the head of the man that his features could not be distinguished, but the body was recognized as being that of Jack Cotton, one of a numerous gang of horse thieving scoundrels who now infest that region. Cotton has but very recently been liberated from jail. Whilst confined there, he divulged the secrets of this band of villains, and the vengeance then sworn against him has just now been consummated.

The Concordia Intelligencer of the 28th inst. says: "We understand that the cotton flies are destroying the young cotton in our neighborhood to a considerable extent."

Fete Dieu, Corpus Christi, was duly observed by the Roman Catholic citizens of Thibodaux, in a grand mass and procession at St. Joseph's Church on the 26th inst.

MISSISSIPPI.—Two telegraphic dispatches were received in Jackson on Tuesday, 24th inst., from Grenada, Yallobusha county, stating that the small-pox was in that vicinity, and requesting a speedy supply of vaccine matter, which was immediately sent off by mail.

Further by the Arabia—Liverpool Markets

NEW YORK, May 31.

The Arabia's advices report a better demand for some articles of provisions, and Pork and Bacon were active. Beef, however, was dull, and Lard slightly declined in prices. Flour was firm, and in good request, most of the brands quoting Western Canal at 23s. and Ohio brands at 24s. per barrel. Corn was in good demand and White had advanced 3d. per quarter.

Coffee was steady at the rates reported by the Baltic.

Rice was in good request at an advance of 3d. per cwt.

MONEY AND TRADE.—The Money market at London was tighter, but no change in the rate of interest. The transactions in American securities had been large and the rates firm. Consols closed at 100¾ to 100¾.

Trade at Manchester had slightly improved during the week.

LATER FROM HAVANA.

Arrival of the Black Warrior.

MOBILE, June 2, 1:30, P. M.

The steamship Black Warrior has arrived here, having left Havana on the 31st ult. The city at that time was perfectly quiet, and no news of any consequence was stirring.

A private letter dated Havana, May 30, states that there had been some excitement in the city, caused by an attempted emeute among the scholars belonging to the different schools.

It appears that the Captain General had severely reprimanded some of the Professors and masters of these schools, charging them with having inculcated in the minds of the youth under their charge, opinions entirely too liberal, and he expressed a determination to suppress any thing having a tendency to the diffusion of liberal sentiments. This, very naturally, gave great offence to the parties concerned, and they made an effort to get up an indignation meeting, but they were soon put down by the authorities.

Alabama News.

A public meeting of the citizens of Montevallo was held on the 14th ult., of which the Hon. George D. Shortridge was Chairman, to make arrangements for celebrating the completion to that place of the Selma and Tennessee Railroad. The 4th day of July was fixed upon as the day.

The Hon. C. C. Clay, Jr., has announced himself a candidate for Congress in the Huntsville District.

James F. Dowdell, Esq., of Chambers county, was nominated for Congress in the Seventh District by the Democratic Convention, which assembled at Wedowca on Monday last.

Judge S. D. J. Moore, of Lowndes county, has announced himself as the "State Rights" candidate for Congress in the Third District, in opposition to the Hon S. W. Harris, the regular democratic nominee.

On the 21st ult. a distressing accident occurred in Huntsville, by which a worthy and industrious citizen, James W. Pollard, was sadly maimed. A new cannon had been recently procured by the corporate authorities, which was being used for the first time on that day. Having been fired a number of times, it became heated, and when in the act of being loaded again, it was accidentally prematurely discharged. Mr. Pollard's left hand was completely torn off about the wrist—and his arm shattered so badly as to require amputation above the elbow joint.

Later from Texas.

By the arrival of the steamship Louisiana we have files of Galveston papers of the 26th and 27th ult., and of Indianola of the 24th.

The great Texas gold bubble has at length exploded. The Galveston Civilian of the 27th says:

"The gold fever seems to have extended pretty far, although but little of it is felt by the people living near the supposed placers in Texas. The senior editor of this paper has just returned from Austin, and made it a point, during his visit, to make close inquiry into the reports of gold-finding in this State. Out of the numerous persons he saw who had visited the reputed gold region, he did not find one who had found, and but one or two who had seen, gold to the value of a single dollar. Only one or two are reported, with any plausibility, to have obtained even a few dollars. A few grains may be gathered, in some places, though not to the value of twenty cents a day. Yet there are probably a thousand persons engaged in the search, and others are still going to supply the places of those who return disappointed. Expeditions are organized to seek in every direction, far and near; and if gold or other valuable minerals are to be found in the State, they will doubtless be discovered. In the meantime, we advise those who are laboring under the first symptoms of the gold mania, to stay at home and attend to their business, if they have any, until those already engaged in the search shall have something more favorable to report."

The Galveston Journal of the 25th ult. publishes the following letter, said to be from a source in every way entitled to respect:

AUSTIN, May 17, 1853.

GENTS—Yours of the 12th inst. is at hand. In reply to your queries I have to say, that I believe there is gold in the region of the so-called "that report speaks," but that it is in small quantities that it will not pay for the labor. The mines will not pay for a man to work, unless he can get more than $1 per day. I have seen men from the digging party to be liable, who do not speak favorably of the prospects. I have seen specimens and tested it with a glass, not "darkly," but by magnifier, in comparison with California gold; in my opinion the papers give a correct account of impositions in that line, about as 0 is to 100,000,000. We have had no opportunity to test the gold.

The Baptist Missionary Convention, lately in session at Albany, was attended by one thousand delegates. Among the communications presented from the Executive Committee was a correspondence between the American minister and the King of Prussia, in regard to the persecutions to which the Baptists of Germany had been subjected. The King had exhibited the kindest spirit, and declared that if the Baptists would effect an ecclesiastical organization which could be recognized by the Government, all causes of complaint would cease. The Board recommended that it shall be by the appointment of a board of five in Germany, who, in co-operation with the Board here, should be authorized to license colporteurs in Germany.

At Grenada, Miss., on the 21st instant, there had been rain, and the weather was very cool. The Republican says that heavy clothing was absolutely necessary for comfort.

MAY MORN.

[illegible] come to my window frame,
[illegible] to the cold hard glass—
[illegible] to tell:
[illegible] is born!

[illegible] the race, through the open space,
[illegible] wind [illegible] of the skies;
[illegible] to [illegible]-drive!
[illegible] from the [illegible] fire,]
[illegible] the [illegible] dance,
[illegible] is born!

[illegible] glanced and the soft wind danced,
[illegible] flowers,
Over my cheek and over my eyes;
[illegible] with glad surprise—
[illegible] forth, ye blessed twain,
[illegible] hill and over the plain,
[illegible] the beautiful May is born.

[illegible] the dawn drew [illegible] beam before.
This sweet May morn;
And the soft wind fanned along,
Warm from his heart and fresh from his brain;
And they led me out to the meant and plain,
To the beautiful May new-born.

[illegible] to delight find my guide so light,
[illegible] along over the grassy ground,
[illegible] by each joyous sight and sound.
[illegible] green and the skies so gay,
[illegible] earth kept holiday,
For the beautiful May was born.

[illegible] sun with their eyes of glee,
This sweet May morn,
Down the trees waved kindly on;
And they, murmuring cried—Thou happy one!
For we heard for out on the ocean wild,
That the beautiful May was born.

[illegible] came to this rose-bild come,
This sweet May morn,
And [illegible] flower—Prepare!
[illegible] thy meekening bosom here;
For soon, full soon, thou must rest to rest,
And upon and feed on thy glowing breast,
The beautiful May new born.

The [illegible] breathe through the trembling trees,
This sweet May morn,
And it said to the listening birds—O you,
[illegible] choristers of the skies,
Awaken your tenderest lullabies,
For the beautiful May now born.

The white cloud flew to the uttermost line,
This sweet May morn;
[illegible] like a gentle carrier-dove,
The tidings news to the realms above:
While the sister stood in the midst of the grove,
And within my heart the spirit of love,
That the beautiful May was born!

SAILOR GENEROSITY.

AN INCIDENT OF THE LATE WAR.

A tender in the Downs, and a well-manned boat approached the shore. What a curious and engaging medley of character do their crews present to us? I remember a story of some men-of-war's men, which will fairly describe them, though I think even I, a landsman, can see the difference a long peace and more domestic habits have produced in their natures.

It was near the end of the last long and exciting war, when two frigates, which had long been rivals and zealous of one another, though quite distinguished and successful, were in harbour at Portsmouth together to refit. They watched one another's progress and tried to surpass one another, and were well understood to be running a race once more, to prepare their ships for active service, when a little band of their friends, five or six from each ship, had obtained leave of absence to go to London at the same time; and as they were "flush," as it is called, with money, they resolved each to take a coach for themselves, or a coach for each ship, and thus to keep up their old emulation, by running a race together to London. Luckily for them, there were two coaches in the town—rivals like their ships—the one leaving the George, the other the Fountain, at about the same time. Accordingly, the whole coach, inside and outside, was taken at the George by the men of the Impetuous, that of the Fountain in the same way by the celebrated Amazon. On the morning of the departure approached, which details occurred at the coach office, with many jokes and altercation, and soon the four horses were being put to, but no luggage was seen on the coach-roof; when a party consisting of two well-dressed men, and three still smarter females, probably ladies, arrived in a hurry, as though fearing they were too late, and the following scene ensued on the Amazon: the voice of the master gentleman, who had gone for places was heard aloud to say, "There are no seats—they are all taken."

"All taken? are you sure?"

"Yes, a party of sailors have taken the whole coach."

At this moment, five fine looking fellows with low hats, long queues, large whiskers, open necks, pipes in their mouths, and huge sack trousers, swung alongside the office, hallooing out, "Ah! that's right, Bine Peter up, short stay a-peak, eh? Man the capstan, coachee, and [illegible] all before the other chap; come, bear a hand."

Up jumped one on the box, having thrown his bundle on board, while two others clambered up behind. "Bill," said the man on the box, "put Jim down in the cabin; he's a fresh this morning, and had better not come aloft, because if the craft rolls he'll be overboard."

But this was not listened to, and up got the sailor in front. All this took place within a few minutes, when those who desired to be passengers were also heard to say:

"But there's plenty of room for us—are there no more? Porter, put up our luggage."

"Now, Sarah, jump in," added one of the gentlemen, as he opened the coach door.

"Avast, there," said one of the sailors with a good-natured voice, "the berths are all taken."

"What insolence!" exclaimed the angry man, "what right have you to keep people out where the places are not filled? Get in, Sarah."

"Avast, there," was again shouted from the top; and down came all the Jacks with a leap, and stood at the coach door. An appeal with gestures and fury was made by both the male and female disappointed passengers, to the office keeper, coachman and guard.

"But the places are all taken and paid for, gentlemen; we can do nothing; you must apply to the sailors themselves."

"Not we; we insist on their giving up the coach seats—ill behaved drunken fellows!"

"Why, Jack," said one to the other coolly, "there's a squall; mind your helm, my lad."

Here the clerk interposed; "But my men, it is hard that you should keep all the coach to yourselves, when these gentlemen are so anxious to go, and they will pay your passage money back; and they will only want five places."

"Only five places, there's a land lubber for you, Tom," said one to the other; "as if they five would not bring her down by the stern and spoil her trim. "Sir," he added to one of the angry men, "do you see, we've a match with the Impetuous, and if we take in more ballast, they'll beat us."

The horn of the other coach blew. "Up, aloft, make sail," cried one of them; and they were scrambling up, when one of the five gentlemen took one of the five fellows by the collar and held him down. The tar shook him off with great dignity, drawing himself up said to the crowd and to the clerk, "Sir, do you see, we took this coach for a sail to London with the Impetuous, and we wished to have her in the right trim; howsomever if these fine folks had spoken civilly to us, and said, "My men, we know the craft is yours, [illegible] won't you give us a passage?" we would not have kept them off, we would have given them a hand, and a pipe a piece, and taken our chance with our comrades yonder. But to be boarded in this fashion by a parcel of privateers, I'm shamed, if I stand it," and then, turning to his comrades, he added, "Messmates, all's free [illegible] and no favour; there's no pennant up, so I [illegible] right it out. These land lubbers mnet [illegible] weather us; nobody shall go hnt Jim Trav[illegible] and Bill Roberts. They shall have charge; [illegible] stay aloft, and we'll send our bundles [illegible] the cabin, and then she'll be lightened a good [illegible], and be able to spare them topgallant sails."

Accordingly the two men staid on the top, the others put their sticks and bundles inside. Just then the other coach trotted fast by, the gentleman gave the coachman and guard a shilling apiece for each bundle and stick, as for themselves, and away went the otherwise empty coach, with the cheers of the men and their companions, the ill-suppressed anger of their astonished and foiled opponents, and the shouts of laughter of at least a hundred people, who lingered at the coach-office to see what was going on.

In the meantime a similar, yet very different scene had occurred at the other hotel, the Fountain, round the rival coach, called for the coach Impetuous.

A clergyman, with his wife and two daughters, had gone with their leggage, to take their places for London, where they had been hurriedly called to see a dying son, in some government office. But all the places were taken, and nothing could be done for them. All taken? And would none give up their places, for at least the father and the mother!

"We don't knew, sir; five sailors of the Impetueuse have taken them all the way to London." They were at the moment seen approaching, rolling along and alive for any mad frolic. The poor lady burst into tears, and her husband tried to console her, "We can take a post-chaise, my dear, and post to London; I will see;" and then added, "but, alas! I fear I cannot afford it; no, we must give this up."

"Come, hoist jib, my fine fellows, and fire a gun and make sail," said the foremost of the tars, as he sprang upon the top of the coach; and then down he came again, and said, "No, I'll go in the cabin; Tom, come into the cabin, it is more ship-shape, and we shall steady the craft more;" and he then opened the coach-door, and sprang in with his bundle, upon which the other four followed, and they all got inside with their sticks, pipes, etc.; one of them thrusting out his head and hallooing, "On deck, there! see that yen keep a sharp lookont, and tell us when those rascals are in sight," meaning their friends on the other coach. At this moment the poor clergyman, with his family by his side, said to the office-keeper, "Won't these fine fellows allow us to take the ontside places if we pay for them?" and turning to them, said, "My men, we hear yen have taken all this coach, but if you would be kind enough to allow us to shere it with yen?"

"Why, sir, yon see," said n nebls looking tar, putting his head out of the window, "we have hired the craft en a selling metch to Lnnnon, with those Amazens, and if thers are too many on deck, may be she'll roll when before the wind, and they'll beat us."

"Well," said the poor clergyman, with great courtesy, "I really shenld not think of intrudling on your pleasurs, bnt that we are in distress. We have heard of the (we feer) fatal sickness of my only boy, and we are hastening to see him before he dies." Here his voice faltered, and his dignified wife and the poer timid young girls by his side burst into teers. The coach was moving off, and the horn blew—

"Avest there, shorten sail, let ge the anchor again," said ono of them; "I esn't stand that blnbbering; it has made me feel, I don't know hew."

"What's tho matter?" said the gnard.

"What's that to you, yon lubber? Why, there are signals of distress here," and open flew the coach door, and two of them jumped out, and the tall one, taking off his low hat, with his pipe in it, stood before the clergyman and said—

"The craft is at yonr service, sir, and these poor things here shaking in the wind. Isn't she, Jack—Tom? Eh! my lads! Come, clear the cabin, it's a cold day; come out, Bill, and give your berth to the ladies; who are you, to be there when your betters ain't served?"

The clergyman was beginning to thank them, and say they could all go outside. "On deck? Net they—what, this cold and squally day? No, the cabin is the place for those who were not brought up before the mast."

And with inimitable, though rongh grace, and with their hats off and queues atioking out behind, they handed in the wife, the two girls, and then the olergyman, in spite of his remonstrances to the centrary. The young women, overcome with the change, cried rather hysterically, when one sailor turning to the other, said, "Jack, those poor things are low, and so am I—quite equeamish and odd, as though a puff wonld capsize me; let's have some grog and give the ladies some." In a momsnt they had got their glasses, and presented them with great importunity at the coach-door. In the meantime, the luggage was put up, and no small quantity, for there were three ladies, and the coachman being in a hurry, up they all sprang, and stuck one of their etioks, with a blue handkerchief, on the top of the boxes.

The clergyman called the office-keeper to pay their fare, and so to refund the sailors. They heard this, and one said, "What's that boat doing alongside? that lubber is wanting mere money from the cabin passengers." Bnt, on understanding the nature of the parley, they said, "No, hold yenr tongus yes scribbler; no one ever pays in king's ships; the poor things shall have a free passage, and so all mess with us besides; it ehan't be said that the Impetuose ever saw signals of distress, and did not bear down to lend a hand. Cheer up, sir, the money 'll help the lad to London, and you'll have to pay a bill as long as a boat-hook, depend on it; those doctors are great thieves. If there is any trouble below, halloo out, and we shall hear on deck; keep the poor things that are orying warm. And now blow up yonr music my lad there abaft, and olap all sail on her;" and off went the coach, amid the shouts of some and the whimpers of others.

"Fine fellows, those tars," said some.

"Poor fellows, what fools they are not to take the gentleman's money!" were tho mnttered, half-a-shamed words of others.

With an occasional glimpse of one another, as the almost empty coach reached the crest of a hill, and the other heavy laden one dipped into a valley far behind. and which, for tho momsnt, awakened a feeble cheer from the little oraft, as they called the other, the two coaches hastened on in the order that might have been expected, and never stopped without an offering of hot grog being made to the oabin passengers. About sunset, they took in their top-gallant sails nnd royals in the crowded streets of London, and at last let go their anchors, ons in the court-yard of the Bell Tanvage in Ludgate-hill, end the other at the Saracen's Head.

The two men who had alons taken their passage, as they said, in the first, sprang down, and harried round the point, and then cams round, head to the wind, and let go her anchor in the aforesaid well known court-yard.

Cheers from the victore were answered by jovial counter-cheers from the beaten, and down the last of all sprang, clean off the top to the ground, and gathered ronnd the coach, to lift the cabin passengers ont, pushing aside first the porter and then the waiter, making, as they said, clear decks; and then, opening the coach-doore with inimitable but most unpolished courtesy, with their round hats off one side, and huge quids in their mouth, they handed out the clergyman, his wife and daughters, and heped they had not been tossed about by the rolling and pitching of that 'ere heavy merchantman. She was no man-of-war at all; they could not get nine knots an honr out of her; the other one might have spared her royals and stndding sails, and they were fairly beat. But, as for that, it was all one, the dibs would have gone in some way, if not in that, and they hoped the parson and the young ladies would find all well after all. During all thje, the other two sailors looked on with droll surprise, and then broke out with vociferons questions, and some technical sarcasms, when the spokesman of the vanquished party said, "Why, do you see Jim, and you Amazons, just as we were off, light and well trimmed, his honor there, with a grey head and kind face, and person's rigging, and his convoy, that 'ere mother and the two pretty young uns, that have never seen a gale or a banyan dey, asked for a passage, because their boy was sick and dying up in Lnnnun here, and they conld not get to him if we did not consent. And when we said "na," for we were going to try the rate of sailing with you, the old man, (I beg yonr henor's pardon) held down his head, and the gals hluhbered, and so, Jim, we hauled down our colors, and struck outright, and gave them a passage, lumber and all, and a good cargo it is; and so, you see, we were down in water some inches more by this; and it was no use, we could not come with you. And here's the money, hold out your fists, you've—"

Jim, with an appalled look and tons, exclaimed, "Money! sheer off; don't come ulongside me my hearty, if that's the cause on't, I won't tonoh a single copper, nor Bill sither I know; there'e nothing even or above board in it; we threw so much cargo overboard and lightened the oraft, and left Jack and the rest, because of those landsharks. And if you hove to and took them poor things in tow, why then it was not fair sailing, and we'll share alike for this 'ere cruise; won't we, Bill?"

Bill's reply was stopped by the clergyman, who, after having listened with an interest that apparently absorbed him, and touched him and his family to the quick, broke ont and said, "May God bless yau all, my noble fellawe, you are equal indeed in the race of doing kind acts. You have relieved me of a sorrowful burden, and my wife and children, and we all return you our grateful acknowledgements. It would be an insult to offer you the money for our fares again; we are glad to be indebted to you in their way. I must hasten away to my poor boy, but if I could do any thing whatever for any of you to show my sense of generosity, how glad I should be. What can I do?"

"Well," said Jim, "perhaps your honor has interest up nloft; and may be will speak a good word for us, for we don't knew hew to do it for ourselves; and we should like, after a little, to be well moored up there."

"While my life lasts," replied the good clergyman, "God help me, I trust I shall ever remember you in my prayers; but, my peor kind friends, the harbor and heaven you speak of, is open to all believers in the Son of God."

There was an expression of mingled grief and hope in the good clergyman's face; he pressed their hands, and shook them sarnestly, as did also his wife and daughters, and in a few moments, the persons so strangely brought together, parted, to meet no more in this world.

CHINESE LOVE LETTERS.

We think we might safely venture on a wager that perhaps not half-a-dezon—if any—of our readers have ever seen a genuine Chinese love-letter. We have, though. Recently, in Amoy, a marriage was concluded between a sen of the ancient family of "Tan" and a daughter of the equally old and respectable heuse of "O," and the annexed productions, we are assured, are literal translations of the letters that passed on the occasion between the fathers of the young couple. Here we have the preposal of the father of the bridegroom:

"The ashamed young brother, surnamed Tan, named Su, with washed heed makes obeisance, and writes this letter to the greatly virtuous and humble gentleman whose surname is O, old teacher, great man, and presents it at the foot of the gallery. At this season of the year the satin curtains are enveloped in mist, reflecting the beanty of the rivers and hills; in the fields of the blue gem are planted rows of willows olose together, arranging and diffusing the commencement of genial influences, and consequently adding to the good of the old year.

"I duly reverence your lofty door. The guest of the Sus country descends from a good stock, the origin of the female of the Hui country likewise (is se too.) You have received their transforming influsnces, resembling the great effects prodnced by rain, much mers'you, my honerable nearly related uncle, your good qualities of n very rare order. I, the moan one, am ashemed of myself, just as rotten wood is in the presence of nromatic herbs. I now receive your indulgence, inasmuch as you have listened to the words of the match-maker, and given Miss S. in marriage to the mean one's eldest son, named Kang. Your assenting to it is worth more to me than n thausand pieces of gold. The marriags business will be conducted according to the six rules of propriety, and I will reverently announce the business to my ancestors with presents of gems and silks. I will arrange the things received in your baskot so that all who tread the threshold of my door may enjoy them. From this time forward the two surnames will be united, and I trust the union will be n felicitous one, and last for a hundred years, and realize the delight experienced by the union of the two conntries, Chiu and Chin. I hope that your honornble benovolence and consideration will defend me unceasingly. At present the dragon flies in Sin Hai torm, this first month, lucky day. I, Mr. Su, how respectfully. Light before."

On this decoction of the essential oil of medesty the young Miss O's father looks with favor, so he responds in a state of still more profoundly polite humility:

"The younger brother, surnamed O, named Tns, of the family to be related by marrisge, washee his head clean, knooke his head, and bows, and writes this marriago letter in reply to the far-famed and virtuous gentleman surnamed Tan, ths vensrable teacher and great man who manages this business. At the seneon this heart of this plum-blossom is increasingly white; at this beginning of the first menth it opens its petale. The eyebrows of the willow shoet out their green; when shaken by the wind it displays its glory, and grows luxuriantly into five generations. 'Tis matter for congratulation the union of one hundrod years. I rovorence your lofty gate. The prognostic is good, also the divinatien of the lucky bird. The stars are bright, and the drngons meet together. In every succeeding dynasty office will be held, and for many a gensration official vestments will be worn, (not only those of your family surnams will enjoy all the aforementioned folicity) moro especially will you, honorable gentleman, who possess abilities great and deep; your manners are dignified and pure. I, the foolish one, am ashamed of my diminutivsness. I, for a leng time, have desired your dragon powers; now you have not looked down upon me with contempt, but have entertained the statements of the matchmaker, and agreed to give Mr. Kang to be united to my despicable daughter. We all wish the girl to have her hair dressed, and the young man to put on his hat of manhood. The peach-flowers just now look beautiful, the red plum also looks gay. I prnise your son, who is like a fairy horse who can oross over through water, and is ablo to ride over the wind and waves, but my tiny daughter is liko a green window and a feeblo plant, and is net worthy of becoming the snbject of verso.

"Now, I rsverently bow to your good words, and maks use of them to display your good breeding. New, I hops your honorable benovolence will always remember me without end. Now, the dragon flies in the Sin Hai term, first menth, lucky day. Mr. Tu makes oboisance. Dny the future be prosperous."

The modesty of the old gentleman is so painful that we are almost afraid to guess what may have been the feelings of Master Tan and Miss O; but whatever they were, they must have overcome them by this time, for the friend to whom we are indebted for these epistolary gems danced at their wedding a couple of months back, and was nearly suffocated with drinking scalding black tea out of cocoannt shell cups.

But the letters themselves—for we have received the originals, together with the translations—are, at least, remarkable. [Panama Herald.

THE DELIGHTS OF VISITING.

What is it to go away on a visit? Well, it is to take leave of the little velvet rocking-chair, which adjusts itself so nicely to your shonlders and spinal columu; to cram, jam, squeeze, and otherwise compress your personal effects into an infinitesimal compass; to be shook, joltsd, and tossed, by turns, in enrriage, railroad car and steamboat; to be deafened with the stentorian lungs of cnb-drivers, draymen and porters; to clutch your hagge as if every face you saw was a highwaymnn; (or to find yourself transported with rage, at finding it transported by steam to Greenland or Cape Horn.) It is te reach yonr friend's house, travsl-stained, cold and weary, with an unbecoming crock in your bonnet; to benttorly unable to get the frost out of your tongne or the beam into your eye," and to have the felicity of hearing some strange guest remark to your friend, as you say an early good night, "Is it possible THAT is your friend Miss Grey?"

It is to be ushered into the "best chamber," (always n north one) of a cold January night; to unhook your dress with stiffened digits; to find every thing in your trunk—but your nightcap; to ereep between polished linen sheets, on to a congealed mattress, and listen to the chattering of your own teeth until daylight.

It is to talk at a mark, twelve hours on this stretch; to eat and drink all sorts of things which disagrss with you; to get up sham fits of enthnsiasm, at trifles; to learu to yawu oloeumspectly, bshind your finger-tips; to praise a spoiled child when you feel like wringing its neck; to avoid all allusions to topios unsuited to your pro tem. latitude; to have somebody forever at your nervous elbow, trying to make you "enjoy yourself;" to laugh when you want to cry; to be loquacious wheu you had rather be taciturn; to have mind and body in nnyieldlng harness, for lingerlng, consecntive weeks; and then to invite your friends, with a hypocritical smile, to plny the same tareo over with you, "whensver business or pleasure calls them" to Frog-town!

FANNY FERN.

FASHIONS BY A "FIRST" HAND.—The fashions in millinsry and dress-makiug present the usual features. Fingere are very much worn—nearly to the bone—skirts and accounts are still very long, whils bodies, particularly those who think themselves some bodies, are excessively low, with a great deal of stiffness and a quantity of bona about the place where the heart is likely to come. If there happens to be any. In the evening dress, the petticoat is usually very full, and the pocket often very empty. The material of the bosom is frequently glace, and covered with a transparent tissne of imitation stuff, which may be seen through easily. Flowers are not much worn this esason in the hair, but the cheeks are got up as usual with artificial roses. [Punch.

HEROISM AND CRUELTY.—A most touching instance of heroism, and one of the most atrocious acts of ernelty, the truth of which is vouched for by the most respectable authority, occurred during the Colombian struggle for Independence. The Spanish General Morillo, the most bloodthirsty and treacherous tool of the Spanish King, who was created Count of Carthagenia and Marquis de la Puerta, for services which rather entitled him to the distinction of hntcher or hangman. While seated in his tent one day, he saw a boy before him drawned in tears. The Chief demanded of him for what purpose he was there.

The child replied that he had come to beg the life of his father, then a prisener in Morillo's camp.

"What can yen de to save your father?" asked the General.

"I can do but little, but what I can shall be done."

Morille seized the little fellaw's ear, and said, "would you suffer your ear to be taken off to procure your father's liberty?"

"I certolnly would," was the undaunted reply.

A soldier was accordingly called, and ordered to cut off the ear with a single stroke of the knife.

The boy wept, but did not resist while the barbareus order was executed.

"Would yen lese your other ear rather than fail of your purpose?" was the next question.

"I have suffered much, but for my father I can suffer still!" was the heroic answer of the boy.

The other ear was taken off piecemeal, without flinching on the part of the noble child.

"And new go!" exclnimed Merille, untouched by his sublime courage, "the father of such a son must die!"

In the presence of his agonized and vainly suffering son, the petriet father was then executed. Never did a life picture exhibit such truthful lights and shades in national character; such deep treacherous villainy; such lofty, enthusiastic heroism.

A CONTRAST.—"I wish I could see a pleasant face when I come home. Tired! Yes! that's always the cry. I never get tired—oh, no! Customers to please—clerks to overhaul—accounts to cast up. Hush! I shall hate that child. Now walk the floor and spoil him. Bill, hunt up my slippers. Mary, draw up the rocking chair. Other men have these things ready for them. There's Saunders, he takes comfort. His wife's as handsome as she was the day she married. If there's any thing I hate it's a faded woman. Light the lamps and give me my newspaper. If I can't read here in peace I'll go over to Saundere'."

"Mary, dear, how tired you look. Give me that great strapping boy. No wonder your nrms ache. Oh! never mind me. I'm always O. K. at home, you know. Take the rocking chair yourself, and just be comfortable. Ain't I tired? Why, yes I am—a little, but then I've feasted on fresh air and sunshine to-day, which you haven't. Besides, I don't have such a lump of perpetual motion as this to manage.

"Bless my soul—how do you live these hot days? Never mind the room! every thing looks well enough—you included—except that yen are looking a trifle better than well. How do you manage to keep so young and pretty, benny wify?"

Well might the smiling answer be, "the freshness and fullness of my husband's love, keeps my heart green."

Somebody tells the following: Gen. Pierce rooognizes this Union as his organ, and is democratio enough to evince his regard, even by a midnight visit to the composition-room, unheard and unattended. It was the night after the receipt of this intelligence of the death of Wm. R. King that the President's proclamation relative thereto, and the respective orders issued by the proper officers of the Army and Navy, were sent to the Union office for publication. At midnight, after the editors had all left the establishment, a plain looking gentleman, with specs on his nose, walked into the compositionroom where a printer, by the uncommen name of Jones, was busily engaged in "making up."

"Is it too late to correct a little error?" said the stranger.

Jones—"No, sir; not if it's in this form. What does it relate to?"

Stranger—"The death of Mr. King."

Jones—"The official orders, sir? I have them just here."

Stranger—"Well, just read my order over, and I will tell you what I wish chnngsd."

"My order!" cogitated Jones; "I wonder which is his. Which order did you say, sir?"

Stranger—My order."

Jones cast his eye up and down this long columne, then at his tormentor, but saw no clue to the troubleeome "order." He repeated his question: "Which order did you say you wished to correct?"

Stranger—(In a tono of peculiar and impressive emphasis)—"MY ORDER."

Jones, still unenlightened, turned upon the interrogator with "Well, if you will be good onough to tell me your name, I'll try to accommodate yeu."

Stranger (sententiously) "Franklin Pierce."

Poor Jones was "struck," just then, but he managed to make the required alteration in an inoredibly short space of time, and felt exceedingly relieved when he found himself alone again. Just ask Jones if the Union is Pisrco's organ or not.

The professional man who dares wear a threadbare coat until he is out of debt was in town yesterday. A very good looking but melancholy sort of man he was, and no wonder. At the bookstore the salesman suggested the advantage of cash payment, and taking the package home one's self, over trusting it to bungling porters, who don't know how to make changs properly on delivery. The sextou of the church he attended gave him a back seat, and spoke of this poor ventillatiou of the upper part of the room. His landlady was very much crowded with boarders, and could scarcely find a seat for him at the table. His lady nequaintances found him so thin and reduced that with difficulty they recognized him, and after his introduction could not feel as familiar as of old. It was surprising hew many of his old companions, who formerly had leisure enough, had become men of business, and suddenly remembered pressing engagements as he met with them. A clerical friend, wha knows him thoroughly, says that his fanoies singlarity, loves to be noticed, and is evidently proud of his shining raimsnt. He left town this morning by the early boat. [N. Y Times.

TRYING ONE'S TEMPER.—"During the recent trip of the Eclipse from New Orleans," says the Louisville Journal, "a young gentleman, who had just got married, came on board at Memphis to engage passage for himself and wife, but, before he could get nshare again, the boat had shoved off, and he found himself going up the Mississippi at the rate of twonty miles per hour, his lady-love standing at the wharf and witnessing the distressing sight. In vain did he appeal to the captain to land him, depioting his own situation and sufferings as well as these of "the wife he left behind him" in the most feeling terms. At Paducah, the Eclipse took a boat in tow laden with wood. On it he escaped, and intended to hail the first steamer for Memphis. From his conditiou when he left the Eclipse, the passengers were of opinion that he could not survive the shock forty-eight hours longer."

THE MISSEL LEGISLATURE.—The Legislature of Rhede Island adjourned last week, after a sseslon of four days. In this time, the State officers were inaugurated, a United States Senator for six years, and numerous other officers were elected, a law passed for holding a souvention to revise the constitution, and vartous other important measurss were adopted—sufficient, as another paper truly says, "for some Legislatures to have mangled over through a six months' sseslen."

A THING WHICH EVERY FARMER SHOULD KNOW. If yen wish to drive a out nail into seasoned oak timber, and not to have it break or bend, just have a small quantity of oil near by and dip the nail before driving, and it will never fail to go. If done on iron they will be sure to break.

DISCOVERY OF GOLD IN ARKANSAS.—The Onschita (Camden) Arkansas Herald of the 19th ult. says:

Our town has been thrown into a perfect excitement in consequence of this new discovery. Some of our citizens are now out in the hills and valleys, prospecting for gold. For this valuable discovery, the people of Arkansas are indebted to the sagacity of an old negro by the name of Scott, who has recently come to this place. He worked in the North Carolina mines for a number of years. Scott called at our sanctum yesterday morning. He appears to be an intelligent negre, and one whose statements can be relied upon. He stated to us that shortly after his arrival here, being impressed with the belief, from certain indications that were familiar to him, that gold in great abundance existed in the hills around this place, he asked permission of several landholders to prospect for gold on their premises. His requests were readily granted, and the result has been that gold has been found, not only on Dr. Newman's land, but in several other places. Scott is new digging for gold on Mr. Hedge's place, about two miles below this, where the prospect appears to be very fair. He states also that he has discovered gold near the grave-yard, about half a mile above here.

EXCITEMENT IN CAMBRIDGE.—Considerable excitement prevailed at Old Cambridge yesterday. It seems that the students of the Law School have been discussing the question of slavery, and there being Southerners as well as Northerners present, they were conducted with considerable spirit and piquancy. On Friday last, as the story goes, a student from New York made an anti-slavery speech two hours and a half in length, in which he used expressions that excited the hot blood of his Southern associates. The result was that, on Monday, a student from Marylsnd sent a message to the New Yorker, challenging him to mortal combat. Another son of that State bore the challenge. About this time the Faculty got news of the affair, and took measures to prevent a duel. It is said that warrants were obtained for the offending parties, but upon premise of good behavior they were not served. This morning things were quiet again, and it is hoped this affair will pass off without bloodshed. [Boston Herald, 17th.

EXTRAORDINARY FEAT.—As the passenger train on the Memphis and Charleston Railroad was coming down from Moscow yesterday, a crew was discovered some distance ahead, running on the rail. Onward and on came the "iron horse," with lightning speed, each revolution of the wheel coming nearer and nearer his "black majesty," he still running at his utmost speed, evidently trying to keep the lead, until the locomotive was within a few feet of him, when he stretched his wings to soar away, but it was too late; the iron monster was upon him, and quicker than thought his body was severed in twain by the wheels passing over him. This is a feat never performed before, to our knowledge, and perhaps may never be done again. [Memphis Whig.

HUMBOLDT ON TABLE-MOVING.—The Silesian Gazette publises a letter addressed by Alexander Von Humboldt, to a friend who had applied for his opinion upon the supposed magnetic phenomena of table-moving, which has been described in several journals. The veteran physician remarks that it has always been easier to destroy a false theory than an inaccurately apprehended fact. He then adverts to a long series of pseudo-scientific discoveries which have been made and exploded in the course of his eighty-four years' experience, and advises the table-movers "to try their chaff upon some younger bird."

BURNING OF THE FRENCH IMPERIAL THEATRE AT MOSCOW.—On the 23d of March the French Imperial Theatre at Moscow, one of the most beautiful in Europe, was completely destroyed, and nothing remained of it but a few tottering walls. Sixty pupils of the Conservatoire, who were at the moment in the dancing classes, saved themselves with more or less of wounds and contusions. Many children were thrown out of the windows and caught in sheets. An inquiry which has been made states the deaths at 21; loss estimated at 12,000,000 francs, nearly £480,000.

The late Robert G. Shaw, of Boston, bequeathed in his will the sum of $110,000 to be set apart at interest by his executors until it shall amount to $400,000. This sum is then to be known as the "Shaw Fund," and to be appropriated for the benefit of destitute mariners' children, under the age of 10 years.

NIAGARA SUSPENSION BRIDGE.—The great combined railway, carriage and foot Suspension Bridge, now constructing at Niagara Falls, is being pushed forward with energy, and is expected to be ready for the trains by the first of May of next year. It will be one of the most remarkable architectural works in the world

BLESSED BE GOD FOR FLOWERS.

The author of this sweet poem is, we understand, Mrs. Embury. It was suggested by seeing a child asleep with flowers in its hand:

Blessed be God for flowers!
For the bright, gentle, holy thoughts that breathe
From out their odorous beauty, like a wreath
Of sunshine on life's hours!

Lightly upon thine eye
Hath fallen the noontide sleep, my joyous bird;
And through thy parted lips the breath, scarce heard
Comes, like a summer sigh.

One rosy hand is thrown
Beneath thy rosier cheek, the other holds
A group of wood-field flowers, whose bloom unfolds
A freshness like thine own.

Around the fragrant prize
With eager grasp, thy little fingers close,
That are the dreams that haunt thy sweet repose.
What radiance greets thine eyes?

For thou art smiling still:
Let thee yet wanderlog in the quiet woods,
Finding th' expanded cups and bursting buds
At thine unfetter'd will!

Or does some prophet voice,
Murmuring amidst thy dreams, instinctive say—
"How well these flowers, for thee, beyond to-day, Shall in their spells rejoice!"

Yes! thou will learn their power,
Then cherish'd not as now, thou stand'st alone,
Compass'd by sweetly-saddening memories, thrown
Round thee by leaf or flower:

Yet come! as seasons come,
The empire of the flowers, when those shall raise,
Around thee once more the forms of other days,
Warm with the light of home!

Shapes then no more may'st see;
The household hearth, the heart-enlisted prayer,
All thou hast loved, and lost, and treasured there,
Where thy best thoughts must be!

Ay, prize them well, my child;
The bright, young, blooming things that never die,
Pointing our hope to happier worlds, that lie
Far o'er this earthly wild!

Prize them, that, when forgot
By all, their old familiar tints shall bring
Fresh thoughts of her whose dirge the deep winds sing,
And whose love earth holds not!

Prize them, that through all hours
Thou hold'st sweet commune with their beauty there;
And, rich in this, through many a future year,
Bless thou our God for flowers.

NOTES ON CUBA.

The people of our happy country, where the full liberty of conscience is one of the dear bought privileges of our wise institutions, can never realize the real value of the blessing they enjoy to the full extent, unless deprived of them for a time, and having the opportunity as I have, in some degree, of witnessing some of the observances of the Roman faith unaltered by a conflict with other faiths, nor purified and made better by advancement in mental culture. Here is a country where the ringing of church bells every half hour in the day, and the hundreds of Priests who have been consecrated to the worship of the true and living God, are mingling before the different altars in this densely populated city. On the holy Sabbath day all is gaysty and pleasure—the pleasure that killeth the soul. Even after a residence here of a year I am more astonished at the incongruity between the doctrines and precepts of the Bible and the externals of the Roman Catholic faith.

The last two Sabbaths have been to my mind strangely idolatrous. The manner of the ceremonies observed on last Sabbath was a celebration to the Virgin of the Dolereus—meaning the unfortunate;—it seems there are many Virgins—in other words, she is made the particular guardian and protector of various states and stations. There have been many miracles performed according to the belief of all good Catholics in this particular Island, which I have heard from good authority is considered by many devout persons to be a country peculiarly blessed of God, and probably is to be the future blessed abode of all the faithful followers of the Virgin. Of course this will be after they have been prayed out of purgatory.

Another of the (to Protestants) incomprehensible contradictions of the blessed Book is, usually, there are public celebrations and processions in honor of each order of the Virgins, and much display. The procession above referred to, was especially to the one first named. She (the Virgin) was a figure that was, magnificently dressed in white satin, with a mantle of rich purple velvet ornamented with precious stones to the amount of $2000—a present from a devout wealthy individual. The commencement of the ceremony, which took place in the Monserut Church, which church is always the particular abode of this order of the Virgin, was the baptism of the Virgin. She had her regular godfather, or as we would say, god-father. The ceremony was a regular baptism; the altar was magnificently illuminated by over a hundred wax candles, and hung with rich crimson drapery, which gave it a gorgeous and gay appearance. The Virgin, after the consecration, was placed in a sort of car of triumph, which was borne on the shoulders of four negroes, dressed very fine for the occasion, and then paraded up and down different streets of the city, and ended by making a visit to the house of the god-father.

After this the Virgin was returned to the church to be deposited until the next annual celebration, when she will be honored in like manner. She is in the mean time accessible to all who wish to make her especial grace and interposition; and I am told she has constant devotees to her shrine. In her triumphal procession and baptism thousands indeed tens of thousands, were out to do honor to the occasion;—not only the negroes and lower classes, but the élite of the city, all most devout in demeanor, and most essential, many kneeling in the streets as it passed. I feel induced to remark this circumstance here, as it seems to me as I before remarked to savor too much of idolatry. Indeed, the Catholic religion now, and in the days of Cortes, the great conqueror, is equally idolatrous to all appearance. Could the small waxen image or idol, that historians assume him of always taking with him when he went to war against the heathen, be more absurd than the worship of the above named Virgin? Yet we, here in this age of enlightenment, see the learned and the noble of the land worshipping and bowing to an image of wax or wood. We certainly, in a most charitable point of view, are compelled to see that ignorance and superstition are the nursing fathers and the nursing mothers of the Roman faith.

SUNDAY, 20th.—To-day is Palm Sunday. The name is derived from our blessed Saviour's triumphant entrance into Jerusalem. All Catholics observe the outward forms in a great degree. To-day the churches are lighted and decorated with the branches from the palm trees, which grow in abundance in Cuba. In countries where there are no palms the Roman priests can, with their usual influence over the minds of their church members, substitute some other evergreen. On this day all the multitude, who go to the different churches in this densely populated part of the island, return bearing the holy palm in their hands, made holy of course by the prayers of the priests. The last three weeks have been the celebration of the Passion of our blessed Saviour. The priests have nightly processions. On a sort of platform, a figure of wood large as life, dressed in purple, with a crown of gold thorns, surrounding the brow, and bearing a large cross, is borne on the shoulders of men accompanied by many bearing lanters and torches. A multitude generally follows in the procession. I confess that the emblem of Christ and his Cross are always to me solemn and most striking emblems. The illustration of objects are generally, I think, more impressive than the narrative, but the accompaniment of instruments of music, and the gay pieces played, produced painful and unpleasant reflections, and is to my mind more a mockery than a thing to edify. If there ever was a time of sadness and trial to our blessed Saviour while on earth, except while suffering on the Cross, it was most peculiarly so on the way to that Cross. And to witness this emblem during this painful and humiliating journey, accompanied by a giddy throng in most instances, and to hear such strains of music, at the time you are called on to witness the sad spectacle, is inconsistent with all the feelings of the religion of the heart. I often feel much solemnity in the churches here, and feel sure that many are most sincere. The endowments of the churches, in all Catholic countries, are a just reproach to the Protestants, being so much richer and more spacious; but I trust the living temple of our hearts will, in most cases, outshine them.

Surely, the priesthood must be, in most respects, a people who know and do not—they are mostly men of learning, and must feel fully aware of the folly of many of the rights and ceremonies of the Roman faith.

EASTER SUNDAY.—This day is the termination of the Roman Lent. I have for the last week had it in my power to witness many of their ceremonies. They have just passed the Passion Week, or rather the last week of it. On Thursday afternoon I witnessed the ceremony of the washing of feet. There were twelve little boys of four and five years of age, selected to represent the twelve Apostles. The priest who officiated made an address in Spanish to the assembled congregation—as I supposed on the subject of humility, and then the washing of feet began. I must say there was but little of humility in appearance, though the object was to memorialize one of our blessed Saviour's most striking lessons of humility. In the first place the little boys were dressed in crimson velvet—in the next, I do not suppose that even Queen Elizabeth's bason and ewer exceeded in massiveness the one used on this occasion. The napkin used was a fine Valencienne lace one, and the covering of the temporary altar, erected in the chancel of the church, was the richest and most gorgeous orange colored drapery. The robe of the priest must have cost a hundred and fifty dollars, or more, it being of fine white linen cambric, bordered with very wide and expensive Valencienne lace.

All was show and no solemnity. The only appearance of humility that I observed was the mingling of servants and mistresses in the Church services. Here this is common. But I am told, also, it is equally so in the domestic circle. In Church it is right to a certain extent; for, in the sight of God, they are equally His.

We visited the Churches in the evening, and saw the altars very splendidly decorated and lighted up; one, in particular, struck me. It was arranged to represent an open sepulchre, and just at the entrance lay a figure representing the Saviour, as taken from the Cross, bearing the marks of the scourge, the nails and the wounded side. I saw many of the lower classes, particularly the negroes, kneel and kiss the feet of the image and the hands, with much seeming devotion. Others seemed very gay and indifferent.

On the evening of Good Friday a grand procession passed through the streets, followed by music and multitudes of people of all classes, from the officers of the highest (for they are compelled to go,) down to the humblest negro. Our Saviour is exhibited as being on the way from the Cross; he is dead and laid on his bier, not (as we read of in Scripture,) quietly and humbly, but in great state. This procession passes some hours in its progress, and ends by depositing the body in the sepulchre.

This morning, at half-past five o'clock, all the town was up and astir to witness the resurrection of the Saviour. I could not go, (not being well,) but have been told that this is rather impressive. The representation is, however, quite on the stage-effect order—being nothing more nor less than a series of performances and delusions, arranged in the different Churches, to represent the resurrection of our Saviour. As in the like manner is his ascension arranged forty days after.

An hour or two after the resurrection took place, I saw the figure of a woman pass by, dressed very splendidly, apparently not more than twenty years of age. It will be borne in mind that the Virgin, at this time, could not have been less than fifty, and she is here represented, dressed in white brocade satin, with jetty flowing hair. This was the Virgin Mary on her way to pay a visit to the Saviour after his resurrection! I have merely given these in detail, and leave any who may chance to see this to draw their own conclusions. I feel in my own case to be so faulty, and to err so often from the blessed light of Gospel day, that I will not see, if I can help it, the mote in my brother's eye; for surely some among them are brethren. I will remark, however, as before, that Romanism, as a Church, does not produce a high standard of morality. All these ceremonies, and many more, that I, as a stranger, have not even heard mentioned, run to terminate in such a round of folly and gaiety as we scarcely even hear of in our Protestant country.

This afternoon there will be a bull fight: to-night a grand ball. All the largest assemblies take place on Sundays. During the next two weeks there will be masquerade balls, and a succession of fêtes of every imaginable variety, to gratify all tastes. And from what I have seen and heard, even the Priesthood will indemnify themselves for the past weeks of penance by a redoubled indulgence in their favorite amusements—the cock-pit and the gaming houses. The object of the Priesthood here seems to be more to amuse the people than to edify. In short, it is the declared object of the present reigning powers of Spain to keep the Cubans, at least, from thinking.

I will here mention another particular order of the Virgin that had not come under my observation at the time I mentioned the one styled the Dolorous. In an adjoining village, in one of the Churches, I noticed one of the representations of the Virgin as being black, and also observed the figure to be hung with many curious ornaments. A Catholic friend, who accompanied me, explained this as being the friend and patron of the sick and infirm. He also gave as a reason for the color of the Virgin as being intended as a compliment to the colored race; and that the very unique ornaments suspended around the imagine were the votive offerings made by those who wish her aid in healing. From the number and rich ones I saw in some instances, it must afford quite a rich harvest to the officiating Priest. For I am told that the space required is never more than a small niche in the altar beside the Virgin and what may be attached to the representation of the Virgin, which is not more than three feet in length, and the offerings made annually of gold and silver arms, hands, legs and feet, and even, on some occasions, of an entire image of precious metal, just to suit the wish of the supplicant. For instance, to have any of the above named limbs restored to health, or a beloved child spared from injury or death, the propiations are made. Some there are who venture to suggest that this Virgin contributes largely to fill the coffers of the Priests, who wait before her altar, as the before mentioned cabinet never gets so full as to run over. And this is but a reasonable supposition—though a Catholic Priest would soon do away, with his followers, any such suspicion by performing some optical delusion before them. M. S.

JEWISH CEREMONIES.

BY A JEW.

It is Sabbath morning now, and ere the boys are dispatched to the Synagogue, their pious mothers make them empty their pockets, for they must not "bear burdens" on this holy day. The pocket handkerchief, which the too scrupulous Jew cannot bring himself to consider an indispensable article of dress, must be slung round the hand, or tied round the waist, to "make believe" it is a glove or a girdle. To carry it in the pocket would be committing a most heinous offence. I remember the funeral oration over a pious old lady, in which her strict observance of this commandment, by not wearing a superfluous pin or dress, was dwelt upon with great stress.

But let us to the Synagogue. The matrons may go this morning, but "procul, procul, profani!" to all ladies rejoicing in "single-blessedness," whatever their age. You have doubtless, ere this, noticed that in all Synagogues, even among the somewhat heterodox Israelites, of this Continent, the ladies occupy the gallery; in Europe they are moreover completely screened from view by a sort of lattice work. This custom, doubtless, originated in the more Eastern clime of the Harem. Now, as the ladies are safely disposed of, we must look after the other sex; and we will select a very orthodox specimen for our purpose. Now see him with hasty steps approaching, for thus the Talmud tells him to go to the Synagogue, and to return slowly and deliberately, as evincing his reluctance to leave it. Ere he enters he kisses the door-post, or rather the Mesussah (Deut. vi. 9.) fastened there; then he steps down into the nave of the house. I lay emphasis on the word down, because the Rabbinists quote Ps. cxxx, 8: "Out of the depths have I cried unto thee, O Lord!" in support of this architectural arrangement. Then he repeats silently, "How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob, and thy tabernacles, O Israel!" (Num. xxiv. 5.) and takes his pew. The services on this occasion are divided into three grand divisions: The morning prayers, the reading of the law, and then an additional series of prayers, all characterized by the neglect of that injunction of the Saviour, "Use not vain repetions," which swells these services to a great length; which do not usually include any sermon in the vernacular. The law of Moses is divided into fifty-four sections, and as there are but fifty-two Sabbaths in the year, they sometimes read two of them together. This law is written on parchment scrolls, for printing is an offspring of the Evil One, and must not desecrate the holy place. There usually are a good many copies of the law in each congregation. They are kept in "the Holy Ark," a closet on the east side of the Synagogue. Every thing connected with the taking out, reading, and putting in again of the scroll is considered highly meritorious, so much so that all these offices are sold to the highest bidder, and the proceeds devoted to charitable purposes. When it is taken from the Ark to the reading desk, it is kissed by all whom it passes. Then, when it is opened to the section appointed for the day, the reader calls by name a member of the congregation, descended from the house of Aaron (for the Priests and Levites pretend to have preserved their pedigree,) by whom the first part of the section is read. Then comes a Levite,—then any of the lay-members. Each section is subdivided into seven portions. After this some one reads a chapter from the Prophets, appointed also for the day. The passage in Luke iv., doubtless, refers to this custom, "He went into the synagogue on the Sabbath day, and stood up for to read. And there was delivered unto him the book of the prophet Esaias."

After the law is returned to the Ark, if there is any strange Rabbi in the congregation, he is called upon to give them a sermon, or make some remarks upon part of the text just read. That this a time-honored custom will be seen by the following verse from Acts xiii, "And after the reading of the law and the Prophets, the rulers of the synagogue sent unto them, saying, Ye men and brethren, if ye have any word of exhortation for the people, say on." And the frequent mention in the Gospels of Christ's preaching in the Synagogues, comes also under this head.

I have already said that nothing is allowed to be cooked on this day; now you will doubtless stare when I tell you that without any infringement of this commandment, they yet manage to get a first-rate dinner. This is done by heating a large oven, usually a baker's oven, wherein are placed certain viands, which can only be brought to perfection by some such process; and no necessity is the mother of invention, these Jewish ladies contrive to furnish their table on the Sabbath day, even under such bad auspices, with dishes that a regular chevalier de cuisine would not hesitate to own.

My plan does not admit of many details referring to the observance of the Sabbath. They fill volumes in the Talmud and its commentaries. I shall only mention a few of them. In the twenty-ninth verse of the sixteenth chapter of Exodus, we find—"Abide ye every man in his place; let no man go out of his place on the Seventh day." Now, although this refers to the gathering of Manna, the Talmudists interpret it to signify that you must not go out side the corporation of a town: and at a later period, they extended their liberality to allowing you to go one mile beyond it. But as a man may some times wish to go see a friend at two miles distance, the accommodating gentlemen of the Oral Law have found a way to evade the letter even of their own law. You must take some bread and salt, or some other food, and deposit it on Friday at a mile's distance from your house, in the field, woods, or wherever this terminus may happen to be. On the next day, you walk thither (riding, of any kind is strictly prohibited) and if you find it eat it, or at least some of it; which will extend your domain at once to that limit, and then of course you may walk another mile—thus then these worthies cheat themselves by telling you how to evade laws of their own enactment.

I regret to say, that with such a scrupulous adherence to the letter of the law, so important a passage as the following in Isaiah, lviii. 13, should have escaped their vigilance, "If thou turn away thy foot from the Sabbath from doing thy pleasure on my holy day; * * * and shalt honor him, not doing thine own ways, nor finding thine own pleasure, nor speaking thine own words," etc. They certainly abstain from all manual and mental labor, but I am afraid it would be difficult to reconcile dancing with the above command; and that amusement is largely indulged in even on that Sacred day.

In the afternoon, about two hours before sunset, they again repair to the Synagogue for vespers. This is not held of equal importance with the morning service. As soon as the stars are perceived, they commence evening prayers; at the conclusion of which every man goes home, and with a glass of wine, and a burning wax taper, asks a blessing on the coming week, and a makes a solemn division between the holy [Sabbath] and the common [week day]; then extinguishes the candle by pouring wine upon it; and with this ends the Sabbath. During the remainder of the evening every man may pursue his usual vocation. Many superstitions attach to this evening, and if Sabbath eve spreads cheerfulness and joy in the Jewish household, this evening makes it dismal and gloomy. Many an "old wives' tale" have I heard of the spirits in Gehennah who had to return to their torments on this night; how they were heard to gnash their teeth, etc. I may as well mention here that the Jews believe in a kind of purgatory through which even the most pious have to pass—though only for a short season. The sons of the departed say a prayer for the repose of their soul during the first year; at the expiration of which time the Rabbins tell them their parents will be released. Those that die childless are supposed to haunt their former dwellings, and for this reason, perhaps, as much as for any other, the state of celibacy is held a disgrace to both sexes among the modern Jews.

The prayer alluded to above will remind you of the Romish mass, to which it bears some resemblance—though the difference is in favor of the Jews; for mass may be said by proxy, and has no limit assigned to it in point of time, for both of which reasons it is commonly made the instrument of extortion, which cannot take place in the former case.

This sketch of the Sabbath is much longer than I designed to make it. But I will now conclude.

La. JOSEPHUS.

A DEDICATION.

BROTHER McTYEIRE:—On Saturday the 14th instant, we commenced a three days' meeting in our new church, at Waterproof, La., and on Sunday, at eleven o'clock, A. M., it was my privilege to preach the dedicatory sermon to a large and very attentive audience, from Psalm 95, 6: "O come, let us worship and bow down: let us kneel before the Lord our Maker." In connection with the other services of that hour, with appropriate hymns and prayers, we dedicated that beautiful edifice, with all its appendages and furniture, to the public worship and service of Almighty God, and felt in our hearts that the offering was accepted at our hands.

The citizens of Waterproof, and the adjacent country, have displayed no ordinary degree of liberality and refined taste in the erection of this sacred edifice. It is situated on a convenient and beautiful site, just in the rear of the village, and opposite the steamboat landing. The house is fifty-six feet in length, by forty-two in width, and about twenty feet from floor to ceiling. The front of the building is surmounted by a steeple, in which is suspended a bell, presented to the Church by Captain T. P. Leathers, of the steamer Natchez No. 2. Within, and facing the pulpit, is a commodious and well ventilated upper gallery, for the accommodation of the colored people. The pulpit, altar and aisles, are neatly carpeted, and I believe also the flooring of the centre pews, occupied by the ladies. The pulpit is supplied with an elegant mahogany sofa; the desk is covered with a neat slab of white marble, on either side of which stands a plain pillar, surmounted by a solar lamp, corresponding with the lamps of a beautiful chandelier suspended from the ceiling about midway the nave. The exterior of the church presents a chaste and comely appearance to the observer; but I noticed several things in the interior arrangement worthy the imitation of all church-builders. In the first place, while you see nothing gaudy or unbecoming the plain simplicity of the Apostolic Christianity, you see everywhere a neatness, and completeness of finish, which corresponds well with that religion which is "pure and undefiled."

Again, I see the membership there have an eye to altar work; for not only have they an altar convenient in all its proportions, but the kneeling-board is covered with a soft cushion, so that the poor awakened sinner, who comes forward to have a special interest in the prayers of the Church, and who feels unwilling to depart without a blessing, need not undergo the necessary penance of kneeling indefinitely on a square edge or hard floor. God grant that many, very many, precious souls may be converted at that altar.

But what took my fancy more than any thing else, (perhaps self interest was more influential here,) was the symmetrical proportions and convenient arrangement of the pulpit. It is open on both sides, and also in front, except the space occupied by the desk, so that the preacher is not compelled, as in many of our pulpits, to stand waist-deep in a pool of stagnant air, while delivering the Gospel message, or leading the devotions of the people. And, then, the pulpit is down among the people, so that the preacher does not feel like an isolated being, cut off from the sympathies of his hearers, by being boxed up midway between the floor and ceiling, where he is compelled to preach over quite an area of unoccupied space, in order to reach his auditory.

Another fact which I observed with pleasure in this church was the ease with which I spoke. I am not sufficiently acquainted with the philosophy of sound to tell why this fact exists, but every preacher of much experience in public speaking, knows with what ease he can preach in some churches, and how very laborious it is to his vocal organs to preach in others. In view of this fact, it would be well for us to notice the architectural construction of those churches in which we speak with unusual ease, and take them for patterns in the erection of new ones.

The trustees have laid off a beautiful lot in the rear of the church for a cemetery, and many persons have already purchased lots for the burial of their dead. The people, generally, have acted under the noble impulse of an enlightened and Christian liberality in disbursing the expenses of this "house of prayer," but while the meed of praise is due to all who assisted in the enterprise, the valuable services of some of our lady contributors deserve special notice. With heart and tongue, and purse, and hands, did they continue their untiring efforts until the work was done, and the house of God stood up before their eyes in all its fair propotions, and complete in all its parts.

At our dedication meeting Brother Dieffenweirth, the preacher in charge, was assisted by Brothers Spear, Carney, and myself. But though the preachers enjoyed liberty in all their public exercises, and the people were attentive and serious, we had no conversions and no additions of membership except by letter.

After the services closed one of the brethren expressed a fear that perhaps we had not fasted and prayed enough for the spiritual prosperity of our meeting; and when it was proposed to have a protracted meeting at some future period, it was very properly suggested that we should precede it by solemn fasting and prayer for a general revival of God's work among the people. This is no doubt the scriptural course, and if properly attended to, it will be followed by the approval and blessing of the Great Head of the Church.

Except the disappointment of not seeing a more general work of Divine Grace among the people, and some insult done occasioned by the labors of the meeting, my visit to Waterproof was one of unalloyed pleasure. The privilege of meeting my old friend and fellow-laborer, Rev. C. J. Carney, was no small item in the bill of social and religious enjoyment.

Just look at your map, Brother McTyeire, and then tell me what you think of three preachers occupying the whole coast, on both sides of the Mississippi river, from the mouth of the Arkansas to the mouth of the Yazoo, and down the west side to Vidalia, including the settlements on the adjacent Lakes and Bayous? Well, sir, this was done by John Dixon, Charles J. Carney, and myself, in 1853. This territory composed what was then called Lake Providence District. Brother Dixon occupied the country from the village of Vidalia to Walnut Bayou; Brother Carney from Miliken's Bend to Point Chicot, and as a sort of counter-balance to the honor of being Presiding Elder over all of two preachers, I was sent to form a new circuit among the raftsmen and wood-choppers, with here and there a small planter, above and below Lake Bolivar.

Charley and myself called up many reminiscense of that remarkable year; and among others how he was canoe-wrecked on Bayou Baxter, and how, in order to meet my appointments, I had to swim my horse across the Mississippi river by the side of a pirogue. Cholera and other malignant diseases prevailed among our people that year, and we were both prostrated by repeated attacks of bilious fever; but in the midst of our suffering and labor, we were cheered by constant accessions to our little flock of church-members, and by the manifest conversion of many precious souls.

On my return from Waterproof I enjoyed a privilege which I had desired—that of spending a night with my valued friend J. F. Harper, where I also saw two of his younger brothers. They are sons of Rev. Miles Harper, whose history is intimately connected with that of early Methodism in the Southwest. The extraordinary melody of his voice, his native eloquence, his powerful preaching, and above all his success in the awakening and conversion of souls, will never be forgotten by the generation in which he lived. I knew him well in the decline of life; and though he was subject to extraordinary ministerial trials, and suffered from pecuniary embarrasement, yet in his pulpit labors he occasionally soared above all, and was fully Miles Harper again. Could I have my choice in the matter, I would rather have his voice in preaching than that of any man I ever heard. As I left the company of his sons I was drawn out in prayer to God that all of the children of my old friend and fellow-laborer might be saved in heaven.

Yours, affectionately,
J. G. JONES.

INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC IN CHURCH

I desire, with permission of the editor, to make a few observations to show, if I can, that all this is wrong.

Christianity is organized, and puts on its external forms, and customs, and practices, for the sole purpose and aim of increasing the true religion of heart and life. If any man denies this, and holds that Christianity is only for the reformation of social life—that it belongs to the civilities and decencies of society—smoothes the rough excrescences upon human life, and thereby brings men into favor with God, my observations are not intended for him. We differ as to the uses of a church—in the objects had in view in the organization of a Christian church, or the erection of a house of worship, and therefore an agreement, without a settlement of these preliminaries, would be merely an agreement of words without an issue, which is no agreement at all.

But I know very well that the practical Christian agrees with me that the object of organized Christianity is the promotion and extension of personal piety for personal salvation. And that its favorable effects upon society and social life are incidental, and not primary.

And one farther preliminary needs to be settled, but that is easily done. The institutions of Christianity are absolute, and are found written in the Bible; but the details of ecclesiastical customs may vary, having the proper end in view, with times and circumstances.

And I come now to remark, that any custom or practice to be retained in the church, after reasonable trial, must have the sanction of one of the following things:

First, It must be enjoined or recognized in the Scriptures as a part of, or as having connection with, divine worship; or,

Second, It must be ascertained by experience to be productive of the proper ends of Christian association, viz: Vital piety.

Then, first, there is no direct Scripture authority for instrumental music in public worship, or indeed in any other kind of worship. Singing is recognized as a part of public and social worship, but no other kind of music is.

This, however, is not conclusive, and the question arises, has it the support of sufficient practical advantage in the promotion of personal piety? We need not inquire whether persons often-times, who are religious and fond of church-going, prefer to hear instrumental music there, or how much pleasant feeling or satisfaction it affords such persons? This question, however it might be answered, has no weight; much less need we know how much social satisfaction is enjoyed by a multitude of the most respectable church-goers who are not practically pious.

The question is: Does it promote personal piety?

We must inquire of practical, godly Christians, first, whether under the control of the church-bible the church-form or the church organ, they feel their piety increasing in their hearts more than by vocal music, in their absence?

And, secondly, whether the witness testimony of these things is to bring sinners to repentence?

Now, the answer to these questions is transparent. Experimental Christianity does not acknowledge any considerable amount, nay any amount, of indebtedness to these things exclusively. Christians do not acknowledge these things as instruments either in their conversion or enlargement.

And, farther, are the churches where these things obtain the most, or the least religious of all the churches in the land, as a general rule? The latter, unquestionably.

These are propositions that no man can answer.

Mississippi. SCHWARTZ.

A GOOD EXAMPLE.

At a late meeting of the Quarterly Conference, of my circuit, it was determined to raise a small sum annually for the purpose of forming a Methodist Preacher's Library. This money is entrusted to a committee, who purchase the books with the advice of the preacher in charge. He is the librarian, and is responsible for the books, but is at liberty to lend them when he chooses. Some kind friends, who acted as agents, have collected thirty-five dollars for this worthy object, which has been forwarded, and a list of books sent in return.

The move was made by the P. E., who stated that the salary allowed our preachers did not contemplate their intellectual wants, but left them to be supplied by the liberality of their people.

We merely state the facts so as to give to the world the benefit of a good example in a new and inviting mode of doing good. A good library, placed in the hands of a studious and pious minister, will redound to the advantage of his congregation, and will be perhaps as beneficial as if the books were distributed among the people and read by them.

Who will adopt this suggestion? Ought not every preacher to be thus thoroughly furnished by his charge?

LAST WISHES OF A CHILD. By James T. Fields

All the budgets are in bloom,
And the warm west wind is blowing;
Let me leave this stifled room—
Let me go where flowers are growing.

Look! my cheek is thin and pale,
And my pulse is very low;
Kiss my lips before we part,
Take my hand, and let me go.

Was not that the robin's voice,
Flying through the crowded city?
I shall not be hindered long;
Take me to the fields of daisies.

Bear me to the silver brook,
Let me hear the water fall,
On the orchard I must look,
Five my burning heart to calm.

Plant and children press my hands—
Lead me quickly from the town,
Mother, dear! the child is dying—
I shall never speak again.

Still the budgets are in bloom,
And the warm west wind is blowing,
Still we sit by silent graves—
O'er the graves the grass is growing.

What is a Sinful Amusement?

Every amusement is sinful which tends to the injury of the health and the physical constitution. God requires that even the body should be presented a living sacrifice in his service; and when for the sake of momentary enjoyment, the gratification of taste or appetite, the physical system is deranged or weakened, God is robbed of what is rightfully his. Men shudder at the thought of the untimely death of those who, in a moment of insanity, or impelled by the promptings of conscience, have put an end to their earthly existence, and unless we have satisfactory evidence that they were insane, we have reason to tremble in view of their sin. But why is it any more self-murder to apply the halter or the knife, and thus end one's days, than to do the same thing by a round of dissipation or amusement?

Every amusement is sinful which tends to weaken or destroy the intellectual powers. Man is distinguished from the lower order of created beings by the possession of the reasoning faculties. These are given to him for some good and noble purpose. If he pursues a course of conduct, or indulges in such amusements as may thereby blunt or cripple his faculties for good, he sins against his own soul and against God.

The youth who spends his time in stuffing his mind with vain and idle stories, or in reading novels or romances, is not fulfilling the end for which this is ultimately done.

Those amusements are sinful which have a tendency to dissipate those solemn and serious reflections. Man is like the strong man, it should be his great object to do those things which will prepare him for that state to which he is hasting, and which will be ushered in by the heavenly Father and Judge. All the actions of God, he is bound to do with reference to the glory of God. Can those things upon which, when sober, we cannot reflect with satisfaction, or which inevitably unfit our minds for those things that compose the employment of the saint, and have only the appearance of evil, be sinful?

A healthy, cheerful spirit and manner is to be cultivated by the Christian, and there are such amusements as are innocent in their nature. A gentleman, [illegible] one, with a thinking mind, [illegible] it. In the order of [illegible] combining the [illegible] there are [illegible] duties and [illegible] pleasures, [illegible] duties [illegible] pleasures [illegible] duties [illegible] pleasures [illegible] duties [illegible] pleasures

IMPORTANT CHANGES.

Bishop Paine, at the request of many of its members, has changed the time of holding the Alabama Conference, at Tuscaloosa, from January 4th, 1854, to December 7th, 1853.

Bishop Andrew has corrected the appointment as published for his holding the East Texas Conference at Marshall. This Conference will be held November 30th, instead of December 3d.

TEN THOUSAND SUBSCRIBERS!!

We keep it before the people. As "ways and means" are always an important item, we submit the following from our Correspondence. No notions these, but facts. This is the "way" it can be done, and these the "means."

SOME OF THE FRUITS.—A local brother in Louisiana, sending a notice of a meeting, at which the Church was much revived and a wide religious interest awakened, winds up—

"During the meeting I obtained seven new subscribers for the N. O. C. Advocate, whose names, Post-offices and money, you have herein."

That is laconic. The cash was in. A dozen such letters a week would reach the mark soon.

NOT YET BEAT.—Our friend C. N. Mc., from a circuit in East Mississippi, in his last cartridge says—

"This makes fifteen new subscribers I have sent you this year, and Bro. C——, my colleague, has sent you seventeen. If any other circuit has beat this, let us know and we will try again."

We have a private note of thanks and information for him, and beg his pardon for publishing the good provocation.

WHAT OTHERS SAY OF US.—Rev. F. M. C., from Alabama, puts in an interesting postscript. Methodist preachers do not often get more than their due from this quarter. In this case we hope they have not. The letter dates May 4.

"P. S. Brother, would you take time to read a eulogy I heard passed upon Methodist economy a few nights ago, by an Editor of one of the Baptist papers. He was looking up the statistics of the Baptist Church—so he said; but it was quite convenient to get a few subscribers too. Accordingly, he laid the matter before his people, this way, after having showed the necessity of the religious press to the Church. Said he—'Let us imitate the Methodists in this respect. I do not know that there is one present, but certainly they set us an example here (with emphasis). When was it ever heard of in all Christendom, that a Methodist paper failed. The New Orleans paper is doing well, and the other papers are doing well; and why is this? Well, I will tell you. It is because the preacher, when going round, the first thing he looks for on entering a house is the Bible. The next is the Discipline. And next to these he looks for one of the Advocates. If he does not see it, he immediately makes the effort to get the family to take one. This is a strong hold of Methodism.'"

This is the way and the means. Plant the Advocate in every family, religious or irreligious, preached to or visited by our Ministry. There are more than TEN THOUSAND.

EDITORIAL COURTESY.

The Catholic Messenger often favors us with a notice, but such we fear as is not calculated to increase our patronage among its readers. In the paper of the 9th instant, referring to the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, Father Perché is evidently reaching after strong language:

"The members of the society will be happy to learn that they have already received a reward for their Catholic exertions, having been covered with the insults of the 'Christian Advocate,' a nasty Presbyterian paper of this city. This is a reward which can hardly fail to meet charitable Catholics in this our age of philanthropy."

Please the Editor, we are not a Presbyterian; and he knows better. Charge them not with our sins. On the second page of the Messenger, a correspondent, under the head of PROTESTANT PIETY, gives his observations in the backwoods. Here is an oasis in the desert of his pious researches:

"I have been a good deal amongst Protestants—I saw them go to rest at night and rise in the morning, but never have I seen a Protestant go on his knees to return thanks to God, or invoke his grace and blessing, except on one solitary occasion, traveling through Illinois, where I did see a Methodist preacher go on his knees and say his prayer."

The Editor of this "—— paper" is a "Methodist preacher." Hope our neighbor will think better of us, after this!

NATIONAL MAGAZINE.—The June number carries on the Editor's Essays on the "Christianity Required by the Times." This lays down the duty of benevolence—proceeding from principle and by method. We cannot do justice to it without quoting largely, which we will do next week, and commend it in advance to prayerful consideration.

BLACKWOOD FOR MAY.—Contains a crushing article on the rappings, knockings, and other "spiritual imposture." The visions are not Sioux "as purely blasphemous." Leonard, Scott & Co., New York.

HARPER FOR JUNE.—Mr. McGinnis, 56 Gravier street, laid an early copy on our "table." See Advertisement.

PERSONAL SKETCHES.

A writer of considerable facility in style and criticism, sometimes entertains the readers of the Southern Ch. Advocate with sketches of distinguished characters. Last year he was taking off distinguished preachers, and in a manner not acceptable to all concerned; indeed, highly offensive, and justly so. Does a minister's faithful service to the Church make his private character, manners, person and qualifications, a legitimate subject for every anonymous scribbler to entertain the public with al? What though a little faint praise bespatter him as an offset to certain sinister flings—this is a notoriety not bargained for on entering the pulpit.

But this writer certainly understood the merits of one case. For, while taking off distinguished preachers, he had the modesty to take off himself! A few little love licks—mere back handed taps—were inflicted for a show of impartiality; but a large balance of greatness was left to his credit side. We have heard of "You tickle me and I'll tickle you," but this was a specimen of I'll tickle myself—an advantage, by the way, of the "anonymous."

We have no difficulty in recognizing this writer in a late number of the Southern Advocate. The invidious, personal sketches are resumed. The parlor and dining table (as far as the limited and unsatisfactory acquaintance of this writer extends,) of a private gentleman of this city are freely drawn upon in a "Letter about New Orleans." Mr. Hill's munificent liberality to Methodism is made the occasion of mean reflections upon his hospitalities, and of his being held up before the public, in an equivocal light, by some splenetic penny-a-liner, who finds vent for his apocryphal "communications" through a Methodist paper. Men of wealth and refinement will beware how they signalize themselves by "practical tokens of a munificent spirit towards Methodism and Methodist preachers." They may be procuring for themselves "bad eminence."

As "Cottager" promises further communications from this quarter, we propose to him more fit subjects than the character of private gentlemen, their parlor furniture, the order in which their meals are served, their cut glass, and plate, and decanters.

Will he edify the readers of the Southern with a description, from personal observation, of the St. Charles' mask ball that came off while he was "familiarizing himself with the metropolis of the South-west"? Perhaps, also, he might give us, through the columns of the Southern, the way things are done at a St. Louis ball, or a peep into the Theatre or Opera.

We have a decided mistrust of this new style. Commend us, rather, to Old Methodism—"indifferently improved"!

TEMPERANCE CONVENTION.

"It is now a fixed fact," says the Organ, "that a State Temperance Convention will be held in this city on the 4th of July."

The time is near at hand, and it behoves those of our Louisiana friends who would roll on this ball, to move promptly and be getting out their delegates.

The State legislation, sought for in the late Conventions of our sister States, placing the liquor traffic under local control, has already been secured in Louisiana. But public opinion is to be yet further moulded, and local action stimulated, and the generous wave swelled; and this can be done best by assembling Temperance men in solemn State Convention, discussing measures and devising means.

SEPARATE INTEREST.

The extract below, from a Baltimore letter writer of 31st ultimo, shows a bold movement, and what every American heart will be glad to see—a prompt counter-movement. It verges to a separate interest in form, as there is in fact, on the part of the Romish Priesthood in this country. They are among us, but not of us. It would be more agreeable to their allegiance to pay all their taxes, as well as their school tax, to a foreign government. For there they hold allegiance.

Refusing to let the rising generation live and learn together, and thus growing up and educating the race of on-coming citizens in estrangement and hostility, they would now draw alien lines around "the property of Catholics."

If citizens are to be taxed to support only such institutions as they use, what becomes of hospitals, penitentiaries, light-houses, &c., needful for the public good. If only such as they can approve—this is carrying out the right of private judgment to an extent quite surprising for Catholics. Such a principle admitted, no government could exist.

We remark on this last phase of the Public School subject, because of the uniformity in this agitation. What has turned up in Baltimore will after awhile, as other measures fail, turn up here.

But to the extract. It is rich:

"A petition signed by Archbishop Kenrick, and a large body of Catholics, was recently presented to our City Council, asking that the property of Catholics may be relieved from the School tax, as they did not wish to be forced to contribute to the support of "Schools which they did not use and cannot approve." The Committee on Education, to whom the petition was referred, have submitted a very strong report, which will not be likely to heal the sectarian bitterness of which our city is so full. The report of the Committee boldly asserts that the petition is from the "head and heart of a foreigner," who is incompetent, both by birth and education, to understand the genius of our institutions. They hold that the public school system is perfectly consistent with Christianity, and that it is the anti-republican tendencies of the Church of Rome that have brought it into opposition to the educational system of this country. They declare their unwillingness to yield one iota of our civil and political rights to the peculiarities or prejudices of any individual, or combined religious sect or party, and conclude that it will be unsafe, unwise, and unjust to interfere with the present system of our public schools. This is, perhaps, the strongest anti-Catholic document ever put forth by a political body, such as our City Council, and is an evidence of the excited Protestant feeling which has been evoked here. It naturally causes much remark, and is bitterly denounced by the Catholics. The City Council have so far endorsed it as to discharge the Committee from the further consideration of the petition. Some of the Catholic citizens design resisting the payment of the school tax in order to test the unconstitutionality of the law under which it is collected. In the Legislature resolutions have been reported excluding all sectarian books from the schools, but expressly declaring that the Bible shall not be considered as sectarian."

SICILY ISLAND, LA.—Rev. H. L. Green writes, 30th ult.:

"We have just closed one of the most interesting meetings I have seen in these parts for many years. It was a two days' meeting, appointed and conducted by local preachers entirely.

"We have only five local preachers in the bounds of this circuit, and I tell you they are alive to the cause this year. Rev. Thomas Green, a local Elder living in this circuit, we took for our P. E. during the meeting.

"On Sunday we had as large and well-behaved congregation as I ever saw at a two days' meeting, at the old camp-ground on Deer Creek.

"At 10 o'clock, A. M., we had a very interesting prayer meeting, conducted by Bro. —— Johnson. At 11 Rev. Thomas Green preached one of his feeling sermons; after which he proceeded to the administration of the Lord's Supper. This over, he cast the net. Only three were taken in, but I am of opinion they are three of the right kind—'such as shall be saved.'"

NEW BISHOP.—The Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church, N. C. Diocese, have elected Dr. Atkinson, of Baltimore, to succeed Dr. Ives in the bishopric. It would seem from his affinities with Bishop Whittingham, who lacks neither starch nor stiffness, there is no danger of what our neighbor, the Vicksburg Herald, so dreads—"a languid Episcopacy." A Baltimore correspondent (31st ult.) of a city secular paper says:

"The election of Dr. Atkinson to the Bishopric of the Protestant Episcopal Church in North Carolina was entirely unexpected here, and is therefore the occasion of some remark. Dr. Atkinson has but recently taken charge of a handsome gothic church built especially for him in the most fashionable portion of our city. This congregation, if he should accept, will part from him with much regret. He is a high-churchman and a strong supporter of the present Bishop of the Diocese. He is, also, however, an excellent and most estimable clergyman, and not likely to follow Bishop Ives in his conversion to the Roman Catholic Church.

The late Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church was the scene of an excited struggle, growing out of Dr. Joha's case. Dr. J. had persisted in preaching in a Methodist Church at the time a revival was going on, in the face of a remonstrance from Bishop Whittingham, to whose high-church notions such conduct was unchurchman-like. The Bishop submitted the matter to the Standing Committee for advisement. They coincided with the Bishop, censured Dr. Johns, but refused him the trial which he demanded. Through the connivance of the Bishop this document was published among the proceedings of the Convention, thus recording a semi-official condemnation and censure of Dr. Johns, whilst refusing him a trial. This gave rise to an excited debate this year; but partial justice was done to Dr. Johns by the passage of a resolution declaring that the document was intended only for the private advisement of the Bishop, and not as a censure or prejudgment of Dr. Johns."

EMPTY FLESH POTS.—A quaint lay friend was in our office the other day, and talking about preachers quitting the Ministry to "serve tables." They thought they could do better—certain. The sole question was one of conscience and not economy—should they do it? Get rich, dwell in fine houses, take ease and honor? He said they were generally disappointed: They went back to the flesh pots, but there was nothing in them.

WOODVILLE, ALA.—Rev. E. V. Levert writes, May 30: "I have just returned home from Hamburg, a village seven miles east of Marion, at which I attended a Quarterly Meeting and the dedication of an excellent Church.

"There is now in progress in Woodville a most gracious work. About a score of conversions and additions to the Church."

A FATHER TO HIS MOTHERLESS CHILD.

BY EDWARD M. KLINE.

Six years have rolled their silent round,
Since I beheld thee last;
Six long and weary years, dear boy,
Are numbered with the past—
Since last I held thee in my arms,
And pressed thee to my heart,
Thou source of all the happiness,
That earth can now impart.

I gaze upon thee and I see,
Upon thy features mild,
The lineaments of her I lov'd,
The mother of my child.
And, oh! what pleasure in the thought,
That thou, like her, should'st be,
A joyous pilgrim on the earth,
From care and sorrow free.

God grant that thou may'st learn to know,
The wisdom of her way,
Who, while on earth, by lessons pure,
Control'd thy young mind's sway.
And unto her, by power divine,
The happy thought be given,
That she it was who early taught
Thy hope to rest on Heav'n.

For oft have I, in fondness dwelt,
Upon the darken'd past,
And on its ideal surface seen
All gloom by light o'ercast.
Thus she, who was my guiding star
Through many a lonesome year,
Still lives and loves, and urges on,
From her celestial sphere.

Amid my wanderings, never yet,
Has pride or pleasure stole,
One thought from thee, my darling boy,
The sunlight of my soul.
But ever with me, in the gloom,
Or brightness of each hour,
My stern heart never once has fail'd
To own thy magic power.

And now be with thee, my fond pray'r,
That He who rules above,
May mould thy heart in innocence,
And truth, and peace, and love.
That when our mission done on earth,
United we may be,
With her, who called long years ago,
Lives in Eternity

TRAVELING CORRESPONDENCE.

A Coal Spring and a Narrative—Up the River—Landing at Night—Memphis Navy Yard—A Broken Trip and Beautiful River—Old Rusty Town—A Revival—Reflections.

If I am not mistaken, one wall of your sanctum is ornamented with a map. Please brush off the dust and spider's webs, and fix your eye on a cool and cozy looking dot, near the line between Tennessee and Alabama, and close to the Tennessee river. That dot in that snug, cool looking place is Tuscumbia, a very euphonious Indian name, not of a tribe, but of an individual aboriginee, whose only memorial is this name. Leaving the hotel, (all stopping places are hotels?) walk two or three squares, city measure, and sit down on a mossy rock, shaded with luxuriant locusts, whilst I go over the past week of travel. At your feet, twenty feet below, gushes a spring of prodigious volume from the base of a ledge of limestone, looking blue with coolness, and sparkling with life. Full of mirth and glee the imprisoned dryades rush along, almost mad with new born freedom, until they mingle with the waters of the Tennessee, two miles from the point where they make their escape.

Now on board of a fast boat, the Crescent City disappears, and we are confined to the Mississippi. Three days of monotonous eating, drinking and sleeping, bring us to Memphis, where, as usual with way passengers, we land in the night. Entering a strange city at the still, dark hour of midnight, leaves a bewildering impression upon the mind. The street lamps flicker, and throw a pale, sickly glare upon the pavement and houses. Here and there lights glimmer in the upper windows, gleaming out sleepily, as if fatigued with watchings, and longing to be snuffed and put to bed. Arrived at the hotel, porter and baggage, we find one rusty lamp, and a solitary individual in the office keeping it company, who talks in monosyllables and seems to have a cold. Desperately sleepy, we make vague inquiries about the stages and cars, forget the answers, and sleep soundly in a strange bed, in a strange house, and in a strange city.

Memphis has a growing appearance, and claims about eighteen thousand inhabitants. Its streets are not paved, but graveled in the principal thoroughfares; very dusty in dry weather, and muddy, I suppose, when it rains. The town is situated on an eminence, but is only partially seen from the river. Its best buildings, hotels, churches and private mansions, are respectable, but none of them can be called splendid. The most interesting object to a visitor is the Navy Yard. The Government probably made a mistake in locating it so far from the sea. But here it is, and the Treasury has not been stinted in its expenditures upon it. The buildings are of costly materials, and the surrounding grounds are tastefully laid out and ornamented. The description of the rope-walk, to a man of the trade, would be highly instructive and interesting, but I have neither language nor inclination to do so. One building, not less than a quarter of a mile in length, embraces the rope making department. There are mammoth spools of hempen yarn, and twisted ropes of every size, from the head line of a yawl to the cable of a seventy-four. In the ground fronting immediately on the river, is a row of guns, such as make up the broadside of a man-of-war. Compared with field artillery, they appear heavy and unwieldly. Black and motionless as they are, an indescribable dread creeps over you, lest approaching them you should wake up their sleeping thunder and feel their iron breath. Such a file of surly giants piercing the sides of a battle ship, and opening their wide mouths upon the face of an enemy at once, would make the blood of a Nelson chill. Thus in the midst of peace the preparations of war go silently on, and the national flag always waving from a central staff, reminds and admonishes that this is the surest guarantee of its perpetuity.

The suburbs of a town is the point where we naturally look for the beautiful. In the business localities, art stands alone, dry, solid, utilitarian; but in these rural precincts nature and art are wedded, and both are made more lovely by the union.

The environs of Memphis are altogether pleasing. Stately mansions and neat cottages, with their ornamental attendant of trees, shrubbery and grassy lawns, meet the view in every direction. They are pocket editions of paradise, and when you look at them, you are tempted to imagine that Eden was not lost, but divided by the fall. One pleasing feature of these retreats is the tall old forest trees, which a refined taste and correct judgment have spared from the original growth of nature's own planting. These are mostly a noble specimen of the oak, and only inferior to the live oak of Louisiana.

Take a piece of chalk and draw a crooked line from Memphis to this point, and then get on the cars. Thirty-nine miles of slow running bring us to Moscow, the present terminus of the Memphis and Charleston Railroad. Here we are bundled into the coach, nine inside and three on top—passengers on the hurricane roof. One day and night bring us to Purdy, and here "is the patience of the Saints." Fare paid through, and promise of uninterrupted conveyance. But after a sleepless night, and a breakfastless ride in the morning, we were brought to a stand by a break in the link of stages. One back was all, and that could take but three of nine. The way bill saved the trouble of casting lots, the first three on the list having an unquestionable right to the seats. To lose our money and our chances of going on, and to be thus set down and abandoned to our fate, in such a dilapidated, miserable looking place, was too bad. Those that cursed, now cursed the agent; those that prayed, talked of appealing to Cæsar. Finally we made shift to charter a Jersey wagon, for Humburg, a point on the Tennessee, sixteen miles distant. There, as hap was, we found a diminutive stern-wheeler, with a pealed sapling for a jack-staff. Safe on board, we find in the person of the Captain the veritable proprietor of our unfortunate stage line. He proved to be a gentleman, refunded all extra expenses, and landed us near Tuscumbia without charge.

This I esteemed a felicitous tribulation—a blessing in disguise after all—as it afforded an opportunity of making the acquaintance of this beautiful river. No Southern stream, so far as I have seen, can vie with it in the romantic and the lovely. The banks are high and regular, and their projecting brows are fringed with overhanging shrubs, vines and trees. The water has not that muddy complexion which characterizes our Louisiana streams. Dark and yet clear, it washes a bed of gravel and rocks, and affords an enviable retreat for the finny inhabitants that people every eddy, and pursue their fishy sports in its almost translucent currents.

As we wind along the graceful curves of the river, with a pleasant breeze fanning the deck, and a bright, but not oppressive, sun looking obliquely upon the scene from the partially suspended curtains of his evening couch, every thing, but our sapling jack-staff, conspires to persuade you of existence in fairy land, and of a voyage upon the dreamy waves of unmixed felicity.

Whilst in Tuscumbia, a small, rusty old place of a few hundred inhabitants, during an evening walk, I accidentally came upon a Methodist revival. The singing, though heard at a distance, could not be mistaken, and guided by this melody, I was led to the house of worship. The services were opened, by announcing that thirty-three had been converted, the week past, and then a sermon of point and strength. Mourners were called, and the altar was soon thronged with seekers, mostly very young people and children of both sexes. One prayer followed, after which the "Old ship of Zion," "Come go along with me," and the like sort of hymns, if they are hymns, were sung with unabated vigor for about two hours, with occasional interludes of manifested joy and sorrow.

As a mere "looker on in Venice," I studied this revival subject with interest, though I confess to my doubts of the propriety or scriptural warrant of some part of the proceedings. Young penitents, and old ones, too, need more instruction, more prayer, and less excitement-making. I may be heterodox, and if so, it is not desirable to be otherwise, in condemning the kind of hymnology which pervades these meetings. These fanciful, adaptandum songs, should be purged from the Church, and banished the sacred precincts of our altars. No Church has produced so rich and beautiful collection of spiritual and evangelical hymns, adapted to all occasions and states, as our own. The best of these are neatly compiled, selected with taste and judgment, and probably for the very purpose, in part, of excluding the pernicious doggerels of which I speak, from the pale of worship. Such a result would be creditable to religion, and any thing but detrimental to enlightened and scriptural piety. May the time soon come when this desideratum shall be brought about. Amen.

In passing through this old and long settled country, our own new Louisiana suffers nothing by comparison. It is true, there is here much beauty and maturity in the well improved aspect of the rural sections. But there is a worn out appearance: the decrepitude of old age, hard usage, and the dilapidation of neglect and want of enterprise, which detracts from its interest. In new and growing States, there is a spring, freshness and energetic enterprise which contrasts favorably with these things.

In conclusion, Mr. Editor, from the cool spring which flows below us, I drink the health of the Advocate, its Editor and its readers, and send this to all the world, greeting.

WOODSMAN.

NEEDLESSLY POSTPONING BAPTISM.

MR. EDITOR:—I have often seen probationers in our Church called up to be received into full connection, and on almost every occasion of the kind some one, or more of them, had not been baptized.

Now, what course has been generally pursued in such cases?

As far as I have observed it has been a very general practice for the preacher in charge to say to the candidates for baptism: We will have to defer receiving you until my next appointment, when I will attend to baptism.

When the writer joined the church he was baptized at the very first opportunity offered which was some weeks afterwards, and then had to go to a church some miles from home to have it attended to. At this postponement of baptism I have always been grieved. I cannot tolerate the idea of seeing a brother compelled to postpone this important ordinance when there is plenty of water at hand.

My feelings were peculiarly awakened upon this subject to-day, on seeing a mother received, and her daughter turned off to wait one month for baptism. Possibly she cannot attend at the next appointment, and then at the next following the ordinance may not be administered. Although I do not believe baptism is absolutely essential to salvation, still I think it of such vast importance that no one can with impunity wilfully neglect it, and I believe also if the neglect is on the part of preacher the candidate is not responsible.

But why this postponement in so many instances? "See, here is water; what doth hinder me to be baptised?" Acts ix, 36. What did Philip do in this case? He stopped the chariot and baptized the eunich immediately. For what cause, then, did our brother postpone in the case of our sister to-day? There was a pitcher of water upon the stand, and what more could he need? If he had been an immerser the delay might have been necessary, but he was not.

Is our ceremony too long? Or has not the minister liberty to abridge in cases of emergency? There is wrong somewhere.

Mr. Editor, I have penned these few words on my return from church, after witnessing the circumstance to which I alluded above, merely to call attention to the subject; for I have often been grieved to see a candidate turned off without baptism.

CHURCH STRUCK BY LIGHTNING AT LOCKPORT—One Man Killed, Six—Others Wounded.—Buffalo, Monday, May 23.—The Congregational Church at Lockport was struck by lightning yesterday afternoon during service. It entered the gallery occupied by the singers, instantly killing Luther Crocker, one of the choir, and injuring six others; three of whom are ladies. Consternation and dismay seized on all the congregation at this sudden and awful event, and Rev. Mr. Gilman, who from the pulpit beheld the full effect of the calamity, fainted away. The shock was terrific, and its effect for several minutes rendered every person powerless. The steeple was much shivered. The injured parties were much burned, but all except one are doing well.

PROFESSORS OF RELIGION FROM HOME.

MR. EDITOR:—It has been a matter of no little mortification to see how loosely some professing people wear their religion. They can put it on and off with the most astonishing ease. At home, among their acquaintances and neighbors, they pass for very good Christians, but take them from such associations, and put them among strangers, and they cease to present any of the distinctive marks of Christianity.

For instance, many members of the Church when traveling allow themselves a license in conversation and manners unbecoming the followers of Christ. They immediately place their light under a bushel, and there keep it, as if it was no longer intended to shine. They appear desirous to conceal their Christian character, by avoiding all conversation bearing upon the subject of religion. Is this honoring God? Is this making ourselves the light of the world, and the salt of the earth? No, we believe such a course to be sinful.

It is true the Christian among strangers is not expected to publish to every body that he is such; nor is he to affect in his department a peculiar sanctimoniousness. These things might render him an object of disgust; but there is a Christian carriage becoming every professor of religion, and one which never fails to make a favorable impression upon the minds of those in whose midst we may be thrown. A discreet Christian often finds among strangers other Christians who are readily drawn towards those who carry about them the marks of Christ. How often have have good people, personally unknown to each other, been brought together in this way, and have spent in each other's society hours of pleasantness and profit. Besides sinners are not unfrequently able to distinguish certain religious traits in those who are strangers to them which force them to admire the excellency of Christianity. Let a man take up a Bible in a tavern or steamboat, and read it as if he was interested in it, and all around him will be forced inwardly to commend him.

But how many professors of Christianity, under such circumstances, do away with Bible-reading—are almost ashamed to take one in their hands? This may appear strange, but is it not true? Perhaps some who may read this article are implicated?

Again, there are many who when they go to our large cities make no sort of effort to attend the religious services which may be going on at the time. And some of these pass for ministers of the Gospel. Perhaps it is prayer-meeting night; the bell announces the fact, but they take no heed. They prefer to stay at the tavern, or wherever they may be, and spend the time in worldly conversation.

Now, ministers are expected to be examples to the flock in self-denial and cross-bearing; and, wherever they are, should seek to encourage an attendance upon the services of God's house. It is not expected of ministers that they are to visit cities and frolic away their time like worldly men. They should arrange their business so as to attend the week-night meetings. It is refreshing to those who have the pastoral charges of churches, and is also refreshing to those members who compose these meetings.

Brethren, ministers and people, when you go to the towns and cities, take care and not leave your religion at home—carry it with you and keep it, and in order to do the latter attend all the meetings you can.

Yours, in Christ,

May, 1853. PHILANDER.

PRESBYTERIAN (O. S.) GENERAL ASSEMBLY.

This body, now in session in Philadelphia, is the largest ever held—consisting of nearly 300 members.

A significant and animated discussion has marked the proceedings on the propriety of of a Correspondence with the Congregational Churches of England and Wales, the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of Ireland, the Free Church of Scotland, the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland, with the Free Churches of France, with the Churches of the Canton de Vaud, of Geneva or the Synod of the Waldenses, also to the Free Church of Holland?

Dr. Spring moved that letters be addressed to the four Churches on the Continent, which had been named, but to none of the ecclesiastical bodies in Great Britain. He stated that the correspondence of the Assembly with those bodies had been terminated in the form of angry reproach and recrimination on the subject of slavery. The last letter had come from us.

Dr. Junkin would not correspond with any body who did not understand and obey the precept, "be courteous." He thought this a peculiarly unfit time to attempt a renewal of our intercourse with those who were filling Europe and the world with false representations of our principles and conduct—and they would equally scout the idea of holding intercourse with us.

Another distinguished member said the correspondence had been offensive and objurgatory, and the Assembly in their reply had so stated, and distinctly declared that unless it could be conducted in a better spirit, it had better cease.

Dr. Lord, of Buffalo, thought that there could not be a more unfortunate time to entertain the idea of renewing the suspended correspondence when the current of public opinion in Great Britain was openly founded on calumny and misrepresentation of the American Church and people. We did not stand on the good opinion of these brethren, but on the judgment of God. Any attempt at this time, from our side the water, to renew the suspended intercourse, would most certainly be misunderstood and misrepresented.

Drs. Breckinridge and Murray rather favored the correspondence. But an American feeling and self-respect prevailed, and the whole matter was left just where it was, by a motion to lay on the table—Ayes 112, Nays 98.

This will remind our Southern readers, with pleasant sympathy, of passages in Methodist history.

Our readers are concerned to know the doings of this sister Church, with which we are co-laborers in evangelizing the world.

The Board of Foreign Missions report the receipts during the year, $153,855. Of this sum, the donations amounted to $85,346.

The Secretary presented a list of the Synods in the Church—designating which had advanced, and which had fallen back, in their annual contributions. Sixteen had increased; eleven had fallen off. The increase amounted to $12,202; the decrease to $7885; leaving an aggregate amount of increase of $4437.

The operations of this society lie in India, Siam, China, Africa, and Papal Countries. Much difference of opinion prevailed as to converting the Jews. A resolution assumed that the truth of the Scripture is involved in the successful prosecution of this work, and urged in strong language the necessity of striving to effect their conversion. To this some, who appear to be pillars, objected—convinced that efforts to make converts among the Jews were useless at the present time. Providence affords no indication that the period for these exertions had arrived. There were many great questions which will doubtless be solved at some time and in some way—the reformation of the Jews one of these problems. Yet they were much interested in the ancient people, and wished to see their welfare looked to.

The Board of Domestic Missions report that 515 Missionaries have been in service during the past year. Much good has been effected by their agency. Quite a number of the Domestic Missionaries have been enabled to sustain themselves without any assistance from the Board. The average annual appropriations to Missionaries have been $132. The average salaries received by them from the Board and from the people amounted to $372. The receipts during the past year from all sources were over $81,000. The whole available fund for the period was $85,000. The expenses were $67,000—leaving a surplus of about $17,000 in the treasury. During the year a debt of $5000 has been paid off, and the Board is free from debt, and in possession of a good working balance.

A memorial on the question whether persons should be admitted to the communion who do not subscribe to the Confession of Faith, was reported on. The decision in this case shaves closely upon "close communion." We opine, too, it will keep many out of the Presbyterian Church if, in becoming members, they are to subscribe to the Confession of Faith. We have always understood (perhaps incorrectly,) that this strong meat was put upon Elders, but not, as a necessary condition, upon members. Many find an edifying fellowship and ministry and agreeable social conditions in this Church, and are members, who could not make the subscription. However, there is the word "practically" and the local "discretion;" for—"The Assembly decided in substance that persons joining in the communion, as members of the Presbyterian Church, do practically subscribe to the Confession; but that the matter should be generally left to the discretion of the Church sessions."

A Western Theological Seminary was determined on, and located in Danville, Ky. It is intended, we presume, to be the Princeton of the West. Officers: For the Chair of Didactic Theology, Dr. Robert J. Breckinridge; for Ecclesiastical History, Dr. Humphrey; for Oriental Literature and Biblical Criticism, Dr. Palmer.

In the peace and prosperity of this Assembly and all its interests, those who love the Lord Jesus sympathise; and also the kindred Assembly, (New School) simultaneously sitting in Buffalo. But there are breakers ahead, in the slavey question, for both of them. The M. E. Church, South, in 1844, took the initiative. They will have to follow. Ominous shadows of this coming conflict between conservative principle and abolition fanaticism fell upon the proceedings of the Old School. In the New, the interference of the Assembly was spiritedly resisted by the Southerners, a report on slavery being up. They said, plainly, that every Southern Presbytery had resolved to secede, if it was adopted. On the other hand, Western delegates declared that the Western Presbyteries would separate from the Assembly, if no section was taken. The feeling ran high. After several speeches, and amid great excitement, at nearly twelve o'clock at night, the report of the committee, slightly modified, was adopted—Yeas 76, Nays 38. Two to one!

DANCING AND MARRYING A SISTER'S DAUGHTER. The Presbyterian General Assembly, (New School,) in session at Buffalo, has had under consideration two questions, which have attracted general interest: First—Is it consistent for a church-member to engage in promiscuous dancing? Second—Is it allowable for a church member to marry the daughter of his sister—his niece? The first question the Assembly answered promptly in the negative.

Dr. Cox, in reporting on the second question, thus presented the matter: The question, he said, was two-fold. "First, is it lawful for a church-member to marry the daughter of his sister? Second, after such marriage is contracted, can the person contracting it retain his standing in the church?" His conclusions were thus stated:

"1. That what is either lawful or positively forbidden may be a different matter, and often is a very different one from what is expedient.

"2. No legislation by the church can bind the conscience of a man, and God does not forbid the relation.

"3. Nearest of kin should always be preferably avoided.

"4. That the proper liberty of individuals on the subject of marriage should be carefully guarded and established, as well as all the violations of Divine laws sacredly prevented.

"5. No forfeiture of church standing ought to result from the mere circumstance of the above relation."

The Assembly refused to sustain the views of the Rev. Doctor. The subject having been taken up on Tuesday, it was finally disposed of by the passage of a resolution, almost unanimously, declaring such a marriage contrary to the laws of God, and revolting to human nature.

REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.—The Synod of this denomination, now in session in New York, has decided the long contested question of the propriety of appointing deacons in whom the temporalities are to be invested, in the affirmative, after a very long and spirited debate. It has also refused to form an alliance with the American and Foreign Christian Union, on principle, though they approve of some of the main features of the work in which that body is engaged.

The structure now in process of erection on Sand Key, Gulf of Florida, to replace that destroyed by the hurricane of 1846, is founded upon seventeen iron piles, covering a square of fifty feet at the base and tapering to twenty feet at the top. The light is a fixed white light, varied by flashes. The focal plane is one hundred and ten feet above low water. From an elevation fifteen feet above this level of the sea, this light ought to be seen at a distance of nearly seventeen nautical miles. It will probably be exhibited in the course of the ensuing month of June, of which, however, due notice will be given.

NEWS FROM NASSAU, N. P.—Arrival of the Queen Mary's Passengers.—The Steamer Rover and Time arrived yesterday morning from Nassau, having left that port on the 24th ult.

One hundred and thirty-nine of the passengers of the shipwrecked schooner William and Mary were passengers to this port by the above steamers. The Rover brought sixty-seven and the Time seventy-two. Their further news is important.

The latest and one of the ablest public addresses ever delivered by the public men of this country, has just come to us through the columns of the New York papers. It was pronounced by Hon. Edward Everett, before the Historical Society, and treats of the settlement and history of the country. We can, to some degree, imagine the enthusiasm which is said to have attended its delivery. There are very few men in the nation more conversant with the history of it than Mr. Everett—few who could command their learning in choicer language, and few who could more beautifully express it. It is a warm and earnest nationality permeating the whole discourse, but it is a nationality of the broadest character—embracing every man, every foreigner who, with the animus manendi, sets his foot upon our soil. We are unable to give the conclusion and that is but a portion of the original. Nevertheless we know our readers will be pleased with the sentiment that pervades and the spirit that penetrates it. Mr. Everett said:

"Are we owe no duties to foreigners? What was the founder of Virginia, when a poor Indian girl threw herself between him and the war club of her father? What were the Pilgrim Fathers, when the friendly savage, if we must call him so, met them with the salutation of 'Welcome, Englishmen?' They are foreigners;" end they are. Was not the country all but a year or two ago to plunge into a conflict with the military despotisms of the West of Europe, in order to redress the wrongs of the down-trodden races who feed their flocks on the slopes of the Carpathians, and pasture their herds upon the tributaries of the Danube, and half of the hardship of relieving destitute exiles, whom the hand of God has guided across the ocean and conducted to our doors?

"I am not indifferent to the inference of the public opinion; but the time has been when I have been proud of the vast sums paid in the United States for the relief of poor emigrants in Europe. It is an annual sum, I have no doubt, equal to the interest on the foreign debt of the United States which have repudiated their obligations. When I was in London a few years since, I received a letter from one of the interior towns of England, telling me that they had a House of Correction an American seaman, a person who pretended to be, who was a pauper and rogue. They were desirous of being rid of him, and kindly offered to send him at my disposal. Although he did not appear to be a very valuable acquisition, I thought that he might be sent to Loudon, and that he could be shipped by the American packet to the United States. I ventured to add the suggestion that if Her Majesty's Minister at Washington were applied to in a similar way by the overseers of the poor and wardens of the parishes in the United States, he would be pretty well occupied. But I really felt pleased, at a time when my own little State of Massachusetts was sending from ten to twelve thousand destitute foreign subjects annually, to be able to return to the British Empire of the only American dollar I ever contributed upon it.

"Mr. President and gentlemen, my humble tale is told. Its first incident is Columbus, begging with his child at the gate of a convent. Its last you the stewards of this immense charity, providing employment and food for the starving nations, and a heme for fugitive Kossuth."

The late election in Virginia has resulted in the return of an entire democratic delegation to Congress—Charles S. Lewis, independent democrat, elected over Snodgrass, nominated by the Whig and Sterrett, whig. The Legislature is democratic, in both branches, but by a small majority. Edward J. Armstrong, Wm. Graham and Thomas J. Boyd, all democrats (the last named independent), have been elected Danial, the regular democratic candidate, have been chosen to constitute the Board of Public Works. The following is a list of Congressmen elect: First District, Thoe S. Bocock; Second, John S. Millison; Third, Willis; Fourth, Wm. O. Goode; Fifth, Thos. S. Bocock; Sixth, Paulus Powell; Seventh, Wm. Smith; Eighth, Charles J. Faulkner; Ninth, John Letcher; Tenth, Z. Kidwell; Eleventh, Sherrard B. Lewis; Twelfth, H. A. Edmenson; Thirteenth, Fayette McMullen.

Later from Texas.

We have received Indianola dates to the 31st ult., and Galveston to the 3d inst.

Reports concerning the state of the crops are very contradictory. The Civilian and Gazette, however, says:

"The crops, as far as we have intelligence, are very promising, throughout the State. Some parts of them are very backward from late planting, but all are vigorous and thrifty. The amount of land in cultivation this year greatly exceeds that of the past or any preceding season. During a recent visit to the country, we were charmed with the many new fields and farms in cultivation. We saw enclosures, many of them several hundred acres in extent, and one of them a thousand, exhibiting with a luxuriant growth of corn and cotton, on ground which last December, when we last saw it, was only a fenceless prairie, which a plow had never penetrated, and on which grass and flowers had been the only growth for a thousand years."

A Mr. Benedict, of Galveston, has prepared an elegant pair of boots made of alligator's skin, which he will send to the World's Fair. The manufacture of this style of brogans is said to be original with Mr. Benedict.

A new Female College is about being erected in Huntsville. The building is to be of brick, sixty feet by forty, and two stories high.

The Galveston, Houston and Henderson Railroad have advertised for proposals for grading and constructing the entire distance from Galveston to Houston—52 miles.

The gold fever is dying out—the returns not having equaled the anticipations of the miners. Fifty cents per day is the highest sum yet attained. The gold lies in small quantities on the surface, and scarcely pays for the labor of collection. A party are engaged in digging, with the hope of meeting greater success within than upon the earth.

The Shreveport Gazette learns that recent heavy rains have rendered the roads, in many portions of Texas, almost impassable, and the creeks have been raised so as to wash away most of the bridges.

DEPARTURE OF DR. KANE'S ARCTIC EXPEDITION.—The brig Advance, with Dr. Kane and his party, on their expedition to the Arctic regions, sailed from New York on the 31st ult., and was accompanied down the bay by a large number of friends. The following is a list of the officers of the Advance:

Commander, E. K. Kane; Sailing-master, J. Wall Wilson; First Officer, James Brooks; 2d do., James McGeary; 3d do., Amos Bondsall; Surgeon, Dr. J. J. Hays; Carpenter, Christian Olser, and one or two others.

A meeting of the Masonic Fraternity of New York was held on the evening of the 31st ult., at the Medical College, Crosby street, for the purpose of bidding a formal farewell to their brother, Dr. Kane, commander of the expedition. Jos. D. Evans, Deputy Grand Marshal, delivered an appropriate address, to which Dr. Kane responded, speaking in the highest terms of the liberality of the projector of the expedition, Mr. Grinnell, who was present. A large number of his Masonic brethren resolved to accompany the Doctor down the bay, in a steamboat chartered for the occasion, to bid him God speed on his perilous voyage in search of the long-lost Franklin.

THE CHINESE REBELLION—Trouble between the French and English.—The editor of the Philadelphia Inquirer has seen a letter from an officer on board the U. S. ship Plymouth, dated Hong-Kong, March 24, in which the writer states that the almost universal topic was the Chinese rebellion. The rebel army was much larger than the regular army, and the head or chief represents himself as a descendant of a former Emperor. At the last accounts they were surrounding Nankin, and great fears were entertained that that city, as well as Pekin, would be destroyed. The writer also says:

"In conformity with this request from the Chinese authorities, the British had dispatched two steamers and a brig-of-war, to assist the troops of the Government. The U. S. steamer Susquehanna had been sent to Shanghai. Capt. Kelty was the senior officer of the station, in place of Com. Aulick. The Mississippi was soon expected, and great impatience was manifested for her arrival. Quite an excitement prevailed in consequence of an affair at Canton between the French and English. The French Consul undertook to raise a flag pole on the parade ground occupied by foreigners. The English prevented them, whereupon the Consul wrote to the Captain of a French frigate, stating the whole affair to him. He sent a Lieutenant and a draft of marines to Canton, to protect the flag. The Lieutenant first civilly requested the Englishmen to desist, and on refusing, he, in connection with his men, drove every opponent from the square, and immediately proceeded to erect the flag-staff."

The writer adds that it is doubtful if the United States expedition will go to Japan this season. The squadron will not reach Hong-Kong before July, and will not be ready before August. The coast at that time is very dangerous, and a delay may be deemed indispensable.

TERRITORIAL INCREASE OF THE UNITED STATES. Mr. Darby, of Washington City, in a recent publication, presents the following view of the territorial progress of our country:

1. The original territory of the United States, according to the treaty of 1783, gave us, as the amount of ceded limits, 1,000,000 square miles, 640,000,000 of acres.

2. The extent of square miles added to the territory of the United States, by the treaty with France in 1803, was 1,000,000 square miles.

3. By the cession of Florida to the United States, in 1812, an acquisition was made of 13,000 square miles.

4. The addition of Texas, New Mexico, and California, are estimated at 1,400,000 square miles.

The recapitulation is thus in square miles:

United States, original	1,000,000
Louisiana	1,000,000
Florida	13,000
Texas, New Mexico, and California	1,400,000
Amount of territory of the U. States,	3,413,000

The plan for the erection of the equestrian statue of Washington, which Mr. Clark Mills, the artist, has presented to the President for his approval, contemplates an expenditure of quite $200,000 to that end. I wrote you yesterday that there was small chance that Gen. Pierce would listen to any proposition likely to end in spending more than the $50,000 already appropriated for the purpose. A knowledge of the tremendous proposed increase above stated, satisfied me that Mr. Mills will be promptly and flatly informed that if not willing to contract to finish a satisfactory work for the $50,000, all he has to do will be to say so; and that the President will report the fact to Congress at the next session. OPENING OF THE GREAT IRISH EXHIBITION AT DUBLIN.—The World's Fair at Dublin was opened on the 12th May, with great splendor, in a speech from the Lord Lieutenant. The weather was fine, and vast crowds assembled to witness the procession of the Lords and Ladies, the Viceroy, Government of Ireland, invited guests and their escort of several regiments of troops. No less than 15,000 persons were in the building on the first day. A letter, speaking of the exhibition building, says:

"The spectator may fancy himself on entering in a vast cathedral, composed of a labyrinth of light pillars and lofty circular arches, the grand naive being 100 feet in width and 425 feet in height. The trellised galleries, raised between the double colonnades which separate the naives, have an exceedingly beautiful effect. A light blue tint which pervades the whole, with the glass roofs, and gorgeous escutcheons hanging on either side, have, on the whole, an appearance of exceeding grandeur and beauty."

The Lord Lieutenant, in his opening speech, thus refers to the increasing prosperity of Ireland:

"I am happy to believe that industry is spreading throughout the land, and that pauperism and crime are every where decreasing. If we look to agriculture, we find its advance most remarkable. [Hear.] In the last twenty years I believe a million of acres of waste land have been reclaimed, and that three millions have been expended in draining and improving the land, and that the produce of acre for acre of Irish soil is now equal to the produce of English soil, a result which Sir A. Young almost thought too sanguine to predict when he wrote his account of the agriculture of Ireland. [Hear.] A system of improved husbandry has been every where introduced, and the best implements of husbandry are now in general use; and I believe those who saw the cattle show here a few weeks ago will say that the Irish farmer is capable of exhibiting cattle not surpassed in the show at Smithfield. [Hear.] Then again, the culture of flax is extending with marvellous rapidity."

The manufacture of lace, he also stated, had wonderfully increased, while in point of beauty and design of execution, it was equal to that of any of the foreign countries, and nothing but a deficiency in the supply would induce them to import it from foreign countries. Then the manufacture of sewed muslin, he further stated, gives employment to half a million young women of Ireland, and about £900,000 is distributed in wages to those employed in its manufacture. All these, he said, are very encouraging considerations, and warrant the assertion that industry is spreading throughout the land.

"FORTY-SIX YEARS AGO."—As we took our seat in one of the boats of the South ferry a few evenings since, an elderly gentleman, in a social mood, seated himself beside us, and commenced remarking upon the contrast that the present convenience for crossing the river presented with those of forty or fifty years ago. "Forty six years ago," he said, "we had to cross this ferry by means of a horse-boat. We were then an hour in crossing, and the fare was twenty-five cents." Now we cross in five minutes and the fare is one cent. "Brooklyn," he continued, "was then only a little village, and the population of New York was 75,000." Now the city of Brooklyn numbers 100,000, and that of New York about 600,000 inhabitants. "Steamboats, railroads, the telegraph, gas, were things unthought of then." Each of these had come into use and effected a revolution since he was a young man. He witnessed the starting of the first steamboat that ever made a trip up the North River. The foot of Fulton street, New York, (the present site of the Fulton Ferry buildings, but then a sand bank, with no buildings in its vicinity,) was the point of departure of Fulton's strange little craft on its trial trip. A temporary staging was erected along the sloping shore of sand, upon which was assembled the gazing multitude that both cheered and hooted the advent of steam, as it made its first successful début before the people of New York City. Our informant further told us that in a newspaper printed at the time it was stated that as the boat moved up the river, puffing, smoking and snorting, against the tide, it so frightened some of the sailors on other vessels that they fell on their knees, preying to be delivered from the Evil One!

The first steamboat that was ever applied to any practical purpose was built by Robert Fulton, at New York, in 1807, and was named the North River. Her engine was 18 horse power; and she was 33 hours in making the passage between New York and Albany. The same passage by steamboat is now made in from six to nine hours, and by railroad in four hours.

THE REBELLION IN CHINA.—The National Intelligencer states that Com. Aulick, who has just returned from China, discredits the report that the Emperor of China had applied to the British for assistance, as his hatred to that people had never been intermitted. The Commodore further thinks, that if assistance were applied for it would not be given, as the foreigners in China are unitedly in favor of the success of the rebels. The present Emperor has, (he says,) by his sensuality and his addiction to opium, alienated from himself the esteem of his people, and that he and his corrupt cabinet are unfitted to comprehend and deal with the present enlarged demands of commerce. The Commodore considers also, that all the assistance which could now be given in aid of the existing Government would be of no service in determining the issue of war; that the triumphs of the rebels consist in an inland progress towards Pekin, which can in no way be affected by the operations of a naval squadron; that the war vessels of any nation on the station are not more than sufficient to protect its own interests; and, finally, that more is to be hoped for, commercially and politically, from the success of the insurgents, than by the continuance of the reigning dynasty.

The advices from China, however, in the English papers by the last steamer, from Hong Kong to 28th of March, assert distinctly that application had been made by the Viceroy of Soochau to the British consul at Shanghae to co-operate against the rebel force for the protection of Nankin. The rapid advance of the rebels has spread consternation in that capital and other wealthy cities. Latest accounts, 20th March, reported the rebels investing Nankin, (not having captured it as previously reported,) which, it was expected, would fall. Delegates had been sent from Soochen to the rebel leaders, offering large sums of money to secure that city from molestation. The native bankers and wealthy families were removing their treasure into the country and to Shanghae for safety. At Shanghae there was a general panic; banking and mercantile houses shut up; trade quite at a stand still, and money so scarce that the duties on exports had to be arranged by giving security in bills and other property to the consul. All was quiet at Canton. There were reports that a portion of the rebel force had gone north—if true, luterual trade may perhaps be resumed sooner than the present position of affaire would lead one to expect.

A case involving the responsibility of telegraph companies for damages arising from an incorrect transmission of messages was recently adjudicated in the Cleveland (Ohio) Court of Common Pleas. A message was sent to Messrs Bowen & McNamee, of New York, from a commercial correspondent in Monroe, Michigan, giving an order for goods, among which was "one handsome" shawl. In the transmission of the message over the Lake Erie Telegraph Company's wires, "one handsome" was changed into "one hundred," and that number of shawls accordingly sent. The shawls had to be returned to New York, and the plaintiffs claimed to recover charges for freight and for deprecation in value. The Court ruled that telegraph companies holding themselves out to transmit dispatches correctly, were under obligations so to do, unless prevented by causes over which they had no control; that the defendant was bound to send the message in question correctly, and that if it failed in this duty, whereby damage had occurred to the plaintiffs, the plaintiffs must recover. A verdict was accordingly returned for the plaintiffs for one hundred and eighteen dollars.

The Washington National Monument is now one hundred and thirty feet high, and in a few days another course (having two additional feet,) will be commenced. During the month of May four blocks have been received; one of granite from the Grand Division Sons of Temperance, R. I.; one of the bird's-eye marble from the Grand Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons, N. Y.; one of marble from the Postmasters and Assistants of Indiana, and one of marble from Iowa.

The foreign news, as it is reported in the eastern papers, seems now to be composed of nothing but Mrs. Stowe and her husband. The latter half of the firm would have a small chance, if it were not that he is a talking animal. But even with this, there seems to be a struggle on his part to keep above the surface. In his speeches it is not "my wife's Uncle Tom," but "our Uncle Tom." It may be presumed from this that the lady invented the facts, while the husband furnished the theology. That's his business.

At the last account we have of this worthy pair, they figured before the British and Foreign Anti-slavery Society at its annual meeting held in Exeter Hall, London. The Times of that city says that when Mrs. Stowe entered the Hall "the excitement of the assembled audience rose to a tremendous pitch, and it was several minutes before the cheers, with which the hall rang again, had sufficiently relieved them. When she withdrew the same honors were paid to her, every one standing up and cheering with heart and soul."

Many distinguished and titled men were present, and some who were not wrote letters giving reasons for being absent. One of these letters was from the Earl of Carlisle—Lord Morpeth. He said in his letter that he intended to call the attention of the House of Lords to the condition of the slaves in Cuba. Whether this was the reason of his absence is not stated.

On this occasion as on previous ones Prof. Mr. Stowe delivered a speech from which we extract the following: [Mobile Tribune, Sunday.

"It was (he said) the profits of that trade (the cotton trade) which had riveted the chains of slavery over the Union. What right had Great Britain to interfere? She consumed four-fifths of the cotton grown in America; she sustained by these means four-fifths of the slaves in the American States. That was her right to interfere. She participates in the guilt, not directly, but indirectly, for without the assistance of Great Britain the cotton would not be used. The Americans could not consume sufficient in their own manufactures, and their sugar and rice trade, compared with the cotton, was of little importance. He did not dictate to England the course of duty that she ought to take, but merely brought before their minds the solemn truth. What did the slaveholders and cotton growers say? Why, that the English loved to stand up in Exeter Hall and denounce them and condemn them—would they diminish their profits one penny in their zeal to emancipate slaves, by adopting the way in which their zeal might be beneficial? The price of cotton regulated the price of the slave. At present they averaged from $800 to $1000, and to stock a cotton plantation took from two hundred to four hundred; so that an immense outlay had to be made before slave labor could be brought into competition with free labor. The Chinese were now flocking into America, and would work at the rate of 6d. a day, and the people of Great Britain now had an opportunity of making the slaveholders feel that they were in earnest, and determined to do something towards the abolition of the system. If they could abolish slavery by making speeches in that Hall, or by legislation in Parliament, he should be most happy for them to do so. But they could not. The only way was by making them compete with free labor, and, if the English could not make as much profit by using free cotton as slave cotton, they must be content with practicing a little of the denial they so properly preached to the slaveholder."

MORMON DEPREDATIONS.—The Detroit Free Press has a statement from Mackinaw that the Mormons have been committing numerous depredations on the fishermen, burning their dwellings, robbing them of their fish in barrels, destroying their salt, and stealing their nets, boats, clothes, money, and provisions. At Birch Point, Gull River, Pine River and Grand Traverse, depredations have been committed, and it is stated that quite a number of fishermen at Mackinaw are now ready to commence each with a stock worth from $400 to $600, who darn not go to the fishing grounds for fear of the Mormons. A public meeting has been called of the citizens of Michilimackinac county, "to devise ways and means of protecting themselves against the felonious depredations of the Mormons." The Michilimackinacians state that they cannot reach the Mormons with administration of law, from the fact that the county in which the Mormons most do congregate and do violence is under their own jurisdiction, and that offenders must be tried on Beaver Island, by Mormon tribunals with devoted Mormons for witnesses and jurymen.

THE REVOLUTION IN BUENOS AYRES.—The accounts which we have lately received of the continuance of hostilities in Buenos Ayres, are fully confirmed by dates to April 3, at which time Urquiza was about nine miles from the city, with a strong military force of the country party, but proposing to attempt new negotiations before a final appeal to arms. A letter dated Rio, April 13, says:

"The report on 'Change to-day is that Urquiza in person was besieging Buenos Ayres with a force of 8000 men, backed by promises of assistance from the Brazilian Government, which wishes to change the Argentine Republic to a monarchy, and make Urquisa its head, but the truth of this report I do not guarantee."

NAVIGATION OF THE AMAZON.—The Washington Union publishes a decree issued by the President of Peru, dated Lima, April 5, by which the Peruvian waters of the Amazon are thrown open to all nations; Loreto and Lanta are made free ports, at which no duties whatever are to be paid; and emigrants from all nations are invited to come. They will be landed at Husnchaco, on the Pacific, in a public vessel, free of expense, and transported without charge thence across the Andes into the great valley of the Amazon, where land, farming utensils, and seeds will be given to them gratis by the Government; that being there they and theirs are to be exempt from all taxation for twenty years; that they have guaranteed to them the rights of legislation upon all local affairs, with authority to elect their own judges, etc.

The Washington Union publishes a proclamation of the President of the United States, directing the sale of the lands reserved to the United States on each side of the line of the Mobile and Ohio Railroad, through the State of Alabama, at the following time and places; At the land office at St. Stopheus, Ala., commencing on the 5th of September next; at the land office at Tuscaloosa, Ala., commencing on the same day; at the land office at Demopolis, Ala., commencing on the 12th of September next; at the land office at Columbus, Miss., commencing on the 19th of September, and at the land office at Augusta, Miss., commencing on the 26th of September. The lands to be sold are the sections and parts of sections, all bearing the odd numbers, which remain to the United States within six miles on each side of the line of the railroad, subject to double the minimum price of the public lands.

The Lunatic Asylum at Columbus, Ohio, is now full, containing upwards of 500 patients. In fourteen years there have been admitted 2116 patients, of which 1038 were discharged recovered. Of the number admitted, 505 were farmers, being more than twelve times the number of those of any other occupation except laborers, of which class there were 160. The next highest on the list is teachers, being 40. There were 24 clerks, 22 preachers, 21 tailors, 9 lawyers, 6 printers, 3 sea captains, 2 musicians, 2 medical students, etc. Among the causes spirit-rapping is now the most frequent.

LIABILITIES OF RAILROAD COMPANIES.—The Hartford Times, speaking of the various propositions before the legislature, relative to railroad accidents, reminds the public that there is already law enough on that part of the subject—and quotes the following from the law enacted by the legislature of 1848:

"Actions for injury to the person, whether such injury result in death or not, shall survive to the executor or administrator, provided not more than one year elapse between the injury and death, and provided also the cause of action shall have occurred subsequent to June 27, 1853. 1848."

The old United States frigate Constellation has been nearly torn to pieces, preparatory to the rebuilding the new Constellation at Gosport Navy Yard. This old battle-worn servant was built in Baltimore in the year 1796, and has seen years of active service. The pieces which will compose the keel of the new ship, and which are being laid, have been buried in mud several feet under water for over seventeen years. They are perfectly sound and look as though they were but recently taken from the forest. They will be made worm proof, as will all the timber composing her frame.

Particulars of the Arabia's News.

NEW YORK, Tuesday, June 7.

The Arabia's advices embrace the following items of European news:

CHINA.—The arrangements of the American, French and English fleets with the Chinese authorities embraces the protection of the mouths of the canals along the coast, as well as Shanghai and Naukin.

RUSSIA, FRANCE AND TURKEY—Threatening Condition of Affairs.—The aspect of affairs between Russia and Turkey is very threatening. Menchikoff had fixed the 20th May as the limit of his waiting for the final answer of the Sublime Porte to his ultimatum. The Porte had rejected the ultimatum, and Menchikoff embarked on board a Russian ship-of-war for Odessa. A dispatch to the British Admiralty, however, states Menchikoff had given the Porte eight days more to reconsider his proposition, threatening to withdraw finally if the Port should persist in its previous decision. In the mean time, he remained on board a steamer in the harbor.

The French Embassador had ordered the fleet to the Dardanelles, with orders to prevent Russia from seizing and passing those Straits. The British fleet still remained at Malta, awaiting reinforcements and instructions.

Louis Napoleon is said to have assured the Russian Minister at St. Cloud, that he would not hesitate to change his policy if Russia should persist in her course toward France and the East.

It is rumored that the Russian forces had entered Turkey, and the report produced a violent agitation in the Paris Bourse.

In the British Parliament, on Friday, Lord Clarendon stated that the Ministers of France and England at Constantinople were acting in concert, and that the integrity of Turkey would be maintained.

SWITZERLAND.—The attitude of Switzerland excites considerable attention. The Austrian Charge d'Affaires had withdrawn from Bern, and the Switzerland Envoy from Vienna.

KOSSUTH AND MAZZINI.—A meeting of the friends of Italy had been held upon Mazzini's arrival. Kossuth attended and made a speech.

FRANCE AND ECUADOR.—Dispatches had been received from the French Admiral in the Pacific Ocean, dated Callao, 10th (?), stating that he was about to sail for the Guayaquil river to demand reparation from the government of Ecuador.

LATER FROM CHINA.—Later advices from China state that the English, French and American ships-of-war on the coast of China, had undertaken to protect Nunkin and Shanghai against the insurgent army.

IMPORTANT FROM WASHINGTON—MESILLA VALLEY QUESTION—PROBABLE WAR.—Washington, June 6.—The President has decided that Mesilla Valley forms a part of the United States, and instructions have been forwarded to Gen. Garland, the Military Commander in that section, to prevent by force, if necessary, the military occupation of that territory by Mexico.

It is believed here that a conflict is inevitable between the American and Mexican troops, and that another war will certainly ensue.

FURTHER FROM NEW MEXICO—MESILLA VALLEY.—Boston, June 6.—A letter received in this city states that Gov. Fries arrived at El Paso on the 24th ult. with 700 troops, but finding that the pretensions of Gen. Lane were not supported by the people, he returned to his original quarters.

THE FACE OF A MAN UPON THE TOP OF HIS HEAD.—In the city of New York, where rents are so ruinously high, and competition in business is so ceaselessly active and energetic, almost every method that it is possible for human ingenuity to invent, is resorted to, for the purpose of obtaining customers, extending trade or making "more money." Of all these methods, one of the most extraordinary, and at the same time simple, if not effective in its way, is that by which the daguerreotype process is made to play a novel and conspicuous part. It seems that some one of the enterprising hatters in that metropolis has a daguerrian gallery connected with his salesroom or manufactory, expressly fitted up and devoted for the accommodation and benefit of his own customers. On purchasing a covering for your caput in this store, you are furnished with a daguerreotype of your countenance—the image—large or small—being firmly affixed to the lining upon the inside of the crown of the new beavor, so that whoever wears a hat thus garnished is sure to have the likeness of his own face upon the top of his head!

THE WIDOW OF GEN. HARRISON.—The estimable widow of Gen Harrison still occupies a portion of the mansion at North Bend, Ohio, where she is watched over by the filial care of the family of Col. Taylor. The present Harrison estate consist of 800 acres at North Bend, and 420 at the mouth of the Miami. The property is as yet undivided, though it is the intention of the heirs to effect a division the coming season.

The London Dispatch says: "The value of the imports into the United States in 1851 was £48,000,000, and the exports £44,000,000. The value of the imports into Great Britain was about £103,000,000, and the exports about £108,000,000.

HIGH PRICES FOR TOBACCO.—At Lynchburg, Va., last week, one hogshead of tobacco sold at $25 per 100 lbs., one at $17, one at $15, and others at prices ranging from $12 to $13 50 per 100 lbs. The finer qualities of manufacturing leaf sold as high as $33.

Lieut. Whipple, with several assistants, started from Washington on the 30th ult. for Fort Smith, Arkansas, where, immediately on arrival, he will organise his party, and proceed to survey the Pacific Railroad route, via Albuquerque.

DIED.—Colonel Claiborne Myers, of Alabama, formerly a resident of South Carolina, died on board the steamer Cherokee, on her passage from Havana to New York. He was distinguished for his agricultural success, being one of the most extensive cotton planters in the State of Alabama.

By the last advices from China, we learn that the American Minister had proceeded north in the United States steamer Susquehanna. The U. S. steamer Mississippi, Com. Perry, which was at Galle, would proceed immediately for Hong-Kong. The U. S. sloop Plymouth was at Hong-Kong, and sloop Saratoga and storeship Supply at Macao.

The Mobile Tribune of Sunday says: "The Whig State Convention, sitting at Montgomery on Wednesday, adopted resolutions in favor of State reform, internal improvements, and the election of all the judges and judicial officers by the people. We have not yet received these resolutions. It also nominated Richard W. Walker, of Florence, for Governor."

CITY OF VIENNA.—A considerable enlargement of the city of Vienna, the Austrian Capital, had been resolved on. The Emperor's sanction to the project, which was obtained on the 4th, had given great and general satisfaction, as house rent had become positively ruinous. The extent of surface which is to be enclosed within the wall is equal to half the area covered by the present city.

Jacob A. Westervelt, one of the famous New York ship builders, has just contracted to build two steamships for Mr. Charles Morgan, to be employed in Navigating the Gulf of Mexico, and the keel of one of them is already laid. They are to be finished next fall. The largest will measure about 1,600 tons. Her length will be 210 feet, breadth 35 feet, and depth of hold 16 feet. Her mate will be 210 feet in length, with 34 feet breadth of beam, and 16 feet depth of hold. Her measurement will be about 1200 tons. The engines will be built at the Morgan Iron works, and will be of the description denominated "beam" engines, which are now generally preferred, on account of their being less liable to get out of repair than other varieties.

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE OFFICE,
Saturday Morning, June 11, 1853.

There has been a rather better feeling shown in most departments of our general market during the past week, though the amount of business doing has been moderate. The movement in Cotton and Tobacco, however, has been considerably increased, without any alteration of moment in prices. Flour, Corn and Provisions have been very firm, with an upward tendency in prices, the receipts generally having been small. Freights have been dull, especially for foreign ports, and most of the improvement noticed in our last review has been lost. The shipping in port not cleared yesterday morning comprised fifty ships, seventeen barks and twelve brigs. Exchange have been dull most of the week. Advices from Liverpool to the 28th ult., received by the Cunard steamer Canada, were published on Tuesday afternoon. They represented a firm market at Liverpool, with a slight improvement in the rates for the middling qualities. The sales of the week were stated at 50,000 bales, including 9000 for speculation and 30,000 for export, leaving about 38,000 bales for the trade. Fair Orleans was quoted at 6

Miss Alice Carey writes beautifully, and besides that, is a most whimsical satirist and wit. She never gives good causes of offence, though she is often the object of admiration and adulation. The following lines, which she wrote for the benefit of Mrs. Mabel Moore, the artless widow, will be read with satisfaction by all who can appreciate the substantial of genius and wit combined. The moral of the poem should act as a caution to all the young and aspiring widows in Christendom.

HOT IN....THE WIDOW PUNISHED.

BY ALICE CAREY.

She waited in the drawing-room,
Good Mrs. Mabel Moore;
Her flounces of a pretty lace
Were on the dress she wore:
Upon her bosom a French rose,
And on her cap some satin bows.

One little foot just peeped without
Her petticoat so white;
Her hair, a little gray, 'tis true,
Was put in curl and bright:
And sweet her glances shone around,
As if some good thing she had found.

The clock was on the stroke of eight,
And still she sat apart.
Now rising close, and laying now
Her hand upon her heart;
And toying with her curls and rings,
And doing other girlish things.

At length a step was heard, and then
A ringing at the door;
"Five minutes and a half too soon."
Said Mrs. Mabel Moore.
Then to her maid—"It is no sin,
Go quick, and say I am not in."

"For if he loves me as he says,
He can afford to wait,
And come again precisely at
Five minutes after eight.
My nerves are really quite unstrung.
So very earnestly he rung."

But true love never did run smooth.
As oftentimes is told;
And when the door was opened wide,
And silvering in the cold,
The maid behold the expected guest,
She smiled and courtesyed her best,

And told him with a grace as sweet
As if she craved a boon,
Her mistress had declared it was
A little bit too soon.
And that she thought it was no sin
To send him word she was not in.

"Ah, very well," the guest replied.
"I do, in truth I make no doubt,
That whether she be in or no,
I've surely found her out."
And she who sent him from the door
Remaineth Mrs. Mabel Moore.

BRIDAL CUSTOMS IN PARIS.

From the foreign correspondence of "Le Republicaine," the new French daily just started in New York, we translate portions of an interesting letter on the marriage costumes and customs now in vogue in the gay metropolis:

You have requested me to give you an account of the changes which have been made of late in wedding preliminaries. The opportunity is now furnished me, Mmlle. de S. having espoused the Count de E., and Camille V. married Captain M. You can judge without my help what a difference there necessarily must be in the corbeilles, and how far what I may say of the one will fail to apply to the other. Mmlle. de S. had a dowry of 400,000 francs—that is an income of 25,000 livres. The corbeille (according to etiquette a year's revenue,) was strictly valued at 20,000 livres, and if the dowager countess had not added some very fine diamonds, the sum named would have been found small and insufficient. For the past month the Count has every day sent a magnificent bouquet, the flowers of which have each time been different from the last chosen, the luxuriance of his conservatory affording him the opportunity to foster the agreeable surprise.

On the day of the civil contract, (jour du contrat,) the corbeille and trousseau were shown together, though this custom is every day becoming more rare, for the very good reason that whatever belongs to the outward form and ceremony is not necessarily connected with mere ostentation. Many persons prefer quietly to go through all the details of the preliminary ceremonial, and then pass on, so as never to occupy the position of mere idlers. The wedding ball (bal de noces) has been given up for some years. Nothing justified it—neither convenience nor happiness, the latter particularly, which always avoids hustle and crowds. For what is there in the usual forms of pleasure to satisfy the heart at such a moment? It is thus that every thing is brought into the "soiree du contrat." After a private family gathering, to listen to the reading of the marriage conditions, strangers are admitted to examine the gifts offered to the bride. This custom is, however, greatly abused, having of course a considerable influence on the presents of both the corbeille and trousseau, for where the public are expected to criticise and judge of an expenditure made for its own especial gratification, a certain weakness for ostentation will be sure to reveal itself.

In the middle of the grand saloon of the hotel S., which you will remember as decorated in white and gold, but which is now hung and draped en lampas bleu, upon a magnificent table, the mosaic top of which rests upon the wings of two golden griffins, was placed a large Bahl casket. This was the corbeille. From its open top variously depended the beautiful laces, the bridal dress of Alencon lace, an English violette or demi-veil and scarf with berthes and volantes, (capes and ruffles) en point de Bruxelles.

These rare laces were a gift from the countess dowager. Upon the table also were the jewels. They has diamonds, some of them set in a classic manner, while the setting of the others seemed to await the choice of the young wife. A jewel box, containing a pretty parure of diamonds and rubies, composed of five waist-buckles, plaques de corsage, a bouquet for the head, and another for the girdle—a flower branch set with stars en diademe, with ear-rings to match. Besides this a parure of stones of different colors was noted as a chef d'œuvre of ingenious design. By the side of a pearl suspended to a garnet by a thread of gold, was a pear-shaped emerald, which a little bird of enameled silver, perched upon a bit of sorbier, drops from its beak. From the clasps of the bracelet springs a mass of jeweled branches uniting in a trunk which encircles the arm. A single bracelet was in the form of a green enameled dragon, with diamond wings, golden head, and tongue of flame. Next were very pretty little boxes (ecrins) containing the jewels for morning wear (bijoux du matin), plain bracelets, (negligés); also a chatelaine with watch and seals, pins for the kerchief or the head, with jeweled buttons for the sleeves.

You thus see I have not forgotten I owe you an exact account of the novelties which the jeweler's art has produced—a legitimate art whose manipulators have too long forgotten that they have had a Benevenuto Cellini for a master.

Among the dresses—few in number, which is all right enough when one marries in April—there were two very remarkable—one in gauze, with small square figures woven in silver, resembling filagree work; the other in white taffeta, with a unique design repeated in every breadth: a group of roses perfectly drawn, and shaded en camaieu, with a single graduated color—a bright rose below shading off near the girdle into a hortensia so pale that it becomes almost white.

Upon a pretty toilette table of pear-wood—style of Louis XV—were thrown three very beautiful shawls—an India cachemere, of an orange ground—a long French cachemere, with a black ground, and a square India cachemere à quatre faces.

There was a crowd early around a pear-tree bower, on which were placed the flowers—few in numbers, since the balls for this year are over, but so beautiful that they were so much admired as the jewels!

The parures of the bride—all orange flowers—a wreath of Bengal roses and white lilies—a set of Pariss violets and jonquilles, composed this goodly array, in a deep dish of Sevres porcelain were thrown the fans given by friends. The two bridal fans, magnificently painted and mounted in ivory and mother of pearl, were by themselves, in a little basket covered with lace.

On a carved oak cabinet might be seen the household purse, and by its side a charming porte monnaie, in lava, with steel frame. A word only now about the trousseau. It suffices that it was very suitable, very complete, and at the same time carefully and invitingly arranged.

In thinking over this affair, which has interested so many as well as myself, I have come to the conclusion that this ceremony of the contract has a charm about it to which the most indifferent must yield. It is not yet irrevocable, like the church marriage ceremony, and yet one cannot be surprised into examining only from curiosity the gewgaws exposed to view. We are rendered mute before these preparations, which speak of a destiny about to be accomplished.

Mass was said at eleven in the morning at the Madeleine—a low mass with the organ and a profusion of flowers and wax candles. It was a solemnity having as much of the character of a solemnity having as much of the character of a solemnity as is proper in the house of God. There festivity as is proper in the house of God. There were velvet carpets and the finest music. The were velvet carpets and the finest music. The bride was pensive and beautiful, and a marked bride was pensive and beautiful, and a marked decorum was observed in the sanctuary. Her decorum was observed in the sanctuary. Her attire was chaste and elegant—a robe of wrought attire was chaste and elegant—a robe of wrought velvet with loose hanging sleeves. A high corvelvet with loose hanging sleeves. In her hair she wore only a simple wreath of In her hair she wore only a simple wreath of orange blossoms à la Cléris. Her full white tulle orange blossoms à la Cléris. Her full white tulle veil enveloped her like a cloud. The utter simveil enveloped her like a cloud. The utter simplicity of this dress was its great charm. The plicity of this dress was its great charm. The reform of the present day runs in the right reform of the present day runs in the right direction in this matter. THE LOST AND THE LIVING.

BY FANNY FERN.

"The husband's grief may be short and brief—
He may woo and win another;
But the daughter clings, with unchanging grief
To the image of her mother."

But a fleeting twelvemonth has passed since the heart (that for years had beat against his own) was forever stilled, when Walter Lee brought again a fair young creature to share his widowed home. No father nor mother, brother nor sister, claimed any part of the orphan heart that he coveted and won. No expense of pains had his spered to decorate the mansion for her reception. Old familiar objects, fraught with tenderest associations, had been removed to make way for the upholsterer's choicest fancies. Thers was no picture left upon the wall, with sweet, sad, mournful eyes, to follow him with silent reproach. Everything was fresh and delightful as the new-born joy that filled his heart.

"My dear Edith," said he, fondly pushing back the hair from her forehead, "there should be no shadow in her pathway, but I have tried in vain to induce Nelly to give you the welcome you deserve; however, she shall not annoy you. I shall compel her to stay in the nursery till she yields to my wishes."

"Oh, no! don't do that," said the young step-mother anxiously; "I think I understand her. Let me go to her, dear Walter," and she tripped lightly out of the room and left him to himself.

Walter Lee looked after her retreating figure with a lover-like fondness. The room to him seemed to grow suddenly dark when the door closed after her. Reaching out his hand, he almost unconsciously took up a book that lay near him. A slip of paper fluttered out from between the leaves, like a white-winged messenger. The joyous expression of his face faded into one of deep sorrow as he read it. The handwriting was his child's mother's. It run thus:

"Oh, to die and be forgotten. This warm heart cold—these active limbs still—these lips dust. Suns to rise and set, flowers to bloom, the moon to silver leaf the trees around my own dear home; the merry laugh, the pleasant circle, and I not here! The weeds choking the flowers at my headstone, the several tresses of sunny hair forgotten in its envelop, the sun of happiness so soon absorbing the dew-drop of sorrow! The cypress changed for the orange wreath! Oh, no; don't quite forget! Close your eyes sometimes and bring beforr you the face that once made sunshine in your home! feel again the twining clasp of loving arms—the lips that told yon (not in words) how dear you were. Oh, Walter, don't quite forgst! From Nolly's clear eyes let her mother's soul still speak to you. MARY LEE."

Warm tears fell upon the peper as Walter Lee folded it back. He gave himself time to rally, and then glided gently up the nursery door. It was partially open. A little fairy creatnre of some five summers stood in the middle of the floor. Her tiny face was half hidden in sunny curls. Her little pianofore was full of toys, which she grasped tightly in either hand.

"No, you are not my mamma," said the child. "I want my own dead mamma, and I am sorry papa brought you here."

"Oh, don't say that," said the young step-mother; "don't call me mamma if it gives you pain, dear. I am quite willing that you should love your own mamma botter than you do me."

Nelly looked up with a pleesant surprise.

"I had a deer mamma and papa once," she continued, "and brothers and sistere, so many and so merry, but they are all dead, and sometimes my heart is very sad; I have no one now to love me but your papa and you."

Nelly's eyes began to moisten, and teking out one after another of the little souvenirs and toys from her pianofore, she said, "And you won't take away this—and this—and thie—that my dead mamma gave me?

"No, indeed, dear Nelly"

"And will you let me climb in my papa's lap as I used, and put my cheek to his, and kiss him, and love bim as much as ever I can, won't you?"

"Yes, my darling."

Walter Lee conld bear no more; his heert was full.

What, Mary's child pleading with a stranger for room in her father's heart! In the sudden gush of thie new fount of tenderness, had he forgotten or overlooked the claims of their helpless little one? God forbid! "From Nelly's clear eyes let her mother's soul still speak to you." Aye! and it did. When next Walter Lee met his bride, it was with a chastened tenderness—Nelly's loving little heert was pressed closely against his own. He was again "her own papa;" nor be did not "quite forget."

SINGULAR RACE OF HUMAN BEINGS. There are now in London two very singular human beings, of a race which has hitherto been very little known to the civilized world. They came from South Africa, where they are called Earthmen. They are totally distinct from all other known African races—as much so as if they had dropped upon this earth from another planet. They are diminutive in size—mere pygmies—and unacquainted even with the art of building huts. They shelter themselves in caves and crevices of the earth; when these are wanting they make artificial scoopings on the surface, which they line with leaves and cover with branches. The Hottentots and Bushmen are the avowed enemies of the Earthmen, and when they meet them will shoot them down like vermin. The poor little defenceless Earthmen have no refuge but in holes, trees, or thickets, and the tribe is fast verging to extinction. They are a poor, weak people—one of Nature's freaks—and destined not to perpetuate their race. Few colonists have seen them; and although it is known that a few still linger in the mountains, these are rapidly dying away, and will soon become a tradition of an elvish afrite race of old.

The two individuals above mentioned were carried to England from the Cape of Good Hope two or three years ago, and have now become domesticated in an English family. The Morning Chronicle, from which we take these particulars, describe these little Earthmen as a boy and a girl, the former 14 and the latter 16 years of age, and "complete little fairies" in appearance. The boy is three feet three and a half inches in height, the girl a trifle taller. Their skin is of this brightest and most transparent bronze, and as smooth and polished as marble. In form the little creatures are perfect—their delicate limbs standing out in the most graceful symmetry, and every motion instinct with the untaught ease of nature. The faces, although decidedly African in feature, are full of sweetness and good humor, with an expression of archness and intelligence.

They are named Martinis and Flora. In their savage state they fed on locusts, ant-eggs, and such small game as they could take. Till they were carried to England they had no ideas of God or any supreme power. At present, they have been taught some of the customs of civilized life, and are able to speak little English words, to sing little English popular airs, and—the first of Earthmen—to play little airs on a piano.

Few sights are more interesting to a thinking person than that of the last of a race of human beings on the point of being blotted out from the face of the earth. The individuals in question seem to constitute one of the most anomalous forms of our species that have ever yet been brought to the notice of the naturalist or the ethnologist. It is to be hoped that further light will be thrown on their history by scientific researches.

The U. S. steamer Susquehanna, and sloops of war Plymouth and Saratoga, and storeship Supply, of the Japan Expedition, were at Hong Kong in March.

A THRILLING INCIDENT.—The Rev. Mr. Prime, one of the editors of the New York Observer, who recently went to England in the pocket ship Devonshire, has written home two very interesting descriptive letters of his trip across the Atlantic. When within a few hours' sail of Portsmouth, a man fell overboard and was drowned. The scene is thus described:

April 23, Evening.—The full moon rose on the sea and hung out from the sky like a silver globe, with a clearness and beauty that I have never seen. The ship was sailing well under a fair breeze, and we walked the deck in the enjoyment of one of the most delightful evenings. One after another the passengers went below, and only a few of the younger and more romantic remained to look out on the waves reflecting the beams of the moon now riding far up in the heavens. It was nearly midnight when the cry shot through the ship piercing every ear and heart, "a man overboard." Except the cry of fire, no sound on ship is more terrible.

For days you have been thinking every time you looked over into the deep through which the ship is rushing, of the helpless and hopeless fate of him who shall be cast into the sea; and when the fearful word is given in that tone of mingled fear and pain which the fact extorts, there is a sinking of the heart as if each one had a friend now perishing. Mr. Moore, the second mate, had an assistant in the ship's carpenter, who had acted as a seaman during the passage, as we had a miserable crew. He was a fine looking young man, and the only one of all the men who had interested the passengers. He had been down in my state-room, and told me something of his history. His parents were in Holland, and he was on his way to visit them. A young woman was on board to whom he was to be married in May, and they were to return to America to spend their days. His manners were very gentle, and he looked and spoke as if he had felt the comfort of home, and had entered on life for which he was not formed. My heart had gone out to him, and in return for some acts of kindness he had done to me, I was thinking what present I should make him before going ashore, when at the instant the shout was made, and the noble fellow, the pride of the men, was struggling in the pitiless water.

Mr. Moore was near him, and had given an order to bear off the boom from the side of the ship—this man stepped over the bulwarks on the outside, pushed against the boom, the topping lift gave way, and he pitched forward, head first into the sea. The ship shot by him in a moment. Nothing thrown over could reach him. His cries of agony came up cutting the heart, O, so bitterly, that it would have been a mercy to be deaf. The mate, with admirable promptness, gave the order to put the ship about. "Ready about; luff round; hard lee; tacks and sheets, maintopsail haul; lot go and haul." Then he leaped into the boat and cried "Put the helm hard down. Lower away the quarter boat." Never shall I forget the look of the mate as he screamed "give me a knife, a knife," and taking one from a sailor he passed it through the ropes—"in men, in"—and four stout fellows leaped in with him, and down it went upon the ocean, a little shell of a thing sent forth to save that which was lost. I wanted to go with them, and as they struck out into the deep under that full moon, at midnight, to look for a drowning brother, I felt that their errand was noble, though none of them should live to tread the deck alive again.

Then we gathered on the storn of the ship, and looked out into the night and sea to watch the event. It was light enough to see that the tears were falling fast on the checks of some in that anxious group. Some of us prayed. It was all we could do. The little boat was soon out of sight. We could hear the shouts they sent up to reach, if it might be so, the ear of the "strong swimmer in his agony," and then all was silent, save the wind among the cordage, and the heavy flapping of the sails as the ship lay too. A dark spot rose on the wave; the flash of the dripping oars in the moonlight met the eye, and we know they were coming. The mate was soon seen standing at the helm. Our impatience would not brook delay, and we sent out the cry "All well!" Our hearts stood still for the answer; a half spoken "No" murmured along the waters, and we knew that the brave fellow was among the dead. So suddenly; so fearfully! To be swept from among us in the midst of life and hope. There were many, many tears of sympathy that night, and when I went below and strove to sleep, the vision of a fellow being struggling in the billows around me, drove slumber from my eyslide; and when it did come, the vision remained among my dreams.

Some seventeen years ago a native of Paisley, a son of one of our most respectable tradesmen, went to sea. The vessel foundered, and, with one solitary exception, all on board perished. The sad intolligence was soon brought to Paisley; the family went into mourning, and for seventeen long yoers, if they had not forgotten the sailor, they had ceased to think of him, as one about whose fate there could not be the shadow of a doubt.

A letter lately made its appearance here, addressed to the young man's father, who severs! years ago had retired to a watering-place on the West Coast, to enjoy the otium cum dignitate of a green old age. As he had long been ont of Paisley, the post-office folks had forgotten him, and could not find a party to whom the letter should be delivered. It was sent to Edinburgh, and after being tossed about from one office to another, was opened at London, and thence re-directed to Paisley, with instructions that every effort should be made to discover the owner. The contents soon led to the discovery, and it now appears that the young man supposed to have been lost at sea, was the one man saved.

A person, at present in New Zealand, in the course of his peregrinations, heard that a white man was living far up the country. He determined to search him out. On arriving at the native village, the white man's hut was pointed out. He entered it, and found a comely-looking damsel—a New Zealandress—with two or three fine healthy, whitey-brown children nestling about her. She was able to speak a little broken English, told the visitor the Christian name of her husband, and said she expected him home shortly, inviting the stranger to await his return. By-and-by the husband arrives, tattooed and dressed as a New Zealander. The two men, of course, were not likely to have recognized each other, even though they had been previously acquainted: but, after comparing notes, it came ont that they were both natives of Paisley, and had been at school together some twenty-five years ago. The surprise and astonishmout of the stranger may be well conceived. As for the host, he explained that he had been picked up from the wreck of his ship by a passing vessel, and, after many escapes and adventures, found himself in the interior of New Zealand, far from any settlement. There he married a native of the country, a chief's daughter, by whom he has had a family, and with whom he has been living very happily. He feels quite comfortable in his adopted land; likes the mode of living extremely, and has no desire to return to Paisley. He cannot tell how long he has been in New Zealand, not having adopted Crusoe's expedient of notching the time. After a long talk about Paisley and auld lang syne, the stranger bade him adieu, and on his return to the British settlement wrote the letter above referred to.

PROGRESS OF MANKIND.—The immense strides in progress which civilized men have made within the last two centuries, are really incredible until the subject is thoughtfully considered. Yet we do not exaggerate when we say that a journeyman mechanic in the present day, lives substantially better than a noble did four centuries ago. There still survives a household book, kept by one of the great Dukes of Northumberland, which leaves no doubt on this subject. From that volume we learn that his Grace breakfasted on ale and horrings, dined usually on boiled beef, and was as ignorant, at supper, of the luxury of tea or coffee, as he was, in his household furniture, of carpets, sofas, or hair mattresses.

In the Boston lettere, written about the middle of the fifteenth century, we have further evidence of the almost incredible wants of physical comforts among the upper classes. The Duke of Norfolk, of that day, one of the greatest of English noblemen, was often in need of the smallest sums of money, while persons of less exalted rank had frequently to submit to the greatest privatione for want of a few shillings. The richest men in the land dressed poorer, were lodged more rudely, and ate coarser food in those times than any industrious mechanic of our own. Even as late as Queen Elizabeth's reign, the royal floors were covered with rushes instead of carpet. When Phillip the Second, consort of Mary, Elizabeth's sister, visited England, his courtiers wrote back to Spain that the people lived in huts of nettles and mud, and slept on logs for pillows.

FASHIONABLES ABROAD.—Mr. Charles Astor Bristed, our city's distinguished representative at the high Court of Fashion, who writes to the Home Journal from "Numero 20, Rue Barbel de Jouy," that he can find in Paris no gloves fit to wear, though he has "not a bad hand," and his glove bill exceeds $400 per annum, appears to have been fallen in with during his travels by our dear countryman, J. Ross Brown, who, in his "Yousef," just published, daguerreotypes him as follows: [N. Y. Tribune.

"When I first saw him, he was on the way from Florence and Milan, in quest of a pair of pantaloons of a particular style. No man in Europe understood cutting except Pantaletti. There was a set in Pantaletti that made him indispensable. He had tried the Parisian tailors, but they were deficient in his knees. It was his intention to proceed at once from Milan to Leipsic for boots; the Germans were the only people who brought boots to perfection, and decidedly the best were to be had at Leipsic. He expected to be obliged to return to Paris for shirts; there was a set in the cellar of the Parisian shirt that suited him.

"His medicines he always procured in London; his segars he was forced to import from Havana; his Latakia tobacco he was compelled to purchase himself in Smyrna, and this was partly the occasion of his present visit. As to wines, it was nonsense to undertake to drink any but the pure Johannesberg, which he generally saw bottled on the Rhine every summer, in order to avoid imposition. His winters he spent chiefly in Spain; it was the only country where good cream was to be had; but the coffee was inferior, and he sometimes had to cross the Pyrenees for want of a good cup of coffee. No mode of traveling suited him exactly—in fact, he disliked traveling. Riding he hated, because it jolted him; walking, because it tired him; the snow, because it was cold; the sun, because it was warm; Rome, because it was damp; Nice, because it was dry; Athens, because it was dusty. (By the way, I disliked Athens myself, chiefly on that account; Bimby was right there.) But it was impossible for him to live in America again.

"What could any man of taste do there? No picturos, no ruins, no society, no opera, no classical associations—nothing at all, except business; and all sorts of business he despised. It was a ridiculous as well as a vulgar way of spending life. In fact, the only decent people he had met with were the French; a man might contrive to exist a while in Paris. Not that he approved altogether of the French language; it wanted depth and richness; the only language worthy of a man of sense was the Sanscrit. As soon as he had suited himself in boots at Leipsic, he was going to perfect himself in Sansorit at the University of Berlin; after which he hoped to recover from the effects of hard study by a tour through Bavaria, which was the only country on the face of the earth where the beer was fit to drink."

THE BELGIAN LAW OF DIVORCE.—Some few years since, a young Belgian lady, fresh from her convent education, appeared in society, captivated a young fellow-countryman with well oiled hair and patent leather boots, and after an acquaintance of a few weeks married him. The happy pair sojourned, as is often the custom, abroad, with the father and mother of the lady. The young wife was a gay lady, and her husband was quite as gay a lord. At every ball and party in the capital they were present, and, as married ladies are especially selected by continental gentlemen for what the call "adoration," the young wife, although she got no more of it than she liked, was honored with considerably more than pleased her husband. The latter remonstrated—the lady rebelled—and "my wife's mother," ut solent matroni, supported her daughter. The husband settled the matter by putting on his hat and retiring to his own paternal mansion. The marital feud was now intense, and the conjugal couple were only of the same mind touching one single subject—application to the tribunals for a divorce. This was done; but the Belgian law will allow of no such annulling of a marriage contract until the angry parties have renewed their demand for a divorce once every year for three years. Our young couple nourished their wrath during this triennial period of probation—thrice made the demand, and were duly summoned last year to hear consent given that they who had been one should thenceforth and forever remain two. From different sides of the court the married pair witnessed the untying of the knot: and when they were free, they passed out the common portal into the public street. Approximation fired friendship, and the gentleman offered his hand to the lady in token that there was no malice between them. Friendship had no sooner lit his torch, than he illumined the cinders on the chilled altar of love; and the young couple walked together to their first married home, whence the husband has never since permenently withdrawn. CURIOUS MISCELLANEOUS INFORMATION.—The French speak in the nose, the Germans in the throat, and the English through the teeth. Books and papers were formerly sold only at stalls, and the dealers therefore came to be called stationers. A poker held over a fire concentrates the heet of the passing smoke, and creates a draught through the fire. Water is called hard when, from containing too much carbonic acid, it holds lime in solution. A pound of wheaten flour consists of bran three ounces, starch ten ounces, gluten three quarters of an ounce, and sugar one quarter. The spring of a watch weighs 0.15 of a grain, and a pound of steel makes 50,000; a pound of steel cost 3d, and a single spring 2.1, so that 50,000 produce £416. Turnpikes were so called from poles or bars swung on a staple, and turned either way when the dues were paid. A turnpike road by law is sixty feet wide, and parish roads about thirty feet. Children lose weight during the first three days after birth; at the age of a week they sensibly increase; after one year they triple weight; then they require six years to double their weight, and thirteen to quadruple it.

USES OF IRON.—Everything that tends to cheapen iron tends to open a new source of industry. Notwithstanding the croakings of the high protective tariffites, the working in iron has increased since the reduction of duties, though the immediate effect of the act might possibly have been to suspend some of the forges and furnaces where the ore was worked. Among the last ingenious uses we have seen mentioned is the following: [Detroit Free Press.

"Among the new articles of manufacture is a new style arm-chair for parlor use, formed of fine wires, woven together spirally. The seat of the chair is formed of wire, continuous with the back—or, if a rocker, the sides, back and seat are all one piece; that the fabric is strong and thoroughly durable need not be added. The seat, far from being intractable, hard and unpleasant, is elastic, and of handsome appearance, and it can be transported from place to place without damage. The weight of a chair of this description is considerably less than one of rosewood or carved mahogany, and the prices at which they are furnished are very moderate."

The following story is going the rounds of the English papers:

Two sons of nobleman, at school at Eton, were asked to Windsor Castle to spend the day with the Prince of Wales. His highness having in the course of the day's amusements given himself some airs which the young Etonians had no relish for, one of them gave him a sound drubbing. The circumstance reached the ears of the Queen, who, having ascertained on inquiry that her son had given sufficient provocation to merit the thrashing, had the good sense to express her satisfaction at the lesson taught him.

LOST—A small lady's watch with a white face; also, two ivory young ladies' work-boxes. A mahogany gentleman's dressing case, and a small pony, belonging to a young lady with a silver mane and tail.

The two ivory young ladies, the mahogany gentleman, and the young lady with a silver mane and ——, we trust have found their lost articles.

The Methodists of Cincinnati, Ohio, recently commemorated the fiftieth anniversary of their first church organization in that city, by resolving unanimously to contribute $50,000 to three objects, namely, 1st, about $6000 to put the German churches out of debt. 2d, about $10,000 or $12,000 for the Female College; and 3d, the remainder, or about $32,000 for Sunday Schools and Church extension among the most needy.

VOLUME III. NUMBER 20. NEW ORLEANS, SATURDAY, JUNE 18, 1853. WHOLE NUMBER, 124.

The following ingenious and beautiful composition went the round of the papers a few years ago, but in view of the fact that it will be new to many of our readers, we give it a place in our columns:

THE LORD'S PRAYER—An Acrostic.

Our Lord and King who reignest enthroned on high
Father of Light! Mysterious Deity!
Who art the great I AM—the last, the first—
Art righteous, holy, merciful and just—
Let realms of glory, scenes where angels sing,
Heaven is the dwelling-place of God our King.
Hallowed thy name, which doth all names transcend.
By thee adored, our great Almighty Friend.
Thy glory shines beyond creation's space,
Thy kingdom towers beyond thy starry skies:
Kingdom nor scepter falls, but thine shall rise.
Come, let thine empire, O, thou Holy One.
Thy great and everlasting will be done!
As God make known his will, his power display,
So let the work of mortals to obey.
Bless us the great, the wondrous work of love,
On Calvary's cross he died, but reigns above.
Earth bears the record in thy holy word.
As heaven adores thy love, let earth, O lord;
Exalted transcendent in the eternal skies,
Be praised in heaven—for man the Saviour dies
Let songs immortal, angels laud his name,
Heaven shouts with joy, and saints his love proclaim.
Give us, O Lord, our food, nor cease to give Us proper food, on which our souls may live
This be our boon to-day, and daye to come
Day without end, in our eternal home;
Our needy souls supply from day to day.
Holy assist, and aid us when we pray;
Bend though we ask, yet, Lord, thy blessing lend
And make no grateful when thy gifts descend
Forgive our sins, which in destruction place
Us—the vile rebels of a rebel race.
Our follies, faults and trespasses forgive—
Debts which we ne'er can pay, or thou receive
Us we, oh Lord, our neighbors' faults o'erlook,
As long thou'dst blot ours from thy memory's book:
Forgive our enemies; extend thy grace
Our souls to save, o'er Adam's guilty race
Redeem to thee in gratitude and love,
And in that duty paid by saints above
Lead us from sin, and in thy mercy raise
Us from the tempter and his hellish ways:
Not in our own, but in his name who bled,
Into thine ear we pour our every need.
Temptation's fatal charms help us to shun.
But may we conquer through thy conquering Son
Deliver us from all which can annoy
Us this world, and may our souls destroy;
From all calamities which men betide.
Lord and death, oh turn our feet aside.
For we are mortal worms, and cleave to clay:
Thine 'tis to rule, and mortals to obey.
Be not thy mercy, Lord, forever free!
The whole creation knows no God but thee
Kingdom and empire in thy presence fall:
The King eternal reigns the King of all
Power is with thee—to thee be glory given,
And be thy name adored by earth and heaven.
The praise of saints and angels is thy due
Glory to thee, the Everlasting One.
Forever be thy triune name adored.
Amen! Hosanna! blessed be the Lord!

CHRISTIANITY REQUIRED BY THE TIMES.

REFORM IN CHRISTIAN BENEFICENCE.

In our last article we said that the times demanded a reform of the pecuniary liberality of the Church, and that most of the other reforms advocated in these essays ultimately depend upon this. We showed that the actual standard of religious beneficence is defective in principle, as lacking the sentiment of duty; and in manner, as lacking method—settled habit.

The position we took respecting the moral obligation of Christian beneficence, novel as it might appear to some of our readers, is, we think, Scriptural. Indeed, the vagueness both of principle and practice which now characterizes our Christian liberality is, we believe, almost a peculiar defect of modern Christianity. As the command to spread the gospel "into all the world" came to be so indefinitely apprehended as to be almost unwilling throughout Protestant Christendom, until within a few generations, so the Scriptural doctrine of beneficence has lost its distinctness—been nearly generalized away until recent exigencies of the Church have begun to recall attention to it.

The Middle Ages excelled us altogether in this respect; property was then universally consecrated to religion. Their charities were misdirected, and thus became a public evil; but they were right in their moral principle. The Levitical dispensation was distinguished in a remarkable manner by the sanctification of property, and not more by its endless symbolism than by its religious charities was it adapted to the moral education of its people. We err egregiously when we speak of the tithe, the one-tenth, as the standard of Jewish contributions to religion. The seal of a religious charity was put upon almost every article of the Jew's possessions. He paid for the ransom of his first-born son; he paid for the first-fruits of his flocks, and the first gatherings of his harvest, the latter being estimated at a sixtieth. He left in the corners of his fields, for the destitute, another sixtieth. Whatever dropped from his hand, in reaping, was left for the poor; and once in every seven years he allowed his lands to produce spontaneously for them. Then there were the sacrificed animals or portions of them—the trespass-offerings, the sin-offerings, &c.—the expense of pilgrimages to the temple thrice in the life of every male, the half-shekels for the sanctuary, and the remission of all debts every seventh year. Besides these there were numerous expenses for hospitality and reliefs to the poor; and then came the tithe—the tenth of the produce of the fields—for the Levites; and, finally, the remainder was assessed for another tenth to be spent for the worship of the temple and for the poor; and then, at the end of every third year, in order to secure the integrity of the law, the people made solemn declaration before God that this last tenth had been faithfully provided. It has been estimated that the devout Jew gave away about one-third of all his income to the poor and to religion. And let it be borne in mind that so exact and graduated were the Levitical exactions in this respect that these appropriations were not from particular classes of the people, but from all, the ratio being proportioned to their resources. Besides these systematic charities, what special liberality did they show for their religion, as for the Tabernacle in the wilderness and the Temple at Jerusalem—the amount expended on the latter being estimated at three thousand millions of dollars—a sum that throws into utter eclipse all the expenditure of Protestant Christendom during generations, for that greater work, of foreign evangelization, to which, as we have shown, all the world is summoning it.

A divine meaning was there in this Jewish system of beneficence; it had those true elements of effectiveness, which we have said are lacking in our modern Christian charities—moral obligation and method. It was no grievance on the Jewish people; few of their institutions had a more salutary effect upon their social system; they thrived under it, and perhaps no nation ever suffered less from that great plague of modern civilization—pauperism.

Though this noble beneficence was connected with the Jewish ecclesiastical system, and is, therefore, annulled in its detail, yet will any Christian man admit that its essential principles are annulled—that Christianity, especially in this age, when all the destinies of the world are devolving upon it, may have a financial standard beneath that of a state which was hardly larger than some of the single counties of this Christian land, and whose whole design was the maintenance of a preliminary and a local religion!

The primitive Christians did not understand that the abolition of Judaism repealed its essential beneficence. On the contrary, few subjects received more attention in the first consultations and labors of the Church than its provisions for the poor and for the extension of the gospel. One of its ministerial orders—still retained—the Diaconate—was established for charitable purposes. It had all things in common, when circumstances justified it. Its weekly sacrament was followed with distributions to the absent sick and poor.

When it sent forth Paul and Barnabas "unto the heathen," it was with but one specific injunction, "Only they would that we should remember the poor." Journeys and plans for "collections" for the Churches are of frequent record in the Epistles and the Acts. One of the apostles asks, "Whoso hath this world's goods, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?" Another declares charity to the widow and fatherless to be a part of the definition of religion, "pure and undefiled:" another urges beneficence upon the Church as an exemplification of the principle of the Atonement itself: the "grace of our Lord Jesus Christ," who, "though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that ye, through his poverty, might be rich;" and Christ himself dignified it as the test-virtue of the final judgment.

We learn from Josephus and Philo that collections of tithes and other gifts for the Temple service at Jerusalem were made regularly in the synagogues on every Sabbath. The Christians at first assembled in the synagogues not only in Judea, but wherever they could, throughout the empire, and their ministerial "orders," form of "ordination," and other rites still extant, were actually copied from the synagogue service. The synagogue charities probably led to St. Paul's rule of Christian beneficence as recorded in 1 Cor. xvi. 1, 2:—"NOW CONCERNING THE COLLECTION FOR THE SAINTS, AS I HAVE GIVEN ORDER TO THE CHURCHES OF GALATIA, EVEN SO DO YE. UPON THE FIRST DAY OF THE WEEK, LET EVERY ONE OF YOU LAY BY HIM IN STORE AS GOD HATH PROSPERED HIM, THAT THERE BE NO GATHERINGS WHEN I COME." The apostle modifies the Jewish custom; the "first day"—the "Lord's day"—was substituted for the Jewish Sabbath, and, as there was no centralization of Christianity, as of Judaism at Jerusalem, and no mode of distributing these charities, except by the casual passage of the apostles or leading saints, they were to be "kept in store" till such opportunities occurred. The principle of the synagogue-custom was retained—the form only being changed.

This passage we deem to be the divine rule of Christian beneficence. It is as specific as the command to spread the gospel. It is the counterpart of that command, and necessary for its fulfillment, for "how shall they preach except they be sent!" And the indefiniteness of its impression on the Christian mind of our day is, as we have before said, the same as that which, until within a few generations, rendered comparatively powerless the command to "preach the gospel to every creature."

We are not disposed to be homiletic in these essays, but we cannot forbear to direct attention to the very specific character of this text. Look at it.

First, It seems to have been designed as a general rule. As we have stated, it was the general custom of the Jewish Sabbath, only modified enough to suit it to the new circumstances of the new Church. Though prescribed for the Church at Corinth in this instance, yet this does not limit it as a local practice; for the obvious reasons which could render it desirable there, would apply anywhere, and many of the most important lessons of revelation now recognized as unquestionably of general application, are derived from epistles addressed to local churches. Besides these considerations, the apostle expressly says that he but repeated instructions given elsewhere: "As I have given order to the Churches (not Church) of Galatia, so do ye."

Second, The rule is individual. "Let every one of you," &c.,—the poor as well as the rich were to do something; for the rule was not only designed to secure funds, but to have a moral effect on the giver himself.

Third, It is methodical—stated in regard to time—"upon the first day of the week;" and specific in regard to manner—"lay by him in store." The apostle would evidently guard against that casual habit of liberality which has crept into the Church in modern times, and which, as we have shown, has become the fundamental defect of our religious finances.

Fourth, It prescribes a standard of giving quite definite, and yet flexible enough to meet any circumstances: "As God has prospered him." The poor or unprosperous man is not to be bound to any absolute self-taxation which might bring suffering upon his family, the rich man is not by an absolute stated donation to assume the right of reserving to himself his other gains, however great. All were alike stewards, not proprietors of their resources; and where much was given, much was required.

Fifth, The apostle seems carefully to discountenance irregularities, the often questionable expedients with which our modern public collections are made, "that there be no gathering when I come."

Sixth, The rule is mandatory, it was enjoined in this case as it was ordered in the other—as I have given ORDER to the Churches of Galatia, even so do ye.

Such then is this notable passage. Could it be more significant? Now that it is a rigid statute, to be interpreted exactly according to the letter, we do not insist. That would be absurd; but we insist that the generalization of it by which its essential meaning has been nearly lost in the modern Church, is equally absurd; we insist that it does indicate the essential rule of Christian beneficence, and that it unquestionably implies these three elements as constituents of that rule, viz:

First, That Christian beneficence is a matter of moral obligation.

Second, That it should be a determinate habit.

Third, That it should be a comprehensive sanctification of the secular business of the Christian man. He should live to sustain himself and those dependent upon him, only that he and his may be co-workers together with God for the salvation of the world, laboring for this end in his workshop, in his fields, or in the mart, and applying to it the fruits of his labor as "God prospers him."

What a revolution of ordinary Christian life would these principles make! We affirm that they are Scriptural, and that their enunciation and demonstration throughout the Christian world are the great want of the times, and must be secured before the Church can command the full availability of its present great opportunities.

"Abba, Father"

Much of the beauty and depth of meaning contained in many passages of Scripture, is lost sight of by our not being acquainted with the customs of the age in which they were delivered. This applies more especially to the figurative language of the Bible. Paul, in addressing the Christians at Rome, tells them, "Ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear, but ye have received the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry "Abba Father." The allusion is here made to a custom among the Jews which forbade slaves to call a free man "Abba," or a free woman "Imma." This was a privilege which their state of bondage disqualified them to enjoy, it being reserved only to free persons, and those who were adopted children, to use the title.

How happily did the apostle make use of this custom, by way of figure, to impress the minds of Christians with the interesting truths which he was inculcating. Although all are by nature children of God, for he created us; yet by reason of our rebellion against his parental authority, we have all forfeited our rights to sonship, and have become children of wrath. Satan has led us captive, and employed us in the drudgery of sin. All mankind have engaged in open warfare against heaven, and as rebels, were condemned to death. Nor could they redeem for themselves heaven, which they had forfeited. "None of them can by any means redeem his brother, nor give to God a ransom for him, for the redemption of their soul is precious." (Ps. 49: 7.) Jesus Christ having come into our world, and by his own blood purchased our redemption, hath released us from the bondage of sin, adopted us into God's family again, and we now have the privilege of addressing our offended parent as freemen, and of using the endearing title of "Abba, Father." Precious privilege! What gratitude is due our blessed Saviour who has, by his own death, redeemed us from so awful a servitude, the wages of which is death, eternal woe.

But did he only redeem us from death? Nay, verily, he hath purchased for us all and more than we lost by our rebellion. He hath not only made us children of God, but "if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint heirs with Jesus Christ." Heirs of salvation. Heirs of the kingdom of which God hath promised. Yea, "all things are ours, and we are Christ's, and Christ is God's." If, then, we are Christ's, our title is indefeasible, and can never be revoked; because we possess it by virtue of our union with him. He is appointed heir of all things, and we are joint heirs with him. We confess that if we held our title upon any other ground than the merits of our atoning Saviour, it would be most uncertain. But all the combined forces of the universe shall not prevail against us, whilst "he liveth to make intercession for us."

Then, Christians, since it is our priceless privilege, let us "come boldly to a throne of grace, and obtain mercy, and find grace to help us in time of need." We will never be turned away empty, if we ask aright. God hath promised us a sufficiency of grace for every time and trial, and if we do not obtain it, it is because we fail to ask for it in a proper manner. We must come in the name of our blessed mediator. "I am the way, and the truth, and the life; no man cometh to the Father but by me." If we do not know how to ask of God, we can say, "Abba, Father." A more eloquent appeal to our tender and sympathizing parent could not be uttered by man or angels. God knows what his children need, and he only requires us to feel our wants, and if we will only raise our hearts to him, they shall be supplied. He that feedeth the ravens will provide for his children. Are you in danger? Then let your prayer be, "Abba, Father," and his Providence will take care of you. Are you upon a bed of disease and death? O, then, if you can say no more, let the last feeble accents that fall from your lips be, "Abba, Father." You may then commend your soul to him who gave it, with as much composure as the confiding child feels when sinking into a gentle sleep in the arms of a doting parent. And why not! If God is your Father, and he has told you that nothing should ever be able to separate you from his love, do you suppose he will desert you in the hour of death, when Satan makes his last and greatest effort to tear you from him? Do you doubt his love because he permits death to overtake you? This is only the messenger of his love, sent to bear your spirit home to himself, where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary find rest. It is only calling you home to enjoy those mansions of glory prepared for you by your Redeemer. If the face of Moses shone so brightly, after having conversed with God upon the Mount, what will be the glory which God will vouchsafe unto his children, when they shall behold him face to face, not upon the mount that smoked, but in the heaven of heavens! If, then, you have received the spirit of adoption, and can cry, "Abba, Father," all things else will be added unto you. [Cum. Press.

SMALL TALK.

Again, should not something be done with reference to our class meetings! We are thoroughly satisfied of their value, as a means of grace. Methodism owes much of its success to their existence. A dark day will it be for us when they fall into disuse. There is nothing that can supply their place. But, does not our practice disgrace our rules? The discipline makes attendance on them a test of church membership. Yet, there are thousands in good standing among us, who never attend them. There are many difficulties in the way of enforcing the rule. Our most faithful ministers fail to do it. It is a great bugbear to many, who would otherwise enter our Church. The rule has just force enough to make it "a thorn in the flesh," yet not enough to make it a source of blessing.

If the rule could be enforced, according to the intention and spirit in which it was first made, we doubt not that immense good would be the result. As it is, we fear it does more harm than good. Is it not a shame that we continue a regulation in our book of discipline which so few, if any, of us regard, according to its requirements? There are many who seriously question whether it be proper for the Church to make that a test of membership, which is not required either by the spirit or letter of the New Testament. This question we do not propose to discuss. It is certain, however, that we have the rule, and that it is very rarely conformed to.

Something must be done. If the rule is to be retained, would it not be well to adopt some measures which will secure obedience to it? A universal and unflinching application of it to the Church would be attended with terrible storms. It would shake the Church from centre to circumference. Many, very many, of our members would be lost to us. Whether this convulsion might not be for the better—whether the Church would not have more internal power and be better fitted for her high work—we shall not attempt to decide. We do say, however, if some more efficient means be not put in operation to secure obedience to the rule, we had better abandon it. Such a course would be far more creditable to us, and profitable to the Church. It would be much better to place it on the same footing with other means of grace, with no penalty for non-attendance, than have it remain as it is. Those only would attend, then, who prize it, profit by and enjoy it, as a most precious occasion for spiritual improvement. And who else attends now? Exceeding few do it from fear of exclusion, for the rule is not enforced, and they fear it not. A few others do it because the Church requires it. The great body of class-attending Methodists would go, whether the rules required it or not. As things now stand, then, we should lose nothing by the latter arrangement.

Nay, we think a great deal would be gained. Ministers would not be in a continual state of embarrassment and vexation with reference to a rule which the discipline required them to carry out, but with reference to the policy of enforcing which they entertained very serious doubts. Those who fail to attend, would be relieved from annoyance through the operation of a rule which, they believe, has no warrant in Scripture. Many, without our pales, might be induced to enter, who, though they might not make such good members as those who attend class, would at least make as good as those who do not. Besides, we should be free from a regulation which mocks all our attempts at enforcing it.

We ask, then, for some General Conference action upon the matter. We hope the whole will be thoroughly sifted. The law should either be resuscitated from its obsoleteness and nailed down as a permanent organic fixture in our economy, or cast off as an arrangement good enough in its day, but having served its time, and of course of no further use to the present generation.

The late advices from England inform us that the Master of the Rolls has granted an order for the release of Bishop Ullathorne and the very Rev. Dr. Moore, who had been imprisoned as shareholders in a broken bank, the Bishop consenting to pay over the £200 he had previously offered, as more than the amount of his own and Dr. Moore's private property.

LETTER FROM ENGLAND.

The Gospel Leaven in a Family.

[Special Correspondence of the Advocate.]

STAFFORDSHIRE, May 9, 1853.

The influence of an individual is not to be restricted to a limited circle; it spreads on every side like the undulation of the smitten water, and it will live and act, and ever enlarge its sphere of operation into the distant future. Every man, however insignificant his position, is exerting an influence upon others, powerful either for good or evil, which will take hold on the judgment of the great day, and be felt for ever. Such an influence is ever abroad, and acting beyond our control upon relations and friends, and acquaintances, and upon multitudes whom we never saw. The look, the word, the deed, can never be recalled; they will exist in youthful vigor, and fly from man to man, from kingdom to kingdom, from age to age, and from far distant generations may glare upon us like spirits of darkness, or smile upon us like angels of light. The prisoner in the dungeon, cut off from intercourse with all but his keeper, exerts an influence upon him, and he on others, and they on a thousand more. In domestic life the mothers of Samuel and Timothy, of Wesley and Doddridge, unseen by the world, taught their little ones the great truths of the Bible. And what did this involve and secure for others? The event has shown that they were kindling a flame, the benign radiance of which was to extend to other ages, and over a great part of the world.

Let the precious leaven of God's saving truth enter a family, and it is the purpose of God that it should operate until the whole lump shall be leavened. In the nature of things, if the parent be converted to God, the conversion of the children will be most earnestly desired; this is among the first indications of spiritual life, the first beats of the spiritual pulse, the first and strongest proofs of personal piety. And not seldom has the conversion of a child or a servant led to the conversion of an entire household. Light from Christ the Son of Righteousness, wherever kindled, will penetrate and dispel surrounding darkness. Let it be fixed in a family, and let it shine there with increasing lustre and power, and, sooner or later, that family becomes "light in the Lord."

At the village of Everereech, in the West of England, which I occasionally visited some five years ago, I formed the acquaintance of Miss S——, who had a short time previously sought and found true religion. Her family belonged to the Church of England, and were attached and even bigoted adherents of that Church, frowning on what is termed, somewhat scornfully in England, every form of Dissent from the Church established by law. Without any breach of truth or charity, it may be affirmed that any thing but the living gospel was preached by the State-appointed and State-paid clergyman; but in mercy to the inhabitants of this parish God's Providence had opened a door for the zealous Methodists, who had succeeded in gaining a foothold, by erecting a small chapel and organizing a small society, in spite of the fierce opposition of those who preferred darkness to light and death to life. Miss S—— attended this chapel, and listened with interest to the gospel there faithfully proclaimed; she was soon an anxious seeker of personal salvation, and after a season of godly sorrow, she entered into peace. Her love to the Saviour was a most powerful affection, prompting her to a close walking with him, and leading her to have recourse to mighty prayer and earnest efforts for the conversion of her father and mother, her brothers and sisters. She was, however, at first bitterly opposed by the whole of her family; from the time of her conversion, nothing she said or did was right, and the younger children were encouraged by their parents to pour ridicule upon their praying sister. The reverend vicar of the parish, when he called at the house, deplored the schismatical and dangerous step Miss S—— had taken, and sympathizing with Mr. and Mrs. S—— in the great trial they were enduring, in consequence of this step, entailing, as he said with great emphasis, "so much disgrace upon the family." He also to the father hinted the propriety of his employing coercive measures in prohibiting his daughter from attending the Dissenting Chapel, and commanding her attendance at the Parish Church. Although Miss S—— was 20 years of age, the father proceeded to act upon the suggestion of the clergyman, and forbade his daughter from going again to the chapel; if she disobeyed him he threatened her with his severest displeasure, and declared that he would horse whip her and turn her out of doors. She was most exemplary in the discharge of every personal and relative duty; she bore the insults and ridicule heaped upon her with remarkable meekness, always seeking to return good for evil; and now she avowed her willingness and her determination to obey her father in every thing else, but that she could not disobey God to please her father and mother—she could not leave that ministry and those people and those services that had been rendered so great a blessing to her soul—she could not return to the Parish Church and sit under the ministry of a man who knew nothing of experimental religion; whose lips, though a priest, kept not knowledge, and who dispensed to the people hard stones, instead of the living bread from heaven. Will she abide faithful in this fiery trial?—will she evince the martyr's spirit! Soon the next regular services of her loved sanctuary occurs, and regardless of consequences she resolves to be there. But she does not march forward to uplift this heavy cross in her own strength; many and fervent are her supplications at the mercy-seat for wisdom, meekness and power, that she may in the day of trial glorify God, and that her family may be led to espouse the "truth as it is in Jesus." The testing time arrives; a lengthened period has she spent in secret prayer; she leaves her knees for the regular service at the chapel; God was with her, and she felt that she could sacrifice all for Christ; and she returns home, not knowing what may befal her there. The anger of her father on her return is terrible, but she is gentle, yet firm, while he, with consummate cruelty, proceeds to horse whip his own child for no other offence than that of seeking to save her own soul. Her mother partially relented, and by her interference, the father does not carry into effect the other part of his threat, to banish the disciple of Christ from the house. Again and again was there inflicted the same punishment, but Miss S—— felt, on her way, not ashamed to suffer for the sake of Christ. And now God is about to answer her prayers, and to honor her fidelity.

The despised Church to which she belongs is visited with a remarkable out-pouring of the Spirit of God. A solemn awe spreads through the village. Some of the most reckless are aroused to flee from the wrath to come; and numerous conversions have already taken place. Night after night the house of prayer is the scene of many marvelous displays of God's saving mercy. In the midst of this hallowed excitement, on a Thursday evening, after preaching a short sermon, I invite all who desire to "enter in at the strait gate," to come forward to a seat set apart for that purpose; one and another accept the invitation, and to my amazement, I see among them Miss S——'s mother and eldest sister. By some—to them—mysterious influence they had been drawn to the service, and were powerfully impressed as soon as the engagements of the evening commenced. Miss S—— follows and kneels beside them, weeping tears of joy, while they are weeping tears of sorrow. For two hours Mrs. S—— is seen as the broken-hearted supplicant, and then her condemnation is removed, and she is justified freely. The daughter, however, at the close of our service at a late hour, is still the subject of intense mental agony. She remained upon her knees, and when I implored her to go home because of the lateness of the hour. (11 A. M.) she said, "I cannot leave until God has blotted out my sins—do remain with me a little longer." I then advised that she should leave the chapel and accompany a devoted Christian female to her house, and there still pray for the salvation God had promised her. This step was taken, and I learnt afterwards that far on in the night prayer prevailed, and the weary and heavy laden one found rest to her soul. Mr. S—— is struck dumb with what has occurred, another daughter and the wife of his bosom uniting with the praying people at the chapel, and even his little boys becoming serious and beginning to pray. He can no longer persecute, he fears to sit in the seat of the scornful, and he cannot help perceiving the practical influence of this altered state of things upon the entire family. He is not, it is true, willing to go to the chapel himself, but he is careful to throw no obstacle in the way of any member of his family.

One evening towards the end of the week, Mrs. S—— and her daughter having been at the chapel several evenings of that week already, hesitated about leaving home, when Mr. S—— perceiving their hesitation, said, "If you desire to go to chapel, go; I will remain at home: if this is religion,—(so much order, quietness and peace in the family I have never known before)—I am for religion." He also requested that the ministers should be invited to partake of the hospitalities of his house. On one of these occasions I conversed with him most freely about his own soul, and urged his attendance where he could hear the gospel. He allowed that, having been such a bigoted churchman, having never worshipped any where except in the Church of England, if he was seen in the chapel, every one would be talking about him, and that this cross he was not prepared for yet. "I am quite favorable," he said, "to religion, and I mean to break away from the world and seek it for myself at some future time."

The gospel leaven having spread thus far, will surely still diffuse its influence until the father's heart is touched, and he too becomes a "new creature."

"More and more it spreads and grows, Ever mighty to prevail."

And it shall spread; individuals and families shall be the Lord's; nations shall be evangelized; and the entire mass of our fallen humanity shall be permeated and purified!

Religious Liberty.

A beginning has been made by our government of inserting in our treaties with foreign governments, stipulations for the exercise of religious liberty, on the part of our citizens abroad. The following article is contained in the late treaty between the United States and the Oriental Republic of Uruguay:

"The citizens of the two republics, respectively, residing in any of the territories of the other party, shall enjoy, in their houses, persons, and properties, the full protection of the government. They shall not be disturbed, molested, or annoyed, in any manner, on account of their religious belief, nor in the proper exercise of their peculiar religion, either within their own private houses, or in churches, chapels, or other places appointed for public worship; which places of worship they shall be at liberty to build and maintain in convenient situations, interfering in no way with, but respecting the religion and customs of the country in which they reside.

"Liberty shall also be granted to the citizens of either of the two high contracting parties to bury their dead, who may die in the territories of the other, in burial-places of their own, which, in the same manner, may be freely established and maintained; nor shall the funerals or sepulchres of the dead be disturbed in any way, or upon any account."

VARIOUS PARAGRAPHS.

THE SHIP CAPTAIN.—The master of the ship seemeth to be idle, to sit still and to do nothing. He stirreth not the pump, he driveth not the oars, he soundeth not the deep, he ridgeth not the ropes, he scaleth not the shrouds, he runneth not hither and thither, forward or backward, under the hatches or above. He sitteth still, holding his peace, and looketh upon the load-star, and in appearance doth nothing. But his labor passeth all the rest. Without his labor, all the pains which the other mariners take were lost. Were it not for his labor, the ship would soon strike upon rocks, and be staid in the sands, and they should all perish. So it fareth with princes and counselors, bishops, preachers, and other sorts of learned men, who neither plow, nor sow, nor hedge, nor ditch, nor use such painful labor of the body. They seem to do nothing, yet they do all things, which is for the peace, and the wealth, and the safeguard of all the people. [Jewel.

OUR LIFE.—The birds of the air die to sustain thee; the beasts of the field die to nourish thee; the fishes of the sea die to feed thee. Our stomachs are, then, the common sepulcher. Good God! with how many deaths are our poor lives patched up! how full of death is the miserable life of man! [Quarles.

LITTLE SINS.—Your consciences start back and are affrighted, as indeed they ought, at a temptation to murder, incest, blasphemy, or any of those more horrid sins that are the prodigies of corrupt nature. These sins you dare not so much as commit once; and yet thousands of thousands of lesser sins, such as sinful thoughts, idle words, petty oaths, commodious lies—these proceed from you, without either striving against them, or mourning for them. [Bishop Hopkins.

GOD'S WAYS.—If God meets with a very good field, he pulls up the weeds, and lets the corn grow; if indifferent, he lets the corn and weeds grow together; if very ill, he gathers the few ears of corn and burns the weeds. Were it not for God's dear children that are intermixed with the world, it could not stand: the wicked owe their lives unto those few good whom they hate and persecute. [Bishop Hall.

THE GOSPEL.—How sweet and delicate is the Gospel! Not only the fathers of the Old Testament, but the angels desired to look into the glorious mysteries of it; and yet we are cloyed! This supernatural food is too light: the bread-corn of our human reason and profound discourse would better content us. [Bishop Hall.

THE TRUTH.—God is the author of truth; the devil is the father of lies. If the telling of a truth shall endanger thy life, the Author of truth will protect thee from the danger, or reward thee for thy damage. If the telling of a lie will secure thy life, the father of lies will beguile thee of thy gains, or traduce the security. Better by losing of a life to save it, than by saving of a life to lose it. However, better thou perish than the truth. [Quarles.

OUR TRIALS.—If God hath sent thee a cross, take it up and follow him; use it wisely, lest it be intolerable: behold in it God's anger against sin, and love toward thee—in punishing the one, and chastening the other. If it be light, slight it not—if heavy, murmur not. Not to be sensible of a judgment is the symptom of a hardened heart; and to be displeased at his pleasure is a sign of a rebellious will. [Quarles.

POOR MAN.—Man is but a reed, the most feeble in nature, but endowed with the power of thought. It is not necessary for the universe to arm itself to crush him; a vapor, a drop of water, is enough to kill him. But, should the universe crush him, man would still be more noble than his destroyer, because he knows that he dies. The universe is ignorant of the advantage it has over him. Hence all our dignity is derived from thought. It is from this point that we must rise—not from space and time. Let us labor, then, to think well: this is the principle of morality. [Pascal.

KNOWLEDGE OF CHRIST'S LOVE.—It is a peculiar kind of expression where the apostle prays that they might "know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge." We may know that experimentally which we cannot know comprehensively; we may know that in its power and effects which we cannot comprehend in its nature and depths. A weary person may receive refreshment from a spring, who cannot fathom the depth of the ocean from whence it proceeds. [Dr. Owen.

WE SEE BUT IN PART.—A traveler, as he passed through a large and thick wood, saw a part of a huge oak, which to him appeared misshapen, and spoiled the scenery.

"If," said he, "I was owner of this forest, I would cut down that tree."

But when he had ascended the hill, and taken a full view of the forest, this same tree appeared the most beautiful part of the whole landscape.

"How erroneously," said he, "I judged while I saw only a part!"

This plain tale illustrates the plans of God. We now see but in part. The full view—the harmony and proportion of things, are necessary to clear up our judgment. The time will come when we shall condemn, with deep humiliation, our own impertinence.

STATISTICS OF DANCING.—An ingenious French arithmetician has calculated that the space which a young Parisian belle, who is fond of the salutary exercise of dancing, traverses in the gay salons of Paris, amounts in the course of one dancing season, to four hundred and thirty-four miles and a half! He has also estimated that a French lady, fond of performing the functions of a tectotum, will spin around in a waltz, in one night, as many times as the wheels of a steamboat revolve while running the distance between Dover and Calais.

"Old Bro. Thomas Samford was with ns yesterday, in good health, and preached us a very pointed, forcible sermon. He made some solemn appeals to the people; and from the seriousness which pervaded the congregation, and the many tears which flowed, we hope that lasting good was effected."

At the late commencement of the Randolph Macon (Va.) College, the degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred on the Revs. Hezekiah G. Leigh and Chas. F. Deems, of the North Carolina Conference, and the Honorary degree of A. M. on the Rev. John E. Edwards, of the Virginia Conference.

Clinton, Miss.—Quite a revival of religion has been going on for two weeks at Clinton, Miss. The meeting is a Missionary Baptist, aided by Methodists, Presbyterians, and Episcopalians. One hundred or more have professed religion. J. A. Lane.

Choctaw Agency.—Before I close, suffer me to say as good cheer, we have some very fine meetings among our Choctaw friends; also the Chickasaws. On our last visit to them we had a meeting which would have raised a religious smile on the face of Old Time Methodism. We left thinking, if not saying, "Alleluia, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth." Seventeen were added to the Church, in a shower of Chickasaws, Choctaws and white folks, shonting.

Nutritious Preaching.—"Do you like Dr. S. as well as ever?" was the question once addressed to a member of the A—— street Church.

"O, yes; his sermons are roast-beef and plum-pudding to us for a whole week."

This was high praise surely, and bespoke a full larder, and no small skill in setting out the feast. It gives us at once an idea of the man and of his sermons, and of the study, too, whence such sermons came.

But, in reply to a similar question we once heard, what struck us as better—"O, yes; that was a real meat and greens sermon."

Plum-pudding may be a rarity, and roast-beef neither common or cheap. "Meat and greens" is in the cabin and the parlor, a good stand-by—in use, daily use, where roads are traveled instead of streets: the first course and the last course of the log-cabin, where "the bone and sinew" grows.

The Rev. Robert Hall, in speaking of the death of his son, says—"God dries up the channels that you may be happily compelled to plunge into an infinite ocean of happiness." Blissful thought! Father, Mother, do you mourn over the grave of your little one, look up! know that the chastening rod is in your heavenly father's hand, and that if he hath taken away, he first did give, and he doeth all things well. He gave you the bud of beauty and you entered your happiness in its being. He saw that this was not for your good, so he took away the child, whose presence had been as a leaping, sparkling streamlet to your heart's love—that the heart which had before but tasted of earthly—might be lost in the immensity of heavenly love.

Methodism.—The British Quarterly Review makes the following remarks on Methodism:

Methodism was evidently a reaction against the influence and authority of the high-and-dry people of the established Church. It seized on the orthodox doctrines, but it did so that they might be made to produce their proper spiritual fruit. The nation has seen enough of barren orthodoxy; the time in which its uses and value should be made evident had now arrived. "These doctrines are the truth," said our orthodox Churchman, "be ye therefore christened, confirmed, come to the communion, and, above all, be ye obedient to magistrates and ministers, or it will not be well with you." "The doctrines are the truth," said our orthodox Methodist, "therefore ye must be born again." Our Methodist friend is right; and far be it from us to take exception to the warm-hearted energy with which he insists on being so regarded. Given the orthodoxy avowed by both, the consequent teachings of the Methodist is immensely the more rational. It sets forth the result befitting the expenditure—an end worthy of the means. If orthodoxy be true, the religion of orthodoxy should be a grave matter. It may be allied with ritualism, it may give its sanction to every thing favorable to social order, but its purpose must embrace results of a much higher import, results eminently spiritual, or there is no wise relation between the cost which it incurs for the sake of the religious, and the religious as realized.

A TIME OF PEACE.

Southern Methodism, "as an organized development of Christianity," ought to be improving this season. Peace reigns throughout our borders. There is some pressure from without and sinister purpose—this cannot be disguised. But we are at peace among ourselves, and have good will to all men.

Our geographical position is cause sufficient to offend some. The word "Southern" is not the most pleasant sound to some ears. Casting an eye over the line, they say—"Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth?" Are there any real religious people "in the South?"

Then the conservative character that has, from the beginning, been so persistently maintained, while various isms are having their day, is not acceptable to those who "think it strange" that we run not with them to the same excess—"speaking evil of us." Be it so. We stand in the judgment of God, and not men. He made the South also. The lines are fallen to us in pleasant places. We dwell in our lot. And whom He blesses is blest—notwithstanding the efforts of the envious and self-righteous to conjure up a curse.

Surveying, with feelings far removed from pleasure, the tumults and divisions of others, the Southern Methodist regards the internal condition of his Church with thankfulness. There is no sectionalism. The points of the compass, N. S. E. W., are lost in unity. No speck of war visible. Neither strife nor the elements of it brewing. No complaint of schism, no threat of secession. Our theology is one. The General Conference is near, and yet the most progressive writers, who are preparing work for it, have as yet broached nothing radical.

Even the Church papers, representing the various parts of our Zion, stretching through many degrees of latitude and longitude, with striking unanimity think and speak the same. If there is war in their columns, it is against a common enemy. The Advocate at Richmond might be transferred to St. Louis, and that of Tennessee to Texas, and vice versa, with no other adapting changes than local items. We look in vain elsewhere for such a state of things. Suppose the New York Advocate were domesticated for a week or so in Auburn, (same State) and vice versa. What a stir in the camp! Or even the Boston editor were to change sanctums for a fortnight with the great official! We should not like to be about when the mail arrived.

Take our neighbors, and let us see how an Andover Presbyterian organ could be swapped off for a Princeton; or a Baptist Revision for an anti-Revision; or a High Church Episcopalian for a Low Church. It could not be done. All the goat skins on the Rocky Mountains could not hide the hand in the leaders put forth.

Our editors, too, (a clever set, though we say it ourselves,) set their correspondents and readers a good example of keeping the peace. Though men of their calling are accused of porcupinish propensities, we believe they could all live in one house. Occasionally a squib is exchanged, but that is a matter of course.

The Lord has blessed Southern Methodists, with the rest, in basket and in store. The garners are full of the fruits of the earth. The land smiles with plenty and health.

What are their duties under these auspicious circumstances?

Let that which is most important be mentioned first—the increase of the body of Christ. The Apostolic Church shows us how to improve such a season. It is not for supineness, but growth, and aggression, and building up: Acts ix.—"Then had the Churches rest throughout all Judea, and Galilee, and Samaria, and were edified; and walking in the fear of the Lord, and in the comfort of the Holy Ghost were multiplied."

The waste of death and days of past trouble, and the wear and tear of the world, must be made up and more. Progress must follow recuperation, and a momentum gathered to bear down the obstacles of a future evil day. No strife distracting us, no threatening heresies to combat, what have the ministry to do and the members, but to preach the word and push forward on a direct line of evangelical operations.

The missionary field widens, and doors are opening on every side. Southern Methodism answered this call the past year at $166,901 09; an increase over last year of more than $43,000. But this is not in proportion to our opportunity to do good unto all men.

The support of the ministry—that full and ungrudging support which secures unembarrassed operation—should not be withheld. And there are the funds for education, for the poor, the worn-out, and widows. All these channels of benevolence can be swelled to their full volume, while every agent of usefulness is worked to its full capacity. God has given us the means, caused us to live in the times, and by his Providence points out the ways of promoting his heavenly kingdom. Nothing hinders—unless it be a heart-hindrance. Nothing is wanting—unless it be a heart-want.

Southern Methodists having nothing else to do now but to do good, we take them to the last Census, to awake their consciences and guage their offerings. They have been considered poor, and consented to this estimate. But it turns out that there is great wealth among them, and we trust God moves them to consecrate it and do great things.

Instance a few States adjoining. In Louisiana, Alabama and Mississippi, Methodists are, at least, a fair average with the inhabitants in worldly gear, and the average wealth of each inhabitant is as follows: In Mississippi, $732 00. Multiply that sum by the 12,000 white members in that Conference, and set apart only a tithe of the increase! In Alabama, $532 00; multiply by 35,000 white members, and tithe its increase for the Lord's store-house! In Louisiana, $857; multiply by 5000 white members, and tithe its increase! The figures are startling. It would appear that hitherto we have done nothing. Enterprises that halt at present dying rates, would flourish vigorously off the mere crumbs from the table.*

What remains for Southern Methodism in these halcyon days God is granting her but to renew her strength; to be firmly established in her institutions; to multiply and be edified in her members; to "take root downward and bear fruit upward."

To hear of revivals and Church extension—of paying old debts—of chapel building and dedications—and pulling down small ones and putting up larger ones and more commodious—truly, this is good news. But ought it not be heard on all sides? If not now, when? What other better and possible conditions, with the blessing of God, can be asked for? The Conference, the District, the Circuit, the Station in Southern Methodism that is not moving forward now in all the departments that indicate Church progress and soul prosperity—what can be expected of it?

May this, in reference to all the past, be the great ingathering year, the great Church extension year, the great revival year, the great missionary year. And let all the people say, Amen.

* That tithes are a low standard of Christian liberality, see article on first page—"Christianity Required by the Times."

MISSIONARY DEMANDS.

The New York Chronicle, a Baptist paper, says well that a great mistake has prevailed as to the character and attainments of those laborers who are needed in the missionary fields of the church, both domestic and foreign. Most denominations have acted on the supposition that a man who was neither acceptable nor useful at home, might be well enough for a new country or a heathen land. The directors of the missionary enterprise are aware that this is a mistake; but its practical correction, in the self-denial of churches who want efficient pastors, and of preachers who are called to inviting fields of usefulness, will be slow and difficult.

The first ministry in any place or people is of the highest importance to future character. It fixes the standard of taste, doctrine and practice. The footsteps of the pioneer preacher will never be effaced.

If those churches and preachers in older countries were asked to decide whether they should prefer their own comfort and honor to the salvation of men in distant and destitute regions, they would not hesitate a moment. But that is not the question as it presents itself to their minds. They see a large and promising field at their own door, all the importance and interest of which they feel; and they hear of another field at a distance, the importance and interest of which they cannot appreciate; and, all question of self-interest aside, they ask: "Which of these are we to neglect?" There can be but little doubt how such a question will be decided, for the most part, even by conscientious and devoted men.

The primitive churches, which sent out Paul, Barnabas, Timothy, Titus, and kindred laborers, seem to have had little difficulty in determining what the cause demanded of them; and we may continue to urge that modern devotion should be elevated to the standard of apostolic zeal.

THOSE CATECHISMS.

The editor of the Western Advocate goes on deprecating upon our columns, without acknowledgment. We shall have to make out that bill against him and bring suit before Printers' Court. However, he is improving, and instead of crediting statements of ours to his "London Correspondent," has it "one of our Southern Exchanges." We do not blame him for borrowing an item, now and then, from the New Orleans Advocate; he needs, and we are willing to spare him some. Only hereafter we would bind him up to this—not to garble from our columns. Take out what he pleases, but don't take it by the wrong end and put it to a wrong use. In his paper of June 1st is the following item, clipped entire:

"We alluded recently to the fact that our Southern Methodist brethren supplied themselves with the Sunday School books of the American Union, and by one of our Southern exchanges just opened, we see that some of the Southern Methodist Sabbath Schools are also supplying themselves with the Shorter Catechism, which teaches Calvinism in the most approved and thorough style. Next we may hear of the substitution by our brethren in the South of the Confession of Faith for the Methodist Discipline. Strange things somehow will happen in this strange world."

Perhaps the reader remembers the item we published a few weeks ago, headed the Wrong Book. Does the above faithfully represent it or not? The purchase was made by some one at the American Tract Society's Depot, carelessly and without examination. We took the occasion to warn others, and suggest a supply of means for abundant publications of our own, and direct attention of those purchasing Sunday School books to the Catalogue of Dr. Summers. We have not kept up with those Shorter Catechisms discovered by the vigilant pastor, but doubt not they were hustled out in short time.

Our contemporary of the St. Louis Advocate does not read the New Orleans Advocate as closely as his neighbor of Cincinnati. In replying to the charges of the Western, he naively says:

"In reference to this matter about the 'Shorter Catechism,' which teaches Calvinism,' &c., we cannot either affirm or deny—this is the first we ever heard of it. We do not know what paper it was to which allusion is made, but confess ourselves slow to believe that a 'Catechism which teaches Calvinism' has been introduced into a Methodist Sunday School."

Dr. Elliott, by appointment, has written a history of the Division in '44; or, as they are pleased to call it, The Great Southern Secession. Here is a specimen of the way he deals with facts and statements! Here is a sample of his historical quality! We look for the forthcoming work with interest.

AGGREGATE MISSIONARY COLLECTIONS.

Dr. Schon writes to the S. C. Advocate for publication an abstract from the Eighth Annual Report, now in press, showing the amount raised for missions by the Church, South, during the past year. The report will be ready for distribution in eight or ten days.

The Secretary says:

Our present exhibit is indeed a gratifying one, and furnishes satisfactory evidence of the increased zeal of the Church in favor of the missionary cause. More than $43,000 above the amount contributed the year previous is the result of the last year's effort.

It is true that we have received a somewhat larger amount from the U. S. Government, but even then the increase is great, and speaks most favorably for the Church. We are happy to add, also, that we can present in the report our whole missionary work as in a state of prosperity. May the present year be as the past, and more abundantly so, both in the spiritual and financial work. Come, friends and brethren, let us all begin in time, and let the year 1853-'54 be the great "missionary year" for the Church, South. While the noble sum of $166,901 09 stands before us now—then let us look upon $180,000 as the result of the year's labor.

But I must close. Below please find the Report from each Conference, and the aggregate amount raised for missions during the past year in the M. E. Church, South:

TEXAS CORRESPONDENCE.

Houston, June 10, 1853.

We have good news to communicate from Texas—a revival of religion at Huntsville, the seat of the Presbyterian College in Texas. It took place in connection with a Quarterly meeting of the Methodist Church. Ministers—Revs. R. Alexander, N. Cravens and others of the Methodist Church, assisted by Rev. Messrs. Sonorville, Penland and others of the Presbyterian Church. Rev. Mr. Cravens informs me that up to last Sunday night forty-two had professed conversion and thirty-six united with the Church, and the meeting still proceeding with unabated interest. A delightful spirit of harmony prevailed among the different denominations. The Baptist State Convention commences in Huntsville next Saturday, which we trust will be the means of continuing the revival.

"Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity."

Rev. Mr. Petway is making a good impression in this community. He is a man of one work—having one thing to do, and doing it with all his might—a minister out of the pulpit as well as in. Under his administration the Methodist Church at this place has been greatly increased. His congregations are good; Sunday School in a highly prosperous condition. The Baptist and Presbyterian Churches in Houston are doing well. Our Episcopal brethren are without a pastor at present.

Texas has flattering prospects for a good crop.

The cause of Education is receiving a good deal of attention. Temperance principles are progressing. The friends of a prohibitory license law are increasing. The "Sons" and "Samaritans" are doing good.

Yours truly, J. B.

METHODIST PRESS.

The Chinese Rebellion.—The impression that the leader is well disposed to Christianity, grows. Some shrewd persons think it a mere ruse to engage the alliance of foreign Christian nations. But Dr. Medhurst has written from Shanghai that in the proclamations of Tein-Tey there are evident traces of the writer having been a member of Gutzlaff's Christian Union, in conformity with whose practice, he has throughout employed Thang-Te for God, by way of eminence, and the word Shin when speaking of the True God in opposition to false ones.

The Southern Advocate publishes extracts from a letter of Dr. Taylor, our Missionary, dated March 19, confirmatory of this view, and stating the condition, for the present, of missionaries there:

"The foreigners generally believe him to be the rightful heir to the throne from which his ancestors were driven by the Tartar conquest, and on this account, as well as for his approval of Christianity, wish him success. The people are in great trepidation, as is natural they should, but we all feel the most perfect security here, nor is there the slightest cause for alarm among us, for there are several British, American and French war steamers here, well armed and manned.

"If you have any new missionaries ready to send, don't let them delay from 'rumors of wars,' for it is confidently expected that the crisis will be past in a few months, and should it not, we can still labor here as well as ever."

The Christian Observer has been discontinued for the present. The last number (May 4) states that the Publishing Committee will proceed with the publication, as soon as arrangements can be effected. This organ is needed in that place. The Observer publishes appointments for Bishop Soule on every Sabbath till July. The appointments embrace all the prominent places in the Golden Land. The Church will be happy to learn that the Senior Bishop's health is good, and he is still itinerating.

Signs of a Revival.—The Nashville Advocate gives the signs, in a charge of that city, that a Church blessing was at hand:

"An official brother of that charge says he thinks there will be a glorious revival, for the following reasons:

"1. There is peace and universal friendship among the members.

"2. Their class-meetings are well attended, and are very pleasant and profitable.

"3. Their Sunday School is in a most flourishing condition.

"Well, if these things all be true, we have no doubt a gracious revival of God's work will be witnessed at Andrew Church.—Amen!"

Close Corporations.—The Christian Advocate and Journal gives an editorial explanatory of a correspondent, who has charged the defection of so many clergymen of certain Protestant Churches, and their going over to Rome, upon the fact that these Churches hold, in common with the Roman Catholic Church, that Christ and his apostles constituted an ecclesiastical corporation of ministers, with the exclusive right to preach the gospel authoritatively, to administer the sacraments, and to perpetuate their corporation by ordaining other ministers successively in all ages to come, with the same exclusive corporate rights. So that no one, whatever be his qualifications, has a right to preach the gospel, or exercise any function of the ministry, unless he derive his authority from this ecclesiastical corporation.

The writer argues, and the editor agrees, and we agree with both, that whoever adopts this theory of the Christian ministry, has not far to go to get to Rome; and if he acts consistently, will be led to do so, as the "regular succession" of the Romanist clergy is admitted by themselves, while the Church of Rome denies that any of the Protestant ministry have "the true apostolic succession." If, therefore, this "succession" be admitted to be essential to a valid ministry, it is natural that those who think so should seek it where they are sure of finding it. Thus Protestants have made a bridge to Rome.

In this connexion is given a brief definition of Methodist doctrine on an important point:

"The holy Spirit calls individuals, by an inward impression on the consciousness of the person so called, to preach the gospel, and if faithful to the calling, imparts special gifts and grace for the work. This is Methodist doctrine; and the Methodists, both in Europe and America, have acted upon it from their origin until now; and there is no doctrine or religious opinion of Methodism to which we more fully subscribe. We go further, and contend that this is the only Scriptural door to the gospel ministry—that he who entereth not in by this door, but climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber."

Enlargement.—The Holston Advocate has been enlarged by four additional columns.

Theological Seminaries.—A sensible correspondent of the Richmond Advocate says:

"Many seem to think the time has arrived when the ministry must strike their tents, and move in advance of the swelling, heaving tide of humanity, to control and guide its eventful issues. Theological Seminaries have hitherto exhibited many an unlovely aspect to the jealous eye of our fathers in the ministry and in the Church. The evils of which religion herself has been made the occasion, are truly to be deplored; but surely religion must not, therefore, be abandoned. So the 'signs of the times' seem now to indicate that the great interests of our Zion cannot be fully and successfully met, unless our Church make a more ample provision for the special and fuller training of her ministers. The people are beginning to think that there would be no impropriety in having such a department connected with our religious colleges, so that our sons, who might feel they were truly called to preach the gospel of Christ, could have the opportunity, at least, of receiving more or less preparatory training for the regular ministry. The crisis of our destiny as a Church seems to be near."

But in the same paper is a series of articles by a prominent member of the Virginia Conference, headed "Theological Seminaries to be Watched." His warning is—that this Seminary is likely to control the Church, and not the Church the Seminary. Good warning that, and it should be looked after well when we lay the foundation of the first one. The following paragraph gives an idea of his suspicions:

"The seminaries, having the distinguished scholars, the book writers, the review editors, the large libraries, and more than all, the educating of the ministers, they will gradually (unless watched) rise to the first power in the Church, and infuse their spirit into the remotest extremities of the body. The people who look to the ministers, and find them drawing their life from the seminaries, naturally imbibe of the same current. The opinions and the pronunciamentos of the seminary aristocracy will outweigh all other decisions and enactments; and woe be the wight who then sets his face against the current!"

Spiritual Weakness.—It is easier and a shorter method to cut off a diseased limb than have the care of it—the dressing, and poulticing, and curing. Some shepherds are lax of discipline—too lax. And there is an opposite extreme, likewise hurtful to the Body of Christ. (Gal. 6: 1.) would save many a weak member—"Brethren, if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual restore such a one in the spirit of meekness." These thoughts are suggested to us by the remarks of the Memphis Advocate, under the above heading:

"Frequently, indeed, it may be that one who comes much below the standard of external piety of many of the brethren with whom he associates, is making greater exertions, praying more fervently, than any of them, in order to overcome in the conflicts of the spiritual life, and maintain his allegiance to God. In the midst of his severe and untold struggles, which his God alone has seen, to come upon such a one with the harsh countenance and stern rebuke of a tithing Pharisee, often results in quenching his glimmering hope, and crushing his noble exertions in despair. What he needs is instruction, comfort, encouragement—not stern, unfeeling rebuke. Rebuke is for the obstinate and slothful. He is neither; but humbly, and in bitterness of spirit, is seeking to overmaster his nature. He is drinking already enough of the gall and wormwood of moral conflict. One smile of encouragement, one cheering word bidding him to hope, one tear of sympathy, one affectionate word of tender advice, will effect more in his case than volleys of expostulation."

Poetry.—The North-Western Christian Advocate, in an article on "Communications," has the following touch on writing poetry:

"Avoid writing poetry unless you are quite sure you cannot help it. If you write poetry out of self-defence, possibly it may be worth printing. If it be quite easy, or very hard work, to write poetry, by all means eschew it. In the first case it is to be considered proof positive that you have mistaken the hideous skeleton of poetry for a living, godly child of the Muse; and in the other case, poetry produced with much labor, will seldom be read with much pleasure, nor will it pay as well as prose, in these days, when poetry is at such discount, and when there is really good poetry enough in the world to answer its wants for seven ages to come."

ERRATA.

Bro. McTyeire:—In my S. S. Report, in your paper of the 4th instant, there are several errors. For instance, "I have lately seen a mother, in full communion and fellowship in the Church, and the daughter of Methodist parents, who were also present, engaged in card playing before a large and promiscuous crowd on board a steamboat." As printed, this sentence tells what is not the truth, exactly. Put the "the" before "Church," in italics, so as to indicate a member of the P. Episcopal Church, and the truth will then be told. The Episcopalian mother was playing cards with a daughter of Methodist parents—the Methodist parents were present. Your types make me say, "A boy who was thirteen years old, nine years ago, is in his twenty-first now." Nine and thirteen—twenty-one! Well, do you call that Matthew Matics? Where it reads, as printed, "It cannot be conceded," it should have been cannot be denied. Where it reads "lily," it ought to be little. Where I wanted it to owe, the types have it "owing."

J. S. Hughes.

P. S. I kept the Report on hand near a month, in order to re-write, revise and correct; but owing to two week's absence from the city, and a press of business when I returned, it was not done. I am sorry for it. I am not out of temper, Mr. Editor, with your good printers; noble fellows, they are. God bless the printers. Without them the world would turn backwards. I have read "proof" and "inked the type" for them many a night—all night. But the errors in my printed report afflict me. J. S. H.

[Our printers think Bro. Hughes is not used to skianing, and that he ought to be before permitting "a press of business" to keep him from revising and correcting for the Press. For our part, we think he got off very well. When we do so, we always fare worse. Ed.]

DEFENDERS OF THE FAITH.

A late letter of the Holy Father to the refractory clery of France (of which our neighbor, the Messenger, gives us a copy,) speaks of that graceless, lewd fellow, Louis Napoleon, most endearingly—"Our very dear son in Jesus Christ"!!

Last month a measure was introduced into Parliament providing for the inspection of nunneries, for the benefit of any females who might be forcibly detained there. This brought out, as defender of the faith, another "very dear son." The London Leader hits off the scene:

"At the Thursday sitting, May 12, at about one in the morning, when all the business was over; when Secretary Wilson had his hand on the peak of his hat, about to take it off, and wink at the Speaker—which is motion of adjournment—when only about seven members were left, a gentleman arrived in, lurched about, and took his stand in the middle of the floor. 'Miether Speaker, Surr.' All eyes were on the voice and reeling figure; a dead amazement crept over the faces of the seven members, and Secretary Wilson removed his hand and shut his hat. The voice was undoubtedly in the possession of the floor—it was a matter of calculation when it would take possession, horizontally, of the said floor. 'Surr,' said it again, and the Speaker said, 'Order, order,' in faint and appalled terms; and the eyes of the seven members and of the thin galleries were on the gentleman in the staggering voice. He could not get beyond the exordium of his oration. What was it?—has anything serious happened?—for one did not know at first whether it was drink or agitation which affected the orator. Something came at last. 'Surr, the bill (stegger)—inspection of—(stagger)—honorable gentleman—in his place—nuns, (stagger,)—I'm a Catholic—want to know—when will it come on?—consider,' (stagger) and sits down.) It was only a 'question' of the drunken gentleman wasted Mr. Chambers to say when he would face the government again with his bill for the inspection of conventual establishments. Mr. T. Chambers answered, with extreme politeness. Then the voice staggered again 'in reply.' 'Surr—(stagger)—Roman religion—(stagger)—insult to—land;' and the voice and the man drew again, and Mr. Wilson opened his eyes, took off his hat, winked, and the house adjourned. The drunken gentleman was an Irishman, of the essentially 'religious' section of the Irish representation; and rather a disputed by the priests."

Panting after Holiness.

I remember the thoughts I used to have of holiness, and said, sometimes, to myself, I do certainly know that I love holiness such as the Gospel prescribes. It appeared to me that there was nothing in it but was ravishingly lovely; the highest beauty and amiableness—a divine beauty; far more than any thing here upon earth; and any thing else was like mere defilement in comparison to it.

Holiness, as I then wrote down some of my contemplations on it, appeared to me to be of a sweet, pleasant, charming, serene, delightful nature, which brought an inexpressible purity, brightness, peacefulness, and ravishment to the soul. In other words, that it made the soul like a field or garden of God, full of all manner of pleasant flowers, enjoying sweet calm, and gently vivifying beams of the sun. The soul of a true Christian, as I then wrote my meditations, appeared to me to be such a little white flower as we see in the spring of the year, low and humble on the ground, opening its bosom to receive the pleasant beams of the sun's glory; rejoicing as it were, in a calm rapture; diffusing around a sweet fragrancy; standing prettily and lovingly in the midst of others round about; all, in like manner, opening their bosoms, to drink in the light of the sun. There was no part of creature-holiness that I had so great a sense of as its loveliness, as beauty, brokenness of heart, and purity of mind; and there was nothing that I so earnestly longed for. My heart panted after this divine life before God, as in the dust; that I might be nothing, and that God might be all in all; that I might become as a little child. [President Edwards.

A Noble Deed Renewed.—Some years ago the Morris Chapel Sunday School of Cincinnati resolved to raise three hundred dollars a year, as the support of an unmarried missionary in Germany, and also to provide an outfit. This pledge they have redeemed, and now they resolve to do the same for the support of an unmarried missionary in France. We do not doubt but this noble Sunday School of Morris Chapel will not only accomplish their purpose, and that their example will provoke others to move forward as generous competitors in the glorious work of missions. "Let me Sleep."—"Let me sleep," said a companion, half pettishly turning from the couch. "Let me sleep." The words haunted my memory for hours afterwards. How often has the wish been breathed in this weary world, "O, let me sleep."

The man whose conscience lashes him for deeds—evils committed and unrepented of cries, as he drops his head into his thorny pillow—"Let me sleep!—with sleep comes oblivion." The mourner, who has seen some tender bud beautiful one fade from his embrace, as the summer flower nipped by a too early frost, bows his head above the pallid face of the precious form below him, and sighs, in the agony of his soul—"Let me sleep!—sleep with the love whose smile shall never welcome my footsteps more."

"Let me sleep," says the traveler, who, sore and weary, has toiled long in the way and seen hopes perish unfulfilled, joys wane ere they are tasted, friendships which he had endeared, changing hue like chameleons, rainbow promises fading and melting into the cheerless air—"O, let me sleep, for I am weary."

The rosy-cheeked child, the bright-eyed maiden, the thoughtful matron, those for whom life puts on its finest aspects, its most enchanting smiles, all have periods in which they long for sleep, for the oblivion of all care, hours in which the waters of Lethe may flow darkly and deeply over them.

There cometh a sleep unto all—a sleep deep, hushed, and breathless. The roar of the ocean, the deep-toned thunderbolt, the shock of an earthquake, or the rush of ten thousand armies cannot break up its still repose. The dumb lips and folded arms, one after another, of the ephemera of earth sink down into the calmness and nothingness. No disturbing force shall jar upon their rest, no disturbing noise shall wring from them there the exclamation, "Let me sleep."

Great Riot at Quebec—Attack on Gavazzi, the Anti-Catholic Lecturer, etc.—Quebec, June 8.—During the Lecture of Father Gavazzi in the Free Church, last night, while he was speaking that the inquisition had been extensively in Ireland by the agency of Ribboism, a man got up and exclaimed "It's a lie!" This appeared to be the signal for parties outside, for instantly a shower of stones rattled through the windows and a mob rushed into the church, armed with sticks and stones. They seized Gavazzi, who attempted to throw him over the pulpit, but he defended himself, and, after knocking down several of his assailants with a chair, was finally thrown over, but was rescued by his friends. His secretary was badly beaten, but he escaped with slight injury. A party of soldiers finally cleared the house. The mob afterwards went to the Parliament House, calling for as they called member named Brown, threatening vengeance upon him. Gavazzi is believed to be not seriously hurt.

Knight, the London publisher, has published during the last twenty years $80,000 to assist needy and literary men for their labors; and on their works, before they could be circulated, he was obliged to pay a tax or excise, in the shape of paper tax, $50,000. Here the British government levied $250,000 worth of tax on four hundred thousand worth of intellect and knowledge. [Boston Post.

HYMENEAL:

MARRIED—On the 9th June, by Rev. A. M. Powell, WILLIAM BALDWIN to Miss KATE MILLER, of Mobile, Ala.

OBITUARY:

DIED—At the residence of her son-in-law, Rev. P. Cooper, near Benton, Yazoo county, on the 13th of April, SARAH EPPS. Her maiden name was Finch. She was born on the 21 of August, 1779, in South Carolina; became a member of the M. E. Church in her fourteenth year, under the ministry of Bishop Asbury. In 1798, on the 25th October, she was united in marriage to James B. Epps, with whom she removed to Mississippi in 1820, and settled in Amite county; thence to Franklin county, where Bro. Epps died in 1834. Mother Epps professed sanctification twenty years after her conversion; the evidence of which she retained until her dying hour.

Such an instance of the power of sanctifying grace, as was exhibited in her life and death, I have seldom been permitted to witness. She seemed truly "to rejoice always," and possess that "hope that maketh not ashamed," the "love of God being shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Ghost." For weeks previous to her death she seemed to enjoy an unusual amount of divine love. Like the beloved disciple, her theme was the love of God to a sinful world. For 48 hours before she breathed her last, she appeared to become unconscious of the presence of friends, with the exception of a few of the family. But, though almost unconscious of all earthly things, her thoughts seemed to be engaged by the subject of religion, and she was fully alive to the interests of the great future. From her conversion she took great interest in the sacred and evangelical poetry of our excellent hymn books, and the singing of revival songs introduced among us; and during her apparent unconsciousness of external circumstances, she repeated many favorite stanzas and choruses of hymns and songs. The sentiment that seemed to be most consonant with her state of mind was found in that song, "I'll praise my Maker while I've breath," which she frequently repeated; and the last that fell from her dying lips were, "I'll praise him." Thus, peacefully and triumphantly, passed away from earth one of the most devoted saints I ever knew.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

MRS. MARGARET L. C. DICKSON.

On the 14th anniversary of her wedding day the stern monster claimed her as his own. The stroke of his ruthless scythe has gathered into the garner of the unknown, the industrious, frugal wife; the thoughtful, the kind mother; the affectionate sister; the loving and obedient daughter, and the kind neighbor. It is common for the pen of friendship to hallow the memory of the dead, and dress it up in colors not its own; but who that knew our departed one, will not say that the poor stale words of an obituary cannot do justice to her memory?

There was a peculiar charm about her that won the love of all who knew her. The urbanity of her manners was not reserved for a favored few, but all who came within the circle of her influence, felt the effects of her kindness—a kindness that aimed to make the poor, the awkward and the unfortunate to feel at ease, and to forget the misfortunes of life in her presence. And she was well repaid for her kind, self-sacrificing conduct, in the warm love she received from her very many acquaintances.

How can I write of thee, my friend and sister, when every word I say seems tame, and to all thy merits I must say they were?

Her illness was very short and severe. To those around her dying bed she said, "I must die," but they still hoped all yet might be well, and endeavored to prevent her conversing, thinking that she would agitate herself unnecessarily. She said, "I do not fear death, but I am almost gone; all my trust is in my Saviour." Oh! what a scene was that, when she took a "long farewell" of her heart-broken husband, her aged parents, her darling children, and the only sister who was favored to receive her last adieu! Blessed Saviour, guide all her friends aright to that world where adieus and farewells are sounds unknown.

Since she was 15 years of age she was a professor of religion, and her place in Church was never vacant, when it was in her power to fill it.

She, whom we all loved so dearly for the sweetness of her disposition, the kindness of her heart, the sincerity of her friendship, the geniality of her disposition, the gentleness of her deportment, the depth and fervency of her love, her many virtues, and rare accomplishments, has gone forever from us. Her grave has been made, and its clods have been moistened with tears of her aged parents, her grief-stricken husband, her disconsolate sisters and poor little children. Her home, which but a short time since was the scene of cheerfulness and happiness, is now the abods of grief and sadness. The smile which so oft has made the hearts around her fireside glad, will be seen no more; and the voice, which sounded sweet as music, is hushed forever.

Time alone can fill the void her death has made, and heal the wounded and bruised hearts of her sorely afflicted relations. Let us submit meekly to the will of an all-good God, and kiss the rod with which he has afflicted us, and live on in the glorious hope of finally joining her in the abodes of the ever blessed, where the sad wailings of sorrow are not, and the lamentations of death unknown. She will meet us with a smile and welcome us with a song.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.—Much excitement was caused in the early part of the week, by the detection of a feeble plot for servile insurrection. As usual there has been a great deal of exaggeration. The Court examination of Wednesday, as given below by a daily paper, presents the evidence and state of the case thus far. It shows there has been some tampering with slaves by abolitionists. Further examination has been postponed to next week.

THE GREAT NEGRO WAR—Startling Developments!—Last evening, James Dyson, the keeper of the free negro school heretofore mentioned, was brought before Recorder Winter to undergo examination on the charge of having set on foot an insurrection of the slaves, which was to have broken out on Tuesday morning last. Several witnesses were examined, whose testimony we give, leaving our readers to draw their own conclusions. Dyson was remanded to jail. His examination will be resumed this morning.

Geo. Wright, f. m. c., sworn—I was born in Orange county, Virginia. On the first of next March I will be fifty-seven years old. On the first of last March I bought myself from Mrs. Oxley, thirty miles above the city of New Orleans, who was my owner. Ever since I bought myself and became free, I have been living with Mr. Dubois, who keeps the Tattersalls Livery Stables, on St Charles street. I drive one of his carriages, and wait on him as his private servant. On last Sunday morning, between 10 and 11 o'clock, while walking along Customhouse street, between Dauphin and Burgundy streets, I was met by a quadroon, or light mulatto man, who asked me if my name was not George Wright. I told him yes. Then he remarked that he would like me to go down to a little church with him, where he had some business for me. On our way we met Albert, a slave of Dr Rushton, and the other man whom I did not know told me Albert would take me down, and let me know all about it, and bit us. I knew Albert and went with him. I had known him for the last eight or ten years. It was near the corner of Rampart and Canal streets, on Rampart street, that I met Albert, who looked as if he had sent for me. He addressed me with the usual courtesies of life, and asked me to walk along with him.

I went to the school-house on Franklin street. I think, in the Second District, below Canal street, and was there introduced to a white man whom he called Dyson, who kept the school. There were no others present but us three. As soon as Albert introduced us he left. When he left I went into the school-house with this Mr. Dyson, which room was filled with forms and desks like other school-rooms. Mr Dyson asked me to sit down, which I did, and then, after interrogating me as to where I was from, and how long I had been in the country, then asked me where was my family, and whether or not they were slaves. I told him that my family was about thirty miles above here, at Mrs Oxley's plantation, that I owned not a wife and eight children, and that they were all slaves. He then asked me if I did not want to free them. I replied that I did, if I had the means. At once then, and without suggestion from me, he said, "I will show you a plan we can adopt without your paying a dime. I have got the plan laid out for everything how we shall take the place." He then went to a chair which was laid on a bench, and lifting it up, took a paper lying there, and came and sat down by me, and read from it the names of all the streets where the armories, arsenals and magazines were. "Now," said he, "you see all the plans. I am to go in the front," and all the people he had below, to wit: one hundred white men, and all the colored people, were to go with him.

He said the white men were all assembled together in a room below, and the colored people all down the coast. That agents were there and had fixed everything. First, they were to take the magazine where all the powder is (I do not know whether he meant on the other side of the river or on this side). When he got the powder he said he would be safe. Then he would put one hundred men at the Mint, one hundred at the Parish Prison to open it and let the prisoners out, and forty or fifty men at each corner of the city to fire the city. Whilst the fire was raging they were to break open the armories, arsenal and gun stores, and get all the arms they could. They were also to break open and rob the banks. He said they had crowbars and every thing they wanted. The prisons were to be opened and the Mint attacked first. The people on the plantations, who were armed with cane knives, axes, old hatchets, etc., were to rise and come to the city. He did not tell me the signal to rise, for they were to come into the city cautiously; but when the fires took place they were generally to move and attack the people and destroy all before them opposing them. This was about all he told me. I answered, very well, I'll be in the party, and then left him. He seemed to be satisfied. I was identified with the move and as one of the party.

Nothing occurred until the next day, about half-past 11 o'clock, when, on going up Carondelet street, I met Albert, who said, "Well, Wright, what's the times?" I said, "First rate." He then said, "What satisfaction did the old man give you?" This struck me, and I sought to learn more. He said, "I intend to go in it deeply." I told him to had better give it up. He said, "No, I'll be damned if I don't go in it deeply." I told him I would not hear to it, and left him. About 9 o'clock that evening I met him at the corner of Canal and Bourbon streets, and he asked me to go with him in a cab and let him show me one of the gun stores he intended to break open. I said to myself I would follow him till day.

Then he went to the corner of Conde and some other street, some blocks below the old Cathedral, and bought the revolver, two pounds of bullets, a bullet-mould, and the powder and caps now here in court. The knife and sword in court he had in his room, as I suppose, as he did not buy them. His intention in going to the gun store was mainly to reconnoitre. When we returned to Canal street, he told me the movement would take place between twelve and one o'clock that night. I remarked that I must go to my room and arm myself, as I had plenty of arms at old master's room. I left him, being assured, in my own mind, from the conversation with Dyson, as well as him, that a movement would be made between midnight and daylight next morning. Immediately after leaving Albert's, I went direct to Mr. Dubois and reported to him all that occurred, because he had always been a good friend of mine, and I did not wish him sacrificed. I looked upon the scheme as bloody and outrageous. Mr. Dubois sent for Lieut. Petrie of the police, who came, and I told him all about it.

Lieut. Petrie then took me with him to each of the Police Stations of the Second and Third Districts, and gave them the information which I had given him. When we came up town again we met the Chief of Police, Mr. O'Leary, who got in the cab with us, and we went down to Mr. Kuehnen's, on Dauphin street, where Albert lived. The Chief and Lieutenant got out there and concealed themselves, they having previously armed me with a sword and a pistol each. I rung the bell at the door as previously agreed to between Albert and I. He let me in, and after conversing a little while I told him I had a cab in readiness, and he told me to bring it up and we would move off to Carrollton, where he was to meet forces. I did so. The cab came up to the door. Albert came out and we got in it and drove away. After we had driven half a block, we were hailed, and the Chief and Lieutenant came up, one on each side, the Chief presenting a gun and the Lieut. jumping into the cab. Albert attempted to draw his knife on the Lieutenant, who wrested it from him while the Chief's gun was pointing at us.

Both of us were arrested, and I was released an hour or so afterwards. While in prison Albert said he did not know how the d——l it leaked out unless the cab driver told of it. He wished he had gone off earlier; all his friends had gone down the coast and were fighting like soldiers. If he had shed blood in the cause he would not have minded the arrest. He further said, one of Mr. Gerdes's servants had gone down; wherefore I, deponent, charge said James Dyson with having feloniously, wilfully, by words, actions and writings, and in other manner, persuaded, encouraged and advised deponent and slaves, as he verily believes, in this district and city, and elsewhere in this State, to insurrection against the lawful proprietors and against the white inhabitants of the State, in contravention of the statutes in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the State of Louisiana.

Michael Mettill sworn. Testified—I am a fisherman; I have a fishing boat in the Mississippi river, where I catch fish for the market; I was in my boat at the bar next to the ferry wharf, Second District, when one James Dyson, the prisoner, came to me and bargained for my boat, and agreed to give me $5 to take him and five negroes down to Judge Morgan's plantation. This was at 12 o'clock M., on last Monday, and at about half-past five o'clock that evening he came with only two negroes. He told me to have no one in the boat but myself, as the negroes he would bring with him would help me. They brought to the skiff three bags. One of these was very heavy and they let it fall in the boat; I felt it and believe it to have been filled with ball cartridge. They had also, wrapped up in paper, all except the stocks, two guns, which called fusils. The man Dyson was armed with pistols. Having arrived at the plantation, Dyson inquired of one of the negroes how far it was to the sugar-house. He replied "about three quarters of a mile."

This negro and Dyson then got out of the boat and went off. The other negro, who they called Edward, remained in the boat in charge of the bags. Whilst Dyson and this other negro was gone, three negroes came down the Levee towards the boat with liquor. Edward hailed them and said, "Good evening, gentlemen, have any of you got a pipe, I want to smoke very bad." They asked him to take a drink which he declined. Edward then said, "Which is the man Cooper?" (It was supposed by witness that "Cooper" was a pass-word or countersign.) "I am the man Cooper," said one of them. "Well, I knew the man called Cooper before," said Edward. "I am a better man than that Cooper you know," said the negro to the Levee. "I hope you may prove to be a better man," said Edward.

They then went off a short distance and talked together for about half an hour, when Edward came back and laid down in the boat. About two hours after this, other freshly dressed negroes, having on white pantaloons, white vests and black cravats, came out of the cane-brake with Dyson, and took the bags and contents and arms away. Dyson ordered Edward back into the boat, remarking that he had other arms, but necessity might not require him to use them. Then he got into the boat and told one to pull away for the city. We arrived in the city, at a Sawmill and Sugar Refinery, in the lower part of the Third District, about a quarter to five o'clock in the morning. He, Dyson, then asked me if he could always find me still at the same place he found me, as he wanted to go to the Powder-house one of these days. He and the negroes then left me.

The St. Landry Whig of the 11th says: We have learned from good authority, that on Saturday morning (the 4th inst.,) the dwelling house of Hr. A. Cannon, in the neighborhood of Bayou Chicot in this Parish, was entirely consumed by fire. We did not hear the particulars of this distressing affair; but we were informed that the fire caught from a candle which had been left burning near the unplastered lathing of one of the upper rooms.

The Point Coupee Echo of the 11th says: The weather during the present week has been remarkable for the season. The mornings have been quite cool, so much so as to make a thick coat at times quite endurable. It is, however, though rather too dry, favorable to the growing crop.

From the same we clip the following: A gentleman of this parish, who is in the habit of lending money at interest, lately made the remark, that during the present year very few, if any, applications had been made to him for loans. We chronicle this observation as evidence of the present prosperity of the planting interest in our parish.

The Southern Mirror, published at Jackson, says: "The ground was dry when June came in, and June came in like a furnace and continues to glow with the most intense heat. The gardens in this vicinity are burning up, the corn begins to suffer, though the cotton seems yet to be doing well."

The election for Mayor in Clinton between Messrs. Bell and Hatch resulted in a tie vote, each receiving 62. A new election has been ordered. Some persons set but a small value on the importance of one vote.

ALABAMA NEWS.—Colonel Earnest, who announced himself a candidate for Governor, subject to the decision of a Whig State Convention, but whose claims were passed over by that body, made a speech in Talladega on the 1st inst. He took strong ground in favor of State aid in internal improvements.

The Selma Sentinel is pleased to learn that the Southern Railroad Company, running from Brandon, Mississippi, to Alabama, to connect with the Alabama and Mississippi River Railroad Company, are up and doing.

The Montgomery Journal of Wednesday says: The Artesian well on Court-house Square has reached a depth of 475 feet. The water now flows from the top, running a stream of about two gallons a minute. The water is excellent, and (which is somewhat unusual at that depth) as cool as ordinary well water. The workmen are now drilling through a rock, below which the skill superintendent has strong hopes that a copious supply of the genuine fluid will be found.

TWO DEATHS BY DROWNING.—It becomes our duty this morning to make record of a most painful occurrence which happened at our river on Sunday last. Two young boys, one a son of Mr. James McCottery, and the other a son of Mr. Jacob Reinman, went to the river with others, for the purpose of bathing. Young McCottery ventured out too far and could not regain the shore; consequently, sunk in deep water. Prompted by the noble and patriotic influence of his generous nature, young Reinman, who was the oldest of the two, rushed to the rescue of his suffering partner, and they both went down to a watery grave together. Every effort was made by the friends of the deceased boys to recover their bodies, but, up to a late hour on Sunday night, their exertions had proved of no avail. We deeply sympathize with the relatives of these young men in this their sudden affliction. [Natchez Courier, 14th.

The New York Tribune has some speculations on the Mesilla difficulty. The editor sees no cause for war, if the Government will but consent to observe act 21 of the treaty on which the "dispute" is founded—the treaty of peace made at the close of the last war—which stipulates that—

"If, unhappily, any disagreement should hereafter arise between the Governments of the two Republics, whether with respect to the interpretation of any stipulation in this treaty, or with respect to any other particular concerning the political or commercial relations of the two nations, a resort shall not be had to reprisals, aggression, or hostility of any kind, by the one Republic against the other, until the Government of that which deems itself aggrieved shall have maturely considered, in the spirit of peace and good neighborhood, whether it would not be better that it should be settled by the arbitration of commissioners appointed on each side, or by that of a friendly nation; and, should such course be proposed by either party, it shall be acceded to by the other, unless deemed by it altogether incompatible with the nature of the difference or the circumstances of the case."

According to this provision, the Tribune concludes that each Government is solemnly bound to respect temporarily the boundary which their two commissioners have agreed upon, so far as to keep its officers and troops within the limits thus assigned it, letting the nation that feels aggrieved by that boundary propose a new commission or foreign arbitration for the conclusive and binding settlement of the difference.

CURIOUS STATISTICS.—If the streets of London were put together, they would extend 3000 miles in length. The main thoroughfares are traversed by 3000 omnibuses and 3500 cabs, employing 40,000 horses. In 1845 the metropolis alone consumed 1,600,000 quarters of wheat, 240,000 bullocks, 1,700,000 sheep, 28,000 calves, and 35,000 pigs. One market alone supplied 4,021,400 head of game. London, in the same year, ate 3,000,000 salmon, which were washed down by 43,200,000 gallons of porter and ale, 2,000,000 gallons of spirits, and 65,000 pipes of wine. 13,000 cows are yearly required for London milk; and, reckoning two gallons a day from every cow, we have here 72,000 gallons of "London peculiar" consumed by the London inhabitants, 360,000 gaslights fringe the streets. London's arterial or water system supplies the enormous quantity of 44,383,328 gallons per day; a thousand snil are employed in bringing annually to London 3,000,000 tons of coal. They have no fewer than 23,517 tailors, 28,570 [illegible]kers, 40,000 milliners and dressmakers, [illegible] domestic servants.

The Mesilla Controversy.

Serious apprehensions are entertained in well informed circles, that the dispute growing out of the boundary line between this Government and Mexico may lead to open rupture between the two countries. Rumors flow in upon us thick and fast, and, rumor like, very contradictory. The telegraph informs us that instructions have been sent to Judge Conkling, the American Minister, to purchase all the Valley of the Gila, including the disputed territory; whilst the Washington Union, presumed to be the organ of our Administration, denounces the conduct of Gov. Trias, in taking military possession of Mesilla Valley, as insolent and foolish, and considers the armed occupation of that territory a violation of the rights of the United States and every principle of international law. Yet there may be no war. As the latest information upon this subject, and as much to be relied upon as any we have chronicled, we clip the following from "Ben's" letter to the Baltimore Sun, written under date of the 5th inst:

Measures have been taken to notify the Mexican Government that their military occupation of the Mesilla Valley must be abandoned, and that they will not be permitted to exercise any jurisdiction in that territory. If Mexico shall comply with this reasonable demand, there will be no danger of a war: at all events, it is a very prudent step on the part of our Government to proffer negotiation first, even while they prepare for the alternative of war.

If Mexico should withdraw her forces and authorities from the disputed territory, and consent to have the line run over again, and fixed according to the views of the present Administration, no war can arise from that source. But if Santa Anna should refuse to give up all the points in dispute, a collision must soon occur.

It is supposed by some that Santa Anna and the mass of the Mexican people desire another war. If so they can be accommodated.

General Garland will not have more than three or four hundred troops with him in his expedition to the Mesilla, but, if need be, he can soon be reinforced by volunteers from the neighboring States.

There may be some use for the navy, in case of another war, and even in a Mexican war, should Santa Anna succeed in obtaining foreign alliances. It is, therefore, suggested that the Japan expedition must be recalled, and another ordered to the Pacific shore for the protection of our California commerce. It might be well, too, to follow the example of the British and French Governments, and convert some of our sailing frigates into steam propellers. It will be very necessary to maintain an uninterrupted commerce with California, in case of a war, because war is bad enough when unaccompanied with a general commercial pressure and financial embarrassments.

Later from Mexico.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP TEXAS—Death the Secretary of Foreign Affairs, etc., etc.—By the arrival of the steamship Texas, on Saturday, we are placed in possession of dates from Vera Cruz to the 8th, and from the City of Mexico to the 4th instant.

The news is important, not the least interesting item of which is the death of Senor Lucas Alaman, Secretary of Foreign Affairs. As the leader of the conservative party, his death caused great sensation as soon as announced. His death took place at the Capital, on the morning of the 2d instant, and the papers are filled with the most laudatory obituaries of the deceased. Senor Alaman was buried on the 3d, in the Church of Jesus of Nazareth. A large concourse of people was present, and apparently impressed with the solemnity of the ceremonies.

The Universal, of the 4th, says that it has just been assured that the person appointed by Santa Anna to succeed Senor Alaman in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, is D. Manuel Diez de Bonilla, and congratulates the country on the choice of such a man for that important post.

Two persons, named Aparicio Gonzalez and Carlos Centeno, were shot at Vera Cruz on the 28th ult., for having been found during the revolt there opposing the regular troops, arms in hand. Gonzalez was one of the leaders of the revolt. The other, Victoria Valle, was spared because he surrendered himself under the conditions of a momentary armistice.

The Mexican foreign legations have been finally officially announced as follows: London, Minister, Senor Lanzes; Paris, Minister, Senor Pacheco; Madrid, Minister, Senor Vivo; Berlin, Minister, Gen. Uraga; Rome, Minister, Senor Lerrainzar; Washington City, Minister, Gen. Almonte; Secretory, Senor Gozanles de la Vega; Attache, Senor Gregorio Barandioran.

A decree repeals that of the 24th of January, by which Cevallos had reduced to four per cent. the duty of exportation on coin. The duty of six per cent. is, therefore, restored.

The Government was much occupied with the tariff question. Their determination on the subject was to have been promulgated on the 4th inst., but nothing was known of the result of their deliberations.

The Trait d'Union says that the sum of $20,000 has been raised by private subscription in Chihuahua, to aid Gov. Trias in preparing for the defence of the Valley of Mesilla against American invasion.

The town of Lagos was, on the 10th ult., pillaged by a band of eighty robbers. After overpowering the garrison of thirty men, they broke open the jail, liberated all the prisoners, and in conjunction with them, plundered the town during two hours.

Private letters state the number of persons killed in the late revolt at Vera Cruz to have been 70, and 120 wounded. Many prisoners were made by the troops.

The Mexican papers refer to the speech made at New York by Commissioner Hartlott, as a proof of their right of ownership of the Valley of Mesilla.

The Indians are as active as ever in their depredations. Durango and Nueva Leon seem to be their headquarters.

The establishment of a Minister at Guatemala is spoken of. The salary of the Minister to London was been raised to $15,000 per annum.

The tobacco monopoly is to be taken out of private hands, and administered by Government.

The decree against the press has killed off nearly all the journals in the country.

THE NEGRO EXODUS.—In consequence of the rigid enforcement of the 18th article of the new Constitution of Indiana, the black population of that State are leaving in hundreds for quarters recently vacated in the Eastern States. The Cincinnati Commercial of the 8th inst., says:

We scarcely pass along the landing in these long June days without observing ons or more negro families with their household "plunder" recently landed from some of the lower river or Madison steamers. Becoming a little curious with regard to this new feature in African movements, we made enquiry and found that they were moving from Indiana in consequence of the severe enactments of the Legislature enforcing the 18th article of the new Constitution of that State. All persons whose mothers are unable to prove the possession of a greater proportion than one-eighteenth of European blood, and who came into Hoosierdom since November 1, 1851, are forced to take up their beds—if they have any—and walk. All negroes, mulattoes, quadroons, octageroons, duodecaroons, etc., who can prove a residence in the State prior to Nov. 1, 1851, are allowed to remain under certain conditions and by registering their names with the County Clerk. Any person who employs a negro who is in the State, contrary to the new law, is liable to a fine of not less than ten nor more than five hundred dollars.

The families we observed appeared to be people of some property, and brought with them a fine stock of horses, mules and milch cows.

GREAT SALE OF MULES IN KENTUCKY.—On the 28th ult. T. F. Marr, of Scott county, Kentucky, sold to H. T. Wilson, of Bourbon county, Kentucky, one hundred and ten mules, at the average price of $150 each. These mules were two years old, and their average height was fifteen hands three inches. Good mules and good prices! We found the account of this sale in Herald of June 2.

Later from Buenos Ayres.

BOSTON, June 14.

By an arrival here to-day dates have been received from Buenos Ayres to the 24th April. These advices show no improvement in the state of affairs on the La Plata. All attempts at accommodation have failed, and the Government was making vigorous preparations for the defence of Buenos Ayres. Twelve millions of paper money had been issued, and martial law proclaimed. The Custom-house was closed. Urquiza commenced the siege of the city on the 15th, and threatens to blockade the port. Bloody work is expected.

Latest from China.

NEW YORK, June 14.

The commander of the British naval forces on the coast of China, after the fall of Nankin, refused to allow any British vessel to ascend the river to that city, with stores for either the insurgents or those friendly to the Government.

Later from Buenos Ayres.

NEW YORK, June 15.

Later advices from Buenos Ayres state that on the 17th of April an engagement took place between the squadron of Urquiza, consisting of several steamers, and that of the Buenos Ayrean Government. The action lasted two hours, and resulted in the capture of two of the best of the Buenos Ayrean vessels. Many were wounded, but only twelve were reported killed on the part of the Buenos Ayreans. It was reported that Buenos Ayres had accepted the mediation of the Brazilian and Bolivian Ministers, with the desire to bring the difficulties with Urquiza to an accommodation. In the meantime Urquiza was collecting stores, and making preparations for the blockade of Buenos Ayres.

Purchase of Mount Vernon.

WASHINGTON, June 15.

The National Intelligencer of this morning confirms the report of the sale of Mount Vernon. The purchasers are a company of Northern and Southern capitalists, and the sum to be paid is two hundred thousand dollars. Among the conditions of the sale are, that Washington's remains shall not be removed, and that the Government of the United States shall have the privilege of repurchasing the property.

Railroad Tax In Vicksburg.

VICKSBURG, June 15.

The vote was taken here to-day on the subject of subscribing one hundred and sixty-eight thousand dollars, to be raised by a tax, for the Southern Railroad stock. The result is largely in favor of the tax and subscription, the vote standing as follows: In favor 321; against 122. The vote polled was quite small.

MANNING THE BRITISH NAVY.—A bill has been introduced into the House of Commons repealing so much of the Navigation Act of 1849 as requires three-fourths of the crew of every ship bearing the flag of England to consist of British subjects. With a view to the future efficiency of the British Navy, it is proposed to enlist boys at the age of fourteen, who, after serving until they are eighteen, are to be further engaged for ten years' continuous and general service. The seamen already serving, whether in British ships of war or the merchant navy, will be allowed to re-enter, or to enter for the first time under the new arrangement. The pay of an able seaman at present is 1s. 4d. sterling a day; of an ordinary seaman, 1s. 1d.; and, what we call second class ordinaries, in fact landsmen, 11d. The proposed increase is, in A 1's, 3d. a day. The pay of an able seaman in the navy, under the proposed increase, would be £2 7s. 6d. per thirty days, or the calendar month.

A good conscience is more to be desired than all the riches of the East. How sweet are the slumbers of him who can lie down on his pillow and review the transactions of every day, without condemning himself! A good conscience is the finest opiate.

BARNUM'S LAST—A Bearded Lady.—There is now on exhibition at Barnum's Museum, in New York, a lady of Geneva, who sports a beard that many smooth-faced gents might envy. It is a privilege accorded to visitors to pull it, and satisfy themselves it is not artificial. The Evening Post says:

"She is a Swiss lady, twenty-three years of age, and with a face covered up to the eyes with a luxuriant growth of hair. Both in this country and in Europe she has been an object of peculiar interest to the medical profession. She is the mother of two children, one of whom, a boy of not a year old, is said to exhibit a tendency similar to his mother. It was our privilege, in common with other members of the press, to test the reality of this beard by the decisive experiment, viz: pulling it, and we can testify that it is a genuine outgrowth, resembling in silkiness and abundance the imaginary crop which is promised from the use of the various hair invigorators which are in such common request. She has never used the razor except immediately under the eyes, and no beard has ever grown upon the upper lip."

THE AMAZON RIVER.—An interesting item of late intelligence from Peru, contained in the Panama Herald of the 6th instant, is the following:

The President of Peru has issued a most important decree relative to the navigation of the Amazon, and offering the greatest encouragement to settlers—such as exemption from export and import duties, grants of land, and freedom from taxation for twenty years, the free grant of seeds, implements for cultivating the land, etc. The exploration of the branches of

THE IVY IN THE DUNGEON.

BY CHARLES MACKAY.

The ivy in the dungeon grew;
Unfed by rain, uncheered by dew,
Its pallid leaflets only drank
Cave-moisture foul and odors dank.

But through the dungeon grating high
There fell a sunbeam from the sky;
It slept upon the grateful floor
In silent gladness evermore.

The ivy felt a tremor shoot
Through all its fibres to the root:
It felt the light, it saw the ray,
It strove to blossom into day.

It grew, it crept, it pushed, it climb;
Long had the darkness been its home;
But well it knew, though veiled in night,
The goodness and the joy of light.

Its clinging roots grew deep and strong;
Its stem expanded firm and long,
And in the currents of the air
Its tender branches flourished fair.

It reached the beam—it thrilled, it carried;
It blessed the warmth that cheers the world:
It rose toward the dungeon bars;
It looked upon the sun and stars.

It felt the life of bursting Spring;
It heard the happy skylark sing;
It caught the breath of morns and eves
And pecked the swallow to its leaves.

By rains, and dews, and sunshine fed,
Over the outer walls it spread,
And in the day-beam waving free,
It grew into a steadfast tree.

Upon that solitary piece
Its verdure threw adorning grace;
The lonely birds became its guests,
And sang its praises from their nests.

Would'st know the moral of the rhyme?
Behold the Heavenly Light, and climb:
To every dungeon comes a ray
Of God's interminable day.

THE WELL IN THE WILDERNESS.

A TALE OF THE PRAIRIE.

In vain you urge me to forget
That fearful night—it haunts me yet:
And stamps into my heart and brain
The awful memory will remain;
Yes, e'en in sleep that ghastly sight
Returns to shake my soul each night.

Richard Steel was the son of one of those emell landlords who are fast disappearing from Merry Old England. His father left him the sole possession of twenty-five acres of arable land, and a snug little cottage, which had descended from father to son, through many generations.

The ground plot, which had been sufficient to maintain his honest progenitors for several ages, in the palmy days of Britain's glory and independence, ere her vast resources passed into the hands of the few, and left the many to starve, was not enough to provide for the wants of our stout yeoman and his family, which consisted at that period of three sons and one daughter, a lovely, blooming girl of ten years, or thereabouts. Richard and his boys toiled with unceasing diligence; the wife was up late and early, and not one moment was left unemployed; and yet they made no headway, but every succeeding year found them in arrears.

"Jane," said the yeoman one evening, thoughtfully, to his wife, after having blessed his homely meal of skimmed milk and brown bread, "couldst thee not have given us a little treat to-night? Hast thee forgotten that it is our Annie's birth-day?"

"No, Richard, I have not forgotten; how could I forget the anniversary of the day that made us all so happy? But times are bad; I could not spare the money to buy sugar and plums for the cake; and I wanted to sell all the butter, in order to scrape together enough to pay the shoemaker for making our darling's shoes. Annie knows that she is infinitely dear to us all, though we cannot give her luxuries to prove it."

"It wants no proof, dear mother," said the young girl, flinging her round, but sun-burnt arms about her parent's neck. "Your precious love is worth the wealth of the whole world to me. I know how fond you and dear father are of me, and I am more than satisfied."

"Annie is right," said Steel, dropping his knife and holding out his arms for a caress. "The world could not purchase such love as we feel for her; and let us bless God that, poor though we be, we are all here to-night, well and strong, aye, and rich, in spite of our homely fare, in each other's affections. What say you, my boys?" And he glanced with parental pride on three fine lads, whose healthy and honest countenances might well be contemplated with pleasure, and afford subjects for hopeful anticipations for the future.

"We are happy, father," said the eldest, cheerfully.

"The cakes and spiced ale would have made us happier," said the second. "Mother makes such nice cakes."

"So she does," cried the third. "It seems so dull to have nothing nice on Annie's birthday. I should not care a fig if it were Dick's birthday, or Owen's, or mine; but not to drink Annie's health seems unlucky."

"You shall drink it," said Annie, laughing.

"In what?" asked both the boys in a breath.

"In fine spring water!" And she filled their mugs.

"Better God never gave to his creatures. How bright it is! How it sparkles! I will never from this day ask for a finer drink. Here is a health to you, my brothers, and may we never know what it is to lack a draught of pure water."

Annie nodded to her brothers, and drank off her mug of water; and the good-natured fellows, who dearly loved her, followed her example.

Oh, little did the gay-hearted girl think, in that moment of playful glee, of the price she was one day destined to pay for a drink of water.

The crops that year were a failure, and the heart of the strong man began to droop. He felt that his labor in his native land would no longer give his children bread; and unwilling to sink into the lowest class, he wisely resolved, while he retained the means of doing so, to emigrate to America. His wife made no opposition to his wishes, his sons were delighted with the prospect of any change for the better, and if Annie felt a passing pang at leaving the daisied fields and her pretty playmates, the lambs, she hid it from her parents. The dear homestead, with its quiet rural orchard, and trim hedge rows, fell to the hammer; nor was the sunburnt cheek of the honest yeoman unmoistened with a tear, when he saw it added to the enormous possessions of the lord of the manor.

After the sale was completed, and the money it brought duly paid, Steele lost no time in preparing for his emigration. In less than a fortnight he had secured their passage to New York, and they were already on their voyage across the Atlantic. Favored by wind and weather, after the first effects of the sea had worn off, they were comfortable enough. The steerage passengers were poor, but respectable English emigrants, and they made several pleasant acquaintances among them. One family especially attracted their attention, and so far engaged their affections during the tedious voyage, that they entered into an agreement to settle in the same neighborhood. Mr. Atkins was a widower, with his two sons, the ages of Richard and Owen, and an elder sister—a primitive, gentle, old woman, who had been once both wife and mother, but had outlived all her family. Abigail Winchester (for so she was called) took an especial fancy to our Annie, in whom she fancied that she recognized a strong resemblance to a daughter she had lost. Her affection was warmly returned by the kind girl, who, by a thousand little attentions, strove to evince her gratitude to Abigail for her good opinion.

They had not completed half their voyage before the scarlet fever broke out among the passengers, and made dreadful havoc among the younger portion. Steel's whole family were down with it at the same time, and, in spite of the constant nursing of himself, and his devoted partner, and the unremitting attention of Abigail Winchester, who never left the sick ward for many nights and days, the two youngest boys died, and were committed to the waters of the great deep before Annie and Richard recovered to consciousness of their dreadful loss. This threw a sad gloom over the whole party. Steel said nothing, but he often retired to some corner of the ship to bewail his loss in secret. His wife was wasted and worn to a shadow, and poor Annie looked the ghost of her former self.

"Had we never left England," she thought, "my brothers had not died." But she was wrong. God, who watches with parental love over all his creatures, knows the best season in which to reclaim his own; but human love in its vain yearnings is slow in receiving this great truth. It lives in the present, lingers over the past, and cannot bear to give up that which now is for the promise of that which shall be. The future separated from the things of time has always an awful aspect. A perfect and childlike resignation upon God can alone divest it of those thrilling doubts and fears which at times shake the firmest mind, and urge the proud, unyielding spirit of man to clevne no strongly to kindred dust.

The sight of the American shores, that the poor lads had desired so eagerly to see, seemed to renew their grief, and a sadder party never set foot upon a foreign strand than our emigrant and his family.

Steel had brought letters of introduction to a respectable merchant in the city, who advised him to purchase a tract of land in the then new State of Illinois. The beauty of the country, the fine climate and fruitful soil, were urged upon him in the strongest manner. The merchant had scrip to dispose of in that remote settlement, and, as is usual in such cases, he consulted his own interest in the matter.

Steel thought the merchant, who was a native of the country, must know best what would suit him; and he not only became a purchaser of land in Illinois, but induced his new friends to follow his example.

We will pass over their journey to the far West. The novelty of the scenes through which they passed, contributed not a little to raise their drooping spirits. Richard had recovered his health, and amused the party not a little by his lively anticipations of the future. They were to have the most comfortable log-house, and the neatest farm in the district. He would raise the finest cattle, the largest crops, and the best garden stuff in the neighborhood. Frugal and industrious habits would soon render them wealthy and independent.

His mother listened to these sallies with a delighted smile; and even the grave yeoman's brow relaxed from its habitual frown. Annie entered warmly into her brother's plans, and if he laid the foundation of his fine castle in the air, she certainly provided the cement and all the lighter materials.

As their long route led them further from the habitations of men, and deeper and deeper into the wilderness, realities of their solitary locality became hourly more apparent to the poor emigrants. They began to think that they had acted too precipitately in going so far back into the woods, unacquainted as they were with the usages of the country. But repentance came too late; and when, at length, they reached their destination, they found themselves upon the edge of a vast forest, with a noble, open prairie, stretching away as far as the eye could reach in front of them, and no human habitation in sight, or indeed existing for miles around them.

In a moment the yeoman comprehended all the difficulties and dangers of his new situation; but his was a stout heart, not easily daunted by circumstances. He possessed a vigorous constitution and a strong arm; and he was not alone. Richard was an active, energetic lad, and his friend Atkins, and his two sons, were a host in themselves. Having settled with his guides, and ascertained, by the maps that he received at Mr.——'s office, the extent and situation of his new estate, he set about unyoking the cattle which he had purchased, and securing them, while Atkins and his sons pitched a tent for the night and collected wood for their fire. The young people were in raptures with the ocean of verdure, redolent with blossoms, that lay smiling in the last rays of the sun before them. Never did garden appear so lovely as that vast wilderness of sweets, planted by the munificent hand of Nature with such profuse magnificence. Annie could scarcely tear herself away from the enchanting scene to assist her mother in preparing their evening meal.

"Mother, where shall we get water?" asked Annie, glancing wistfully towards their empty cask. "I have seen no indication of water for the last three miles."

"Annie has raised a startling doubt," said Steel, "I can perceive no appearance of stream or creek in any direction."

"Hist! father, do you hear that?" cried Richard. "The croaking of those frogs is music to me just now, for I am dying with thirst;" and seizing the can, he ran off in the direction of the discordent sounds.

It was near dark when he returned with his pailful of water; with which the whole party slaked their thirst before asking any questions.

"What rebellious water—as clear as crystal—as cold as ice! How fortunate it is to obtain it so near at hand!" exclaimed several in a breath.

"Aye, but it is an ugly place," said Richard thoughtfully. "I should not like to go to that well at early day, or after nightfall."

"Why not, my boy?"

"It is in the heart of a dark swamp, just about a hundred yards within the forest; and the water trickles beneath the roots of an old tree into a natural stone tank; but all around is involved in frightful gloom; I paused I heard a low growl as I stooped to fill my pail, while a horrid speckled snake glided from between my feet, and darted, hissing and rattling its tail, into the brake. Father, you must never let any of the people go alone to that well."

The yeoman laughed at his son's fears, and shortly after the party entered into the tent, and, overcome with fatigue, were soon asleep.

The first thing that engaged the attention of the emigrants was the erection of a log shanty for the reception of their respective families. This important task was soon accomplished. Atkins preferred the open prairie for the site of his; but Steel, for the nearer proximity of wood and water, chose the edge of the forest; but the habitations of the pioneers were so near that they were within call of each other.

To fence off a piece of land for the cattle, and prepare a plot for the wheat and corn for the ensuing year, was the next thing to be accomplished; and by the time these preparations were completed, the long bright summer had passed away, and the fall was at hand. Up to this period both families had enjoyed excellent health, but in the month of September, Annie and then Richard fell sick with intermittent fever, and old Abigail kindly came across to help Mrs. Steel to nurse her suffering children. Medical aid was not to be had in that remote place, and beyond simple remedies, which were perfectly inefficacious in their situation, the poor children's only chance of life was their youth, a good sound constitution, and the merciful interposition of a benevolent and overruling Providence.

It was towards the close of a sultry day that Annie, burning with fever, implored the faithful Abigail to give her a drink of cold water. Hastening to the water cask, the old woman was disappointed by finding it exhausted, Richard having drank the last drop, who was still raving in the delirium of fever, for more drink.

"My dear child, there is no water."

"Oh! I am burning—dying with thirst! Give me but one drop, dear Abigail—one drop of cold water!"

Just then Mrs. Steel returned from milking the cows, and Abigail proffered to the lips of the child a bowl of new milk, but she shrunk from it with disgust, and sinking back on her pillow murmured, "Water! water! for the love of God give me a drink of water!"

"Where is the pail?" said Mrs. Steel. "I don't much like going alone to that well; but it is still broad day, and I know that in reality there is nothing to fear; I cannot bear to hear the child moan for drink in that terrible way."

"Dear mother," said Richard faintly, "don't go; father will be in soon; we can wait till then."

"Oh, the poor dear child is burning!" cried Abigail; "she can not wait till then; do, neighbor, go for the water: I will stay with the children, and put out the milk while you are away."

Mrs. Steel left the shanty; and a few minutes after, the patients, exhausted by suffering, fell into a profound sleep. Abigail busied herself scalding the milk pans, and, in her joy at the young people's cessation from pain, forgot the mother altogether. About half an hour had elapsed, and the mellow light of evening had faded into night, when Steel returned with his oxen from the field.

The moment he entered the shanty he went up to the bed which contained his sick children, and, satisfied that the fever was abating, he looked round for his supper, surprised that it was not, as usual, ready for him upon the table.

"No water," he cried, "in the cask, and supper not ready? After working all day in the burning sun, a man wants to have things made comfortable for him at night. Mrs. Winchester, are you here? Where is my wife?"

"Merciful goodness!" exclaimed the old woman, turning as pale as death, "is she not back from the well?"

"The well!" cried Steel, grasping her arm; "how long has she been gone?"

"This half hour, or more."

Steel made no answer; his cheek was as pale as her own—and, taking his gun from the beam to which it was slung, he carefully loaded it with a ball, and, without saying a word, left the house.

Day still lingered upon the open prairie, but the moment he entered the bush it was deep night. He had crossed the plain with rapid strides, but as he approached the swamp his step became slow and cautious. The well was in the centre of a jungle, from the front of which Richard had cleared away the brush to facilitate their access to the water; as he drew near the spot, his ears were chilled by a low, deep growling, and the crunching of teeth, as if some wild animal was devouring the bones of its prey. The dreadful truth, with all its shocking, heart revolting reality, flashed upon the yeomen, and for a moment paralyzed him. The precincts of the well were within range of his rifle, and dropping down upon his hand and knees, and nerving his arm for a clear aim, he directed his gaze to the spot from whence the fatal sounds proceeded. A little on one side of the well, a pair of luminous eyes glared like green lamps at the edge of the dark wood, and the horrid sounds which curdled the blood of the yeoman became more distinctly audible.

Slowly Steel raised his rifle to his shoulder, and setting his teeth, and holding his breath, he steadily aimed at a space between these glowing balls of fire. The sharp report of the rifle awoke the far echoes of the forest. The deer leaped up from his lair, the wolf howled and fled into the depths of the wood, and the panther, for such it was, sprang several feet into the air, then fell across the mangled remains of his victim.

Richard Steel rose from the ground; the perspiration was streaming from his brow; his limbs trembled and shook, his lips moved convulsively, and he pressed his hands upon his heaving breast to keep down the violent throbbings of his agitated heart. It was not fear that chained him to the spot, and hindered him from approaching his dead enemy. It was horror. He dared not look upon the mangled remains of his wife—the dear partner of his joys and sorrows—the companion of his boyhood—the love of his youth—the friend and counsellor of his middle age—the beloved mother of his children. How could he recognize in that crushed and defiled heap his poor Jane? The fang was too great for agonized mind to bear. Sense and sight alike forsook him, and, staggering a few paces forward, he fell insensible across the path.
